If so, our hopes are gone; Love's state
Makes such an one unfortunate;
Nay, he is beyond man's thought
A miscreant or else a sot.

Æmilius spoke these Verses with so passionate an air, that Valeria changed colour, and Herminius resented a kind of vexation at it. Nevertheless he took upon him to be the Historian of this gallant Feast, and Amilcar to recount an amorous History as his Ticket obliged him. After which, it being late, all this fair company retired. Sulpitia led Clidamira and Berelisa to the place where they were to lodge, and Herminius constrained Anacreon to go and lodge at the house of the virtuous Sivelia, who was friend to all the friends of her Illustrious Son, and loved worthy persons, sufficiently to be induced to give handsome reception to a stranger upon information of his merit. As for Artemidorus, he was sufficiently sad; for he had observed Berelisa, was possessed without just cause for it, since he had only such civility for Clidamira, as a virtuous person can never disclaim, but had a very tender passion for Berelisa. In which regard he was extreamly impatient till he could get an opportunity to entertain her in private; which he could not easily bring about; for the next morning there was a great Company with Clidamira and her, so that he could do no more than tell her after a confused manner, that he ever loved her dearly, and that she was injurious to him, in apprehending any cause of jealousie. Berelisa blusht at these words, and not being able to suppress her first thought, but casting her eyes another way, you might more properly say, (answered she) that I am injurious in loving you, than in being jealous, since this cruel passion is an infallible concomitant of a tender affection. Indeed my mind (continued she) is in a miserable condition; if I am generous, I ought to counsel you to desert me, and to put your self in a capacity of being once again deceived by Clidamira, since she alone is able to re-ingratiate you with the Prince of Leontium, and without her you will be perpetually exil'd. On the other side, if I follow the pure sentiments of my own Soul, I should rather choose to see you in eternal banishments, than to see Clidamira deprive me of that which she has lost by her own fault, and I have merited by an inviolable fidelity. Now judge what quietness my mind is capable of, especially when I see you have still as great civility for Clidamira, as if she had not been unfaithful. But is it possible, (replyed Artemidorus) that you conceive an intelligent person can be uncivil to a Lady, and to a Lady he once Loved, and who would still perswade him that she does not hate him? But is it possible, (answered Berelisa passionately.) you can understand a true Lover can innocently have civility for a Lady who causes jealousie in the person by whom he would be loved? However, (added she) because I will not make my grief apparent to the eyes of so many persons, who know me not, I will conceal my sentiments the best I can, and observe yours with the greatest care possible, for, in my conjecture, you know them not your self. In earnest, added she, you love Clidamira, more than you think you do, and love me less than you believe, and so undavertingly commit infidelity against me. Alass! Madam, interrupted Artemidorus, I beseech you do not accuse me with injustice. But moreover, said Berelisa, you know not well what passes in you own heart, and take nor sufficient notice of the proceedings in mine. As Artemidorus was going to answer her, there came a great number of people who interrupted him; yet he began to speak and tell her, that he was necessitated to leave Clusium, for fear of being discovered by a man whom the Prince of Leontium had sent to Porsenna; of which having received notice by the Princess his Sister, he came back to Rome, the Princess also having taken upon her to send him intelligence how her affairs proceeded. After which, Herminius being arrived with Telanus, told the company that the Festival appointed, was to be hastned in favor of this generous Veientine, because the Veientines were within two days to send the Figure which they at first so peremptorily denyed, and so Telanus would be obliged to depart, and without obeying the command which Lot had layd upon him, being the person designed to give the Collation. Sulpitia coming thither with Clelia, a moment after, it was concluded it should be the next day; and so Telanus took upon him to prepare for the Collation, Artemidorus to give the Musick, and Amilcar to make the relation he was obliged to. Yet he declared that he would not trust to his memory nor his eloquence, but for the contentment of the Company, read them a History, famous for the name of the person principally concerned in it, which he not many days agoe had translated out of the Greek into the Roman Language. All the Company required he should relate some adventure, wherein himself was interessed; but Plotina craftily alleadging, that being obliged to recount an amorous History, it was not fit he should speak of his own Love, because he knew not how to manage that passion; this choice was allowed, and the next morning the same persons, who had been at the former entertainment, being met together in the same Garden, it was resolved Amilcar should read the History which he had translated, and that before the Collation or the Walk, because it was not unreasonably presumed, the passages of his Relation would supply matter for the conversation of the rest of the day. Wherefore all this fair Company being seated in a magnificent Hall, out of which was a very delightful prospect, Amilcar placed himself in such a manner, as he might be most easily understood by all that were present, and began to read the History of Hesiode, in which some are of opinion, that in the place of Apollo's prediction, some thing has been added in latter Ages. But to leave that in suspense, Amilcar began to read in this manner.

The HISTORY of HESIODE.

I Beseech you (interposed Plotina) stay a little, and first tell me, whether this Hesiode be not a great Poet, I have heard say lived many Ages ago? For if it be, I confess to you I should find it difficult to interest my self sensibly in the adventures of people that have been out of the World so long. For my part (said Clelia,) I am not of your humor; for I am almost inclinable to lament the miserable adventures which are no more than fictitious, if they be invented with any resemblance of truth. That cannot I do, (replyed Plotina) for that which passes in the same City where I am, affects me more than that which passes in Greece, and that which arrives in my own time, makes greater impression upon my heart, than that which hapned in the days of Romulus. In reference to such things (answered Clelia) as we see with our own eyes, or which befal people that we know, I consent with you, that they move more than others do, but in the telling of an History relating to persons not of your knowledge, I confidently believe, we ought to be as much affected with an Adventure hapned in Greece, as at Rome, and there is no distance of places which takes away the sensibility of the heart, no Age so remote, but the fancy becomes near enough to it to excite compassion: for 'tis the things themselves we are moved with, and not so much the places or the persons; since every place or person you know not, is indifferent to you, and cannot affect you more one way than another. 'Tis the representation made to you of their sufferings that mollifies your heart; and if any man should invent a deplorable sad Story, I conceive your self would be unable to resist all sense of pitty: for in my judgment such as have greatest wits, suffer themselves to be most of all taken with things happily invented. The way to determine your controversies (said Herminius) is, to permit Amilcar to read. You have reason, (answered Anacreon) for if the amiable Plotina have no compassion for Hesiode, I think her the most cruel Virgin in the World, though the History Amilcar is going to read of him, should add nothing to the truth. Read then (said Plotina, beholding Amilcar) for it is not fit I should longer deprive the Company of the pleasure they expect from a History you have chosen to divert them. Yet you will please to remember, answered Amilcar, that I am engaged to relate none but an amorous History, and so the more love there is in that I shall read, the more I shall satisfie my Word. After this, the silence of all the Company intimating their expectation he should begin to read, he did so in these Words.

The

The History OF HESIODE.

HESIODE was of a very Illustrious Lineage, for 'tis affirmed he was descended from Orpheus, as well as Homer, who was his very near Kinsman, And indeed this pedegree is so particularly deduced, that there is no ground to believe it fictitious. They say, Orpheus was the Son of Æacus and of the Muse Calliope; that Orpheus was Father of Drez; and Drez Father of Eneleus; that from this latter, successively descended Jamonides, Philoterpe, Euphemus, Euphrades, and Menalopus. This Menapolus had two Sons, Appelles and Ampelis; Appelles was Father to Meon, who going to Smyrna married Eu-, by whom he had Homer. Ampelis on the other married at Cuma, and had a Son called Dius, was the Father of Hesiode. It is also recorded his Family was very rich; but his Father have been rather prodigal than liberal, so intangled affairs, that not being longer able to live at that ght of expence he was wont to do, he left Cuma Ionia where he dwelt, and went into Bæotia, here he rather made choice of the Countrey than City for his ordinary residence, and dwelt at Town called Ascra, the situation of which infinitely delectable. Besides also, Dius marrying in this place with a Virgin of a sufficient fortune, whose name was Pysimeda, he continued there as well out of interest as inclination. At end of the first year of his Marriage, Hesiode came into the World, and the year after, Dius had another Son named Perses, who differed much from the first; for Hesiode was a great and excellent person, and Perses was the true pattern of a wretched Poet, dull, lazy, envious, and full of vanity. The childhood of Hesiode was always delightful, and his education better than might have been expected from the Countrey. For Dius having contracted a particular friendship with an eminent Priest of the Muses at the Mount Helicon, left the young Hesiode to him for some years. Now this famous Mountain, which is not far distant from that of Parnassus, being peculiarly consecrated to Apollo, and the Muses, all the considerable people throughout Greece, go thither at least once in their life time. And as places of great resort have always more politeness than others, Hesiod's wit became very gallant and polite, even in his tender years. He had both boldness and discretion; and that which is always a good sign in the mind of a child, he had a general curiosity to get every thing explained to him which he did not understand. He loved much to walk alone by himself, though otherwise his genius was sufficiently free. He was of a handsome person, civil, and of a pleasing conversation; but before he was eighteen years old, he never thought of employing himself in making Verses, although he was in a Countrey consecrated to the Muses, and indeed the pleasures of Hesiode at this time, seem'd sufficiently contrary to Poetry; for he lov'd Hunting more than Study, notwithstanding the general curiosity I told you he had from his Childhood, which incited him always to enquire the reason of what he saw. Now being exactly at that age in which the heart of young people is as yet undetermin'd to any thing, and capable of taking to all whatsoever, wherein Vice and Virtue seem to dispute who shall possess it; Hesiode at his return from hunting, went to sit down at the brink of that famous Spring Hippocrene, which is at the foot of Helicon, which they say, arises out of a rock, and was first made by a stroke of Pegasus's foot, and which is so famous for the admirable virtue ascrib'd to it, of inspiring those that drink of it with an exquisite faculty of making Verses. Hesiode therefore being something weary with the hunting he had been at, and finding a very pleasant shade near this Fountain, sate down there, and leaning against the body of a tree, betook himself to muse with sufficient pleasure, by reason of the purling of the stream, and the whispers of the leaves which were gently wav'd by a soft fresh wind; for it was exactly in that season of Roses, in which the West-winds are most agreeable, and in which the Festivals of Love was ready to be celebrated at Helicon, which was wont to be solemniz'd there every five years, as constantly as that of the Muses; to signifie, that as Love cannot want the Muses, so the Muses cannot be without Love. Hesiode entertaining himself in this manner, without having any great joy, or great sorrow, or other particular object, to imploy his mind, and awaken his imagination, he fell by degrees into so profound a Musing, that he no longer took notice of that which he heard, or saw, or was thinking of. So that slumbring by little and little, he supported himself against a Tree, and fell asleep. His eyes had not long been shut, but his fancy being guided by the gods, presented him with an admirable and surprising object; for on a suddain, he thought he beheld all the Muses about him, in that manner as they are pictur'd, to wit, in the attire of Nymphs with loose Robes, with dishevel'd hair, with garlands and flowers upon their heads, and several instruments in their hands, correspondent to the several things invented by them. Hesiode on a suddain beheld this Celestial Troop about him; he heard so melodious a Concent, that he was charmed with it; he fancied also that he beheld several little Cupids amongst them, who leaving off their sport to listen to them, seemed to hearken very attentively. But at length the Musick being ended, Calliope advancing towards him, after having had the consent of her companions, to do so, spoke to him almost in this manner, if yet it be lawful to fancy how the Muses speak.

Upon what thinkest thou, Hesiode? dost thou not fear that the gods will call thee to an account for the wit which they have given thee? what hast thou done with it since thou camest into the world? art thou not asham'd to dwell in the hill of Helicon, to be neighbor to the Mountain from whence we took our birth, to be so near Parnassus, and to sleep on the brink of Hippocrene, without ever having had a thought of composing Verses? Thinkest thou that the gods have given thee wit, memory, fancy, and judgement, to employ upon nothing? Awaken thy self from this drowsiness, wherein sloth still detains thee, consider that the life of men is too short, for them to be contented with it, and that there is nothing so sweet as for a man to acquire immortality to himself. Consider what glory it is that attends thee, if thou believest the counsels which we give thee; and to encourage thee to follow them, know, that if thou wilt, thy name shall be celebrated throughout all Ages, and amongst all Nations, and thou shalt be universally acknowledged for the Father of all the Poets, which shall arise in the whole extent of the world. Do not imagine that what we tell thee is a small matter, for I can assure thee (upon the word of Apollo, who knows things to come) that they who are descended, or who shall descend in the sequel of time, from the greatest Kings, or the most illustrious Heroes, shall not be owner of so great a fame, as they who shall follow thee. But to give thee a light Idea of it, redouble thy attention; follow me to the top of my Helicon, take good notice of all that I shall shew thee there, hearken with respect to the great things which I am going to inform thee of, and believe all that I shall tell thee cannot miss coming to pass; for the most secret books of destiny are always open to Apollo, from whom it is I speak to thee.

After this, Hesiode thought that he was transported to the top of Mount Helicon, from whence discovering all Greece, as he thought, he beheld the fairest object that ever he had seen. But though he conceiv'd himself elevated very high, yet he perceiv'd the most remote objects, as distinctly as if they had been very near; for when we see things only in imagination, we see them as well afar off as near. In this place under a great Laurel which made a handsome umbrage, Calliope all alone appear'd to him again, and addressing to him with a majestical air, and full of sweetness and charms;

Rowze up thy mind, Hesiode, said she to him, receive respectfully the favour Apollo does thee, of rendring thee capable to penetrate into futurity, and to enjoy true glory, which is never found till after death, and consequently is not very considerable during life. But to cause thee to enjoy it amply, it is requisite that I make thee a description of Poetry, that I recall what's past, and reaching forth unto that which is to come, make thee know, what none other shall know during thy generation; but as they who intending to shew a great River to a stranger, would not go to take view of it near its Spring, because it would seem too little; so likewise in going to shew thee the progress of Poetry, I must not trace it back to its original: because being it is really the off-spring of Heaven, I cannot conduct thee to the place of its nativity. It suffices to tell thee, that 'tis the language of the gods, and that Love and Glory have brought it into use amongst men; That without it the Heroes would dye unrewarded, that their names would perish soon after them; that Lovers would sigh without pleasure, that the art for one to render her himself immortal, by immortalizing others, would be unknown in the World. In the next place, look upon all Greece, as the first place wherein Poetry began to be celebrated, and from whence it shall pass successively to the other parts of the World. Dost thou not see a Woman of a goodly aspect, at the gate of the Temple of Delphos? 'tis Phemonoe, the first Prophetess of that Temple, who invented the handsomest form of Verses; For by a priviledge granted to Women, it may be affirmed that they have more share in poetry than men, since if they do not make Verses themselves, yet at least they inspire others with the desire of making them. Dost thou not see near her, that young man that plays upon the Harp? 'tis the famous Amphion, who added three strings to that instrument, to make them up seven, there having been but four before. It is also reported, that the stones, drawn by his harmony, ranked themselves one upon another, to build the Walls of Thebes: but the truth is, he became of such reputation among the Thebans, that he easily perswaded them to inclose their City. Look a little towards the right hand, and thou wilt see a venerable man: 'tis the most antient of three Poets, who bear or will bear the name Linus, and the first whom Apollo taught the measures and numbers of Verse. He writ a Poem concerning the World, which got him such honor, that some have not stuck to call him the Son of Apollo; and indeed his name will be always celebrated by the Geek Poets, who will make Hymns upon his death, and particularly by the famous Sappho of Mytilene, whom I shall by and by shew you.

In the mean time, look upon him who appears so handsome, and so sad; 'tis Orpheus, from whom thou art descended, who was able to charm Hell, and recover Euridice from the shades of death, by the power of this melodie, and who not being able to contain one moment from looking upon that beloved person, lost her again for ever. This excellent Poet has composed thirty nine Poems, but time shall bereave posterity of them, excepting one Book of Hymns to the gods, and a Treatise of precious Stones, of which some fragments shall remain preserv'd from age to age, and it shall be known in general, that he lov'd to treat of grave Subjects, as of the World, the Sun, and Morality.

He

He that thou seest behind him is Musæus, to whom Orpheus addressed several of his Works, and left his Harp at his death; 'tis he that made the handsome Poem of Leander and Hero; although in process of time, some will go about to ascribe it to another Musæus.

Then take notice of Melesigenes, who is thy kinsman, and whom thou must overcome at Chalcis. I shall say nothing to thee of his lineage, and the place where he was born; for thou knowest it well; but I shall assure thee, that he shall be so famous, that in future ages, seven Cities shall contend for the honor of having him their Native; namely Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, and Athens. He shall be indigent of the goods of Fortune, but rich in the gifts of the mind. He shall make several voyages, and shall be almost continually unhappy. He shall lay aside the name of Melesigines, and take upon him that of Homer, because he shall become blind. After this accident, he shall become so poor, that he shall be constrain'd for a long time to beg alms. Yet he shall find charitable friends to assist him, and the gods themselves shall do a miracle for his sake; for the Seamen refusing to take him into their Vessel to go to Chios, shall be overtaken with so great a storm, that, imagining it befallen them, because they refus'd Homer, they shall return to the shore to take him in, and afterwards make a happy voyage. But at length Homer shall become a little more happy; he shall marry, and have two Daughters, and then it shall be, that he shall compose one Work, which he shall intitle Odysseus, and another, Ilias. The latter of which shall be more admir'd than the former, in the first ages which shall follow him; but in after-times, they shall be judg'd of quite contrary: but in truth, they shall both be worthy of the highest applauses. Homer in acknowledgement to those, by whom he shall be assisted, shall introduce them in his Works, to the end to immortalize their Virtue. For Phœnius his Father-in-law, and his first Master, shall find a place in the Odysseus; Mentor shall be highly celebrated there; he shall also speak advantageously of Mentes, and shall not forget a plain Mechanick, who shall entertain him for some time at his house; and thus he shall give an heroical testimony of acknowledgement, in an age that shall be ungrateful to his Virtue. But posterity shall at least render justice to his merit, and acknowledge him to have been Master of a grand and prodigious genius, with a natural, facile, and delightful style. He it is, that shall invent to begin a History in the middle, to the end, to suspend the minds of the Readers, and give them a kind of pleasing inquietude; it shall be he that shall introduce that admirable diversity of styles, in which he shall never be surpass'd by any; he shall be admir'd by the most eminent wits of Greece, and acknowledg'd in all ages for a Poet, worthy to be imitated in every respect by all others.

Judge then what glory will befall to you, in overcoming a man, whose name shall be famous, as long as Reason shall be amongst men.

Hitherto I have told you of the past and the present; I must begin with the amorous Mimnermus, to discover the future to you. Do not you perceive by his air and his aspect, that he will be able to sing of nothing but Love? 'Tis he that shall invent the way of the bewailing Elegie for the fair Nanno his Mistress, who, by the sweetness of her voice, shall inspire him with the sweetness of his Verse: Nevertheless, the Works of this excellent man shall perish, and not live among those of others; but yet there shall be enough to judge, that he must needs have been a most delicate and amorous wit.

After this, Hesiode believ'd he saw only all Peloponnesus, the Sea that encompasses it, and particularly the Cape of Tenarus, and upon that Sea, not far from the Cape, a comely person carried upon the back of a Dolphin, playing upon an Harp, and looking sometimes towards the shore, and sometimes towards Heaven, as if he thanked the gods for some favor. After which, Calliope beginning again to speak, He that thou seest, said she, is the famous Arion, who shall invent the manner of Tragick Verses, and the introducing of a Chorus; he shall be ready to be slain by the mariners of a ship, out of intent to possess his Money; but having obtain'd permission to sing some Verses to his Harp, he shall do it so well, that the melody of his Song shall draw several Dolphins about the ship; upon which, Arion abandoning himself to them, shall leap into the Sea, and be receiv'd by one of those Dolphins, who shall carry him to the shore; and thus he shall find more humanity amongst Fishes, than amongst Men.

Then all these objects passing away, Hesiode beheld an Island, and upon the top of a Rock, a brown Woman of indifferent stature and beauty; yet she had quick and sprightly eyes, and was of a very comely shape: she that thou seest, said Calliope then to Hesiode, is the famous Sappho of Mytilene, who shall be celebrated throughout all ages, for the handsomness of her Verses, especially for a certain passionate and amorous style, which shall be almost inimitable. She shall invent the use of the Bow belonging to the Harp, which shall highly advantage the sound of it; she shall love a disloyal person, which shall be the cause of her death; but though almost all her works shall perish, yet her name shall live eternally; she shall be styled the tenth Muse, and in all Ages new Honors shall be ascrib'd to her.

But there is enough spoken, concerning this Illustrious Lesbian; therefore behold Alcæus, who shall live at the same time; do not you see he has the aspect of a man of quality? his birth shall be very noble; he shall command the Armies of Mytilene, with his Brother Antimenides: but one of the seven Sages of Greece named Pittacus, shall possess himself of the Tyranny, and eject them; so that Alcæus, an excellent Lyrick Poet, being incensed in mind, shall begin to write against him, and in general, against Tyranny and Tyrants, and make Verses, which shall be accounted seditious. His works shall be grave, and strong; he shall sometimes descend to Mirth and Love, and succeed very well therein, although more excellent for other things. He shall have so passionate a soul, that he shall desire to immortalize a little mark the person he shall love, shall have upon her foot; but he shall have the unhappiness to fall into the hands of Pittacus, who contenting himself with the power to be reveng'd, shall send him back again without harm, and by that handsome action, confirm to himself the prerogative of bearing the glorious title of Wise.

After this, Heſiode beheld Alceus no more; but ſaw a man diſguis'd with a vizard in a Chariot, who went to and fro in the middle of a ſpacious place in Athens, encompas'd with the people. He that thou ſeeſt, ſaid Calliope, is Theſpis, who ſhall himſelf act the Tragedies which he ſhall compoſe, and ſhall be famous for this ſort of Works.

But then, Doſt not thou ſee a man, who has a countenance ſufficiently cheerful? 'tis Epicharmus, who ſhall be born in Sicily, and be the firſt inventor of Comedies, which ſhall periſh by time, after having ſerv'd for a pattern to thoſe that ſhall follow.

In the next place, behold two Poets with grave looks, marching together; one of them is Theognis, who rejecting Poetical fictions, ſhall write Precepts of Morality in Verſe. Yet he ſhall ſometimes intermingle Love in his Works, and that with ſome freedom. The other is Phocilydes of Miletum, ſomething more ſerious, who ſhall write of moral matters full of inſtruction, and draw the greateſt part of his Sentences from the Books of certain Women who ſhall be called Sybyls, he ſhall be imitated one day by a French Poet, whoſe Verſes ſhall for a long time be the firſt Leſſons of Virtue for the young children of his own Nation. They ſhall both begin their Works in recommending the worſhiping of the Divine Power, the honour of Parents, and judging with Juſtice, and fear of another Judgement, which attends both the good and the wicked. Then behold a man of a very comly perſon, but blind! 'tis Steſichorus of Sicily, a Lyrick Poet, who ſhall come near to the grandeur of Homer. 'Tis true, he ſhall be condemn'd for being too abundant; but there ſhall remain nothing of him beſides his reputation. While he ſhall be yet in the cradle, a Nightingale ſhall ſit and ſing upon his mouth; he ſhall loſe his ſight for having ſpoken ill of Helene, but recover it again by making a Work in her praiſe, which he ſhall call a Palinode or Recantation. But after having ſhewn thee Steſichorus alone, I muſt alſo ſhew thee him in company; doſt not thou ſee eight Men and a Woman? they are the nine Lyrick Poets, who ſhall be put together in reſemblance of the nine Muſes. The firſt without compariſon, ſhall be Pindar, of whom I ſhall tell thee afterwards: and thou mayſt ſee the reſt about her, who are Simonides, Steſichorus, Ibycus, Alcman, Bachylides, Anacreon, Alcæus, and Sappho, who ſhall likewiſe be call'd the tenth Muſe, as I told thee before.

But to ſpeak at preſent only of Pindar, when he ſhall be in the cradle, the Bees ſhall make Honey upon his mouth. Doſt thou not ſee that he is ſeparated from the reſt that environ him, and that he has none near him but a fair Virgin, with a Crown upon her head? 'tis Corinna, who ſhall have the glory of ſurpaſſing him five times publickly, and gain the prize for making better Verſes than he. Nevertheleſs, he ſhall be a Poet of the firſt Order, in the judgement of the greateſt Poets, that ſhall follow him. He ſhall be ſo ſublime, that it ſhall be hard to follow him; his ſtyle ſhall be lofty, pure, and chaſte, and truly worthy to entertain Kings and Princes. He ſhall love chiefly to ſing the praiſes of thoſe who ſhall have been Victors in the Olympick Games; However, as I mention'd before, Corinna ſhall overcome him five times: Some ſhall ſay, the reaſon ſhall be, for that being very handſome, her Verſes ſhall thereby ſeem ſo much the more amiable; others that making uſe of the Æolian Dialect, and Pindar of the Doric, which ſhall not be ſo elegant, this ſhall give her the advantage. But to diſcover a truth to thee which ſhall never be known to any other, he ſhall be amorous of her, and therefore take pleaſure to ſuffer himſelf to be overcome by her: Not but that this Woman muſt be ſo admirable for her Verſes, that the Tanagrians ſhall erect a Statue to her: ſhe ſhall alſo give profitable councel to Pindar, for as he ſhall one day be boaſting of himſelf in her preſence, ſhe ſhall pleaſantly mock him, and tell him that he knows not how to make any thing, ſince he knows not how to feign; maintaining peremptorily, that fiction is neceſſary to handſom Poetry. Pindar afterwards endeavouring to improve this admonition, ſhall offer her a work wholly fill'd with fictions connected together; but this fair Virgin deriding him again ingeniouſly, and beholding him with a mocking ſmile ſhall tell him, they ought to be interſpers'd with judgement, and not caſt in by handfuls as he has done. And accordingly, Pindar ſhall ſo well profit by her Counſel, that he ſhall become the wonder of his own age, and of thoſe which ſhall come after him. The moſt famous Conqueror of the World, ſhall eſteem him ſo highly, that having taken Thebes, he ſhall cauſe the houſe to be ſhewn him where Pindar dwelt, to ſecure it from being pillag'd, and ſhall preſerve the goods of another Pindar, only in reſpect to his name. He ſhall alſo be happy in dying; for after having requeſted of the gods, that which is ſweeteſt in life, he ſhall have the advantage to dye without pain, ſleeping upon the knees of a perſon whom he ſhall love, at the publick Shews. After which, a Statue ſhall be erected to him.

But in the next place, doſt thou ſee a goodly perſon, well made, and of a comely ſtature, who has a Crown of Flowers upon his head, and a very rich cup in his hand, who is near a Table well furniſh'd, and encompaſs'd with people that are dancing? 'tis the famous Anacreon, the great protector of Joy and Feaſts. Oh, I beſeech you, (interrupted Anacreon) let me ſee whether you have not craftily adjoyn'd me to ſo many Poets, that have appear'd to me as well as to Heſiode, ſince you began to read. Sincerely (anſwer'd Amilcar) I have made no alteration in tranſlating this place, and I engage to let you ſee all I am going to read, in the Greek Original. Let Amilcar read on, (ſaid Plotina) for perhaps we ſhall hear what you would be unwilling to tell us. Indeed (added Valeria) I have underſtood by Berelisa and Clidamira, that you will not relate any thing concerning your Loves. 'Tis true (anſwer'd Anacreon) That I do not affect to tell my amorous adventures; and therefore I am loth to let Amilcar read this place; for I ſhould not care to have Calliope diſcover to you all my ſecrets. Fear nothing (reply'd Amilcar) a Muſe never ſpeaks indiſcreetly; and the Tranſlator is intelligent enough. Proceed then (ſaid Anacreon) And accordingly Amilcar began to read again in this manner, at the place where he had left off.

But in the next place, doſt thou ſee a goodly perſon, well made, and of a comely ſtature, who has a crown

a crown of Flowers upon his head, and a very rich cup in his hand, who is near a Table well furnish'd, and encompass'd with people that are dancing? 'tis the famous Anacreon, the protector of Joy and Feasts. He shall have a jovial wit, gallant, delicate and natural; his Odes shall last as long as the Empire of Letters shall endure; he shall invent a sort of Verses that shall bear his name; he shall make Elegies, he shall sing the Loves of Circe and Penelope, Lovers of Ulysses, but this Work shall perish, and he shall at length be one of the most famous Poets of all Greece; he shall love after all the ways, wherewith 'tis possible to Love; his principal Mistress shall be named——

Hold, I beseech you (interrupted Anacreon again) and do not name her. I must of necessity name her (answer'd Amilcar) for Plotina makes me a sign to continue my reading; which he did accordingly, thus,

His principle Mistress shall be named Euripile; posterity nevertheless shall believe, that he lov'd two other persons more ardently. He shall be very well belov'd by the Prince of Samos, called Polycrates, who shall one day give him two talents, but Anacreon shall restore them back two days after, and tell him (to refuse him without incivility) that he was two nights without sleep, for thinking how he should employ them, and that he will not be rewarded with a thing that affords nothing but anxious and inquiet cares. In his first youth, returning from a great Feast, he shall meet a Nurse holding a Child in her arms; whom he shall justle so rudely, that the provoked Woman shall pray the gods, that one day he may as much honor her Son whom he then despis'd; and accordingly, that child shall one day excite love in Anacreon. He shall invent a kind of Lyre with one and twenty strings; and he shall dye by an unexpected and inconsiderable accident, in the midst of a Feast, at the age of fourscore and five years, and shall enjoy after his death an immortal glory.

Whatever the accident be, (interrupted Anacreon) that shall occasion my death, in that age I think I have no great cause to be troubled at it: but whatever Calliope has spoken of it, I conceive I shall not do very ill, to take care always to keep my self from dying young. As for me (answer'd Plotina) I am not dispos'd to contradict you; for besides that in my judgement I apprehend you have reason, I have also a great desire that Amilcar continue his reading, both to let me know those who are to succeed, and to resolve me whether Rome is not likely to have a Poet famous enough, to deserve mentioning by Calliope. After which Amilcar proceeded in this manner. Seest thou that old man with the bald head, in the middle of a field, and above him a great Eagle, holding a Tortoise in her beak? 'tis Æschylus the Athenian; he shall be the first that shall publish Tragedies; he shall add very much to the ornaments of the Theater, and first establish that maxime, not to bloody the Scene. He shall compose fourscore and ten Tragedies, and shall overcome twenty eight times; but being grown very old, he shall be out-done by Sopholes in the spring of his youth; which shall be so grievous to him, that he shall forsake Greece, and go into Sicily. He shall be sublime, grave, magnificent, in his expressions, sometimes even to excess, but often rude and impolish'd, Wherefore the Athenians in following ages shall permit the Poets to correct the Tragedies of Æschylus, and afterward make them pass for new, and obtain prizes with them. Nevertheless, that famous Lycurgus the Law-giver, shall so highly esteem his Works, and those of Sophocles; that he shall cause them to be kept in the publick Archiv's, and erect Statues of Brass to both of them. Æschylus shall be threatned to be killed with a blow on the head; to avoid which unhappiness, he shall very much affect to walk much in the plain field; but the gods shall punish him for the boldness, to go about to resist destiny; for a great Eagle holding a Tortoise, and taking the bald head of Æschylus for a stone, shall let the same fall upon him to break it; and thus seeking to avoid death, he shall find it, after having had the grief to hear it reproach'd to him by the young Sophocles, that when he did well, he did not know for what reason he did so. In the next place, behold Sophocles the conqueror of Æschylus, and many others: Dost thou not guess by his aspect, that he shall be inclin'd to Love? Theorida and Archippa shall be famous for having been his Mistresses, He shall be the greatest of Tragick Poets; his Works shall have an incomparable beauty and elegance; all shall be exact in them, polite, and accomplisht; they shall have both sweetness and loftiness: Some shall go about to parallel him to Euripides, of whom I am to speak next; but the more sage opinions shall be for Sophocles. Some shall surname him the Bee, intimating that he shall take only the flower of things; others the Syrene, because he shall very much allure the minds of those that shall see his Works. In his extream old age, not thinking of ought but to acquire glory, and neglecting his domestick affairs, one of his children shall accuse him of dotage, and go about to deprive him of the management of his estate; but he shall shew the Judges a very handsome piece, which he shall then be making; upon which the accuser shall be more in danger to be declared a fool than the accused. He shall make six and twenty Tragedies, and shall overcome in twenty four; but at last he shall dye of joy, having first overcome once in his decrepit age, and gotten the advantage to preserve all the excellency of his wit to the last. For one telling him, Thou art unhappy, Sophocles, in being no longer capable of Love; he shall answer gallantly, I esteem my self happy for being escaped from his Tyranny, as from that of a furious and insolent Master.

But it is time to shew thee Euripides: dost thou not see a man encompass'd with several Soldiers 'tis he of whom I speak: he hath, as thou seest, a fierce, melancholly and proud aspect; yet his birth shall not be great, and he shall be born in poverty; but he shall have boldness and fierceness. 'Tis true, his merit shall bear him out. In his first youth he shall overcome several times, in the places where there shall be prizes for the exercises of the body. Afterwards, he shall make a great number of Tragedies, of which eight shall be Satyrical. He shall overcome fifteen times, without any sign of Joy discernable in his eyes. Indeed Euripides shall scarce ever laugh, and it shall not be known whether he loves or hates Women, so uniform shall he appear in all his actions. Yet

Sophocles

Sophocles shall reproach him not to hate them, but in the Theater. The people shall one day pray him to change a Verse; but he shall answer, That he writ to teach the people, and not to be taught by them. He shall sometimes take pains with difficulty, and a Poet shall reproach to him, that he made but three Verses in three days. I acknowledge it, shall he answer, and you have made a hundred; but your hundred Verses shall not last three days, and my three Verses shall last not only three hundred years, but even to eternity. In effect, Euripides shall have so great a reputation, that after the Athenians shall have been overcome under Nicias and Gilippus, the Sicilians, who shall be the Victors, shall spare the lives of several prisoners only because they shall know of the Verses of Euripides, wherewith they shall be so charm'd, that they shall cause them to be continually recited, to the end to learn them, and give the like liberty to those from whom they shall have learnt them. There shall be some also that shall stay in Sicily, and enrich themselves by reciting those Verses which all the World shall admire. But as for the others, who shall return to Athens, thou seest them at his feet, to thank him as their Deliverer, and leave him wholly surpris'd with this glorious adventure. He shall have the honor to be a great friend to Socrates, who shall, for the time to come, be the pattern to all the Sages; and he shall also have the generosity to give him testimonies of his amity after his death. But at length Euripides shall have the unhappiness to discover that his wife shall be unfaithful to him, and love a Comedian; upon which, fearing the mockery of the Comick Poets, he shall forsake his Countrey, and go into Macedonia, where he shall be in favour with the King Archelaus. During his being there, one of those Poets who never make Verses but to beg, and of which kind there shall always be some in the Courts of Princes, shall request something of considerable value of the King of Macedonia; but this Prince being ingenious both to refuse and give, shall command that to be given to Euripides, which the other desired of him; for (shall he say to this importunate person) you deserve to ask without receiving, and Euripides deserves to receive without asking. But at last Euripides shall die miserably; for he shall be torn to pieces by the dogs of that King at a famous hunting. The people shall say, the cause of it was because he interceded for a man who had slain one of those dogs; but the true reason shall be, for that the King scarce minding his hunting any longer, and being almost continually in discourse with Euripides, jealousie and hatred shall both enter into their hearts; so that finding him one day wandring alone, they shall tear him to pieces; and thus shall the famous Euripides die, whom many judicious persons shall scarce dare to place above Sophocles.

But after having seen this illustrious Poet, fix thy eyes awhile upon a very little man, who stands there on one side: he is a Poet, and nam'd Philetas; he shall make Elegies full of very handsome fancy. He shall be so lean, so little, and so light, that the people shall report he always carries lead about him, for fear the wind should carry him away. He shall have a Mistriss named Bambis, and shall dye through grief, for not being able to resolve the argument of a Sophister.

He that thou seest in the next place, is the incomparable Menander, whose glory shall be immortal; he is the man that shall refine Comedies, who shall take away the insolent satyre from them, and banish all that encounters modesty. He shall have an inclination extraordinarily amorous; for which reason there shall be much true modesty in his works. He shall apprehend perfectly, that a handsome Comedy ought to be a description, or picture of the World, and the passions ordinary to all men; for no Poet shall goe beyond him in skill, and exact observation of manners, customs, passions, and inclinations of each particular of mankind. There shall be other Comick Poets after him, who shall confound all his different stiles, and without observing all those varieties which are so necessary to these kind of Pictures, they shall make Kings and Slaves speak after the same manner, and confound the Tragick style with the Comick. These cannot without injustice be equall'd to Menander, who shall be gallant and polite throughout, who shall have nothing but what either instructs or diverts. Whence there shall be in the sequel of time, a most grave and famous Author, who shall prefer Menander a thousand degrees above him, that shall be the most excellent amongst all others. Menander shall be accus'd by one nam'd Cratinus, to be sufficiently addicted to play the plagiary in Authors that preceded him; but this Cratinus shall be one of those dangerous sons of Envy, of which there shall always be some, as long as there are persons of virtue: that is one of those malicious criticks, who seek not to instruct their age they live in, but only to injure those they see more esteem'd than themselves. Menander shall compose an hundred and nine Comedies, and shall be Victor only in eight; but posterity shall do him the justice to believe, that it was by reason of the factions of his Envyers. He shall be Disciple to Theophrastus, a great friend to Demetrius Phalereus, and so esteem'd by the Kings of Ægypt and Macedonia, that they shall send a Fleet and Ambassadors to him, to oblige him to come to them. But, in fine, being yet in the flower of his age, he shall be drown'd as he is swimming in the Port of Piræus.

Look upon him that I shew thee next; he shall be named Philemon, and shall overcome Menander several times, rather through good fortune than merit, though there will be handsome fancies in several places of his Works: but Menander speaking to him of his victories, shall smilingly say to him, Art not thou asham'd to have overcome me? He is destinated to die with laughter, at the sight of some uncouth spectacle; he shall live fourscore and seventeen years, and shall make fourscore and ten Comedies.

He that thou seest upon that great Theater, and whom such a croud of people attentively listen to, is Aristophanes; he shall be of low birth, and yet of great reputation, and taking to himself a middle way between the excessive licentiousness of antient Comedy, and the regularity of the New, he shall please the generality of people. His style shall be sharp, subtle, elegant, full of ingenious fetches and railleries; but he shall not scruple to offend the fancy of the virtuous sort of people, so that he may but give divertisement to the multitude. He shall be extraordinarily bold in speaking

againſt all the World; inſomuch that he ſhall make a Comedy againſt a Tribune of the people wherein he ſhall ſpeak ſo ſharply, that no Comedian will venture to act that part; whereupon being led by his Satyrical inclination, he ſhall act it himſelf, and for that reaſon be condemned to pay a great Fine. That which ſhall blot the reputation of Ariſtophanes, is, that he ſhall be an enemy to Socrates, and make a Comedy againſt him; but on the other ſide, he ſhall have the honor to have his Epitaph made by a great Philoſopher, after a glorious manner; which ſhall ſerve one day for a document to the World, that all great men are not always of the ſame judgement, ſince another great Author ſpeaking of Ariſtophanes, ſhall ſay that in his works the Tragick and Comick ſtyle are confounded together, the high and the low, the ſublime and the familiar, very many ſuperfluous words, cold railleries, and impudence diffus'd throughout. He that thou ſeeſt next is Lycophron, an Author famous for his obſcurity. He ſhall be of the number of thoſe ſeven Tragick Poets, who ſhall compoſe the Pleiades, and he ſhall be ingeniouſly compar'd to a certain obſcure Star, which is in that conſtellation. He ſhall be born in the City of Chalcis in Eubœa, and ſhall be ſlain with the ſhot of an arrow.

Now take notice of that man who goes forth of a Temple, and ſeems to be in amazement; 'tis Callimachus the Cyrenian, who ſhall make Elegies, Epigrams, and other Works, with ſufficient approbation. He ſhall make one among the reſt that ſhall live a long time, of which I will tell thee the ſubject, to the end thou mayſt underſtand, Poets may ſometimes have boldneſs which lead them out of the common road, provided they be manag'd with judgement. Berenice, Queen of Ægypt, ſeeing Ptolomy her Husband going to the War, ſhall devote her hair, which ſhall be very graceful, to Venus, in caſe he return victorious: after which, this Prince coming home Conqueror, Berenice ſhall cut off her hair, and carry it her ſelf to the Temple of Venus, where it ſhall not be found the next morning. A famous Aſtrologer who ſhall deſire to court that Queen, ſhall profeſs that he ſaw it in the Heavens, and that it makes a new Conſtellation there. And indeed having really diſcover'd one that he had never ſeen till then, it ſhall for ever after be call'd, The hair of Berenice: This is the ſubject of Callimachus's Poem, wherein making uſe of the boldneſs permitted to great Poets, he ſhall introduce the hair of Berenice ſpeaking, to the end it may appear, there is nothing which an excellent Poet cannot make to ſpeak becommingly.

The next thou ſeeſt is Aratus, who ſhall be born in the City of Soli in Silicia; he ſhall not be very learn'd in Aſtrologie, and ſhall nevertheleſs make a very handſome Poem concerning the Stars and their courſes: He ſhall alſo compoſe another very elegant work, and poſterity ſhall judge of it by the merit of thoſe who ſhall tranſlate it; for the firſt ſhall be the Father of Latine Eloquence, who ſhall be named Cicero; the ſecond ſhall be a Prince of high accompliſhments, who ſhall be call'd Germanicus; the third a very amorous Poet, whoſe name ſhall be Ovid; and the fourth a man of principal quality call'd Ruffus Avienus; ſo that I aſſure thee no other work ſhall ever light upon more noble Interpreters.

Then turn thine eyes upon the admirable Theocritus; he ſhall be born in Syracuſe, and ſhall make Elegies, which ſhall acquire him immortal glory; he ſhall ſpeak ill of Hiero, the Tyrant of his Countrey, who ſhall pardon him the firſt time; but as Poets do not eaſily hold their peace, the ſecond time the Tyrant ſhall put him to death, and there ſhall remain no more of Theocritus but his Works, and his fair reputation.

He that thou ſeeſt next him, is Moſchus, a Poet of the ſame ſtrain, who ſhall have a gallant and delicate wit. He ſhall make an Idyllium upon Runaway Cupid, which ſhall be imitated in all Languages (ſo gallant ſhall the invention of it ſeem) and happily expreſs'd in few Verſes.

Thoſe two Men whom thou ſeeſt together, are the two Parthenii, of whoſe Writings nothing ſhall remain, and of whom I ſhall ſpeak by and by, when I come to ſpeak of Virgil and Ovid.

Laſtly (Heſiode) behold the laſt famous Poet among the Greeks; he ſhall be of Cilicia, of the City of Anazarba; he ſhall be called Oppian, and ſhall be ſon of one of the principal Citizens, named Ageſilaus, who after having govern'd a long time, ſhall addict himſelf entirely to Philoſophy, to the end to inſtruct his Son therein The Emperor Severus paſſing through this place, neither Oppian nor Ageſilaus, ſhall go to ſalute him; which the Emperor taking ill, ſhall baniſh them into an Iſland almoſt deſart at that time, which in the revolution of ages ſhall be inhabited, by people very courageous, and of a moſt noble race. During this exile, Oppian ſhall compoſe five Books concerning Fiſhing, and ſix concerning Hunting; he ſhall dedicate his Work to Antoninus, ſon of Severus, who not only ſhall recall him from exile, but being charm'd with his Verſes, ſhall recompence each of them with a piece of Gold; whereupon thenceforth they ſhall be called, The Golden Verſes of Oppian. Beſides that, they ſhall be worthy of that Title, only in reſpect of their Elegance. After this, he ſhall return into his own Countrey, and die there at the age of thirty years; his Citizens ſhall erect a Statue to him, and inſcribe an Epitaph upon his Tomb, which ſhall intimate, that the gods caus'd his death out of envy; becauſe, if he had liv'd long, he would have ſurpaſs'd all mortals.

Thus Heſiode, thou ſeeſt who ſhall be thy ſucceſſors in Greece; but if Poetry die amongſt the Greeks, 'tis only to revive again among the Romans, who ſhall learn it of them. So that thou ſhalt not be leſs the Father of the Latine, than of the Greek Poetry, and in what place ſoever Verſes ſhall be made, the name of Heſiode ſhall be in eſteem. No doubt thou art willing to have me tell thee, whether the Latine Poetry ſhall be able to ſurpaſs the Greek, which queſtion ſhall be the ſubject of very great diſpute. Yet let it ſuffice thee to know, that the Romans ſhall take Poetry from the Greeks, and that the moſt curious Criticks amongſt them, ſhall believe they do much, when they ſhall equal the Poets of their own Nation, to thoſe of the Greeks. They ſhall even oftentimes prefer them before them; becauſe 'tis the cuſtom of all men to be prejudic'd againſt their own age; and a very great Conqueror ſhall one day call a Poet, who ſhall be named Terence, but a half-Menander, though that Terence muſt be one of the moſt perfect Latine Poets. However, I will tell thee, that the Greeks and the Romans ſhall on either either side have their peculiar excellencies and defenders. The Greeks shall without doubt have the glory of invention, and withal a certain kind of greater sprightlineſs and pleaſantneſs, and be more proper for divertiſement. But otherwiſe, they ſhall be leſs exact, more diffuſe and prolix, more ſubject to ſpeak things unprofitable, attributing leſs to Art than to Nature. The Romans ſhall render Poetry more ſolid and more judicious, their Works ſhall have more Rule and Art, and conſequently ſome kind of leſs licentiouſneſs: and there ſhall come another time, wherein Poetry being become French, ſhall ſeem, in growing old, to have taken yet more ſeverity, than the Greek or the Latine; for it ſhall indulge fewer things to it ſelf than the reſt; and withal, it ſhall very rarely have any of their graces and elegancies. In the mean time, to tell thee concerning Latine Poetry in particular, and to let thee ſee that famous Poetick Genealogie, which I have promiſed thee, I muſt ——

I beſeech you (ſaid Plotina then to Amilcar) ſuffer me to interrupt your reading, to tell you that I die with deſire, not only that the Latine Poets may ſurpaſs the Greek in the excellency of their Verſes, but likewiſe in riches and good fortune; for I have ſo much pitty to ſee ſome of thoſe great Poets poor, that I ſhould be infinitely troubled, that that ſhould one day be reproacht to the Romans, which I reproach to the Greeks. And moreover, to ſpeak truth, I know not how it ſhould come to paſs, that many perſons will willingly take upon them an employment of ſo little profit. If you pleaſe to conſider (anſwer'd Herminius) how many people go to the War with little profit, you will not wonder at the number of thoſe that addict themſelves to make Verſes? although Poetry very rarely improves the fortunes, but is rather prejudicial to them; for this employment is of leſs danger, and greater pleaſure. You have reaſon (reply'd Amilcar) and beſides, the greateſt part of thoſe that addict themſelves to make Verſes, are born Poets, and cannot hinder themſelves from being ſuch. But yet I would know (ſaid Plotina) why Poverty always follows Poetry: The reaſon is (anſwer'd Amilcar) becauſe great men are either ignorant or covetous. For my part (added Plotina) I look upon it as a juſt puniſhment inflicted by the gods, for that the moſt part of Poets, as I have heard, oftentimes give a thouſand praiſes to people that deſerve them not; and for that they ſacrifice rather to Fortune, than to Virtue. But however, I conceive it fit to leave you to continue your ſtory. Accordingly Amilcar reſum'd the place where he ſtopt. But it is time to make thee change thy object.

Therefore lift up thine eyes and ſee proud Italy (ſuch as ſhe ſhall be one day, when ſhe comes to be Miſtreſs of the World) in the ſame place where thou ſaweſt all Greece.

But, to arreſt thy ſight to one ſingle object, look upon that man with a ſevere countenance; 'tis Livius Andronicus, who ſhall write Tragedies, of which in time, nothing ſhall be left but ſome fragments, which ſhall give poſterity to know, that he had a kind of drineſs and rudeneſs in his Wit.

In the next place take notice of Ennius, and thou wilt obſerve by his aſpect, that he will one day become a gallant man, and a lover of joy. He ſhall be a Native of Tarentum; he ſhall imagine himſelf to have the ſoul of Homer: he ſhall write the Hiſtory of his own Country in Verſe, and making his own Epitaph himſelf, he ſhall forbid all perſons to lament him, becauſe he lives ſtill, and ſhall always live in the memory of men. Nevertheleſs his Works ſhall periſh, and nothing be left of them but ſome fragments, which ſhall evidence that he was nervous, and of good invention.

Then fix thy ſight upon that man, whoſe attire is plain, and whom thou ſeeſt employ'd in turning about an Engine, which ſerves to make Meal, thou wouldſt think he were able to make nothing worthy of immortality; yet he that thou ſeeſt, and who ſhall be called Plautus, ſhall write Comedies, which ſhall reſiſt the depredation of time. He ſhall be born in Umbria, of low parentage; at firſt he ſhall ſell his Comedies, afterwards he ſhall become a Merchant, and undo himſelf; and then poverty preſſing him very heavily, he ſhall ſerve in thoſe matters thou ſeeſt him employ'd about, But while he is at this Trade, he ſhall compoſe ſome of his Works, and it ſhall be ſaid one day of him, That if my companions and I were to ſpeak Latine, we ſhould ſpeak like Plautus; though this Elogium be more ſutable to Terence, whom thou ſhalt ſee by and by, whoſe ſtyle ſhall without doubt be more noble, and more pure. Plautus ſhall principally propoſe to his imitation, Epicharmus and Ariſtophanes, two Greek Poets, whom I ſhew'd thee; his Comedies ſhall be full of Wit and pleaſant Conceits, but not very modeſt. Indeed he ſhall better repreſent ſlaves, courtiſans, and thoſe of the baſer ſort of people, than honeſt perſons; like ſome Painters, whoſe odd fancy is better at repreſenting poor cripled and deformed ſoldiers, than Princes and Heroes. In proceſs of time he ſhall ſeem ſomething obſcure, becauſe he ſhall love to take the liberty of making extraordinary words, and employing thoſe which are peculiar, to the eloquence of the vulgar. But however, there ſhall be handſome ſtrains in his Works, and raillery ſhall be neatly couch'd in them.

Look next upon Statius Cæcilius, a Gaul, he ſhall have the glory to be preferr'd by many, above all other Authors of the Theater; he ſhall be a great friend to Ennius, and ſo highly reſpected by Terence, that he ſhall compoſe nothing but what he firſt expoſes to his cenſure. Nevertheleſs, time ſhall not reſpect his Works; for there ſhall ſcarce any thing of time ſurvive.

As for Accius Pacuvius whom thou ſeeſt there, there are not things enough to tell thee of him, to detain thy ſight longer upon him.

But 'tis not ſo with that African whom I ſhew thee, for he merits to have all thy attention; 'tis that Terence I but now mention'd; he ſhall be born at Carthage, and bred up a ſlave at Rome, by Terentius Lucanus a Senator, who ſhall cauſe him to be educated with very much care, and ſet him at liberty when he comes beyond the years of Childhood. Terence ſhall take the famous Menander for his pattern, as Plautus took Epicharmus and Ariſtophanes for his. He ſhall have a particular amity with all perſons of eminent quality in Rome, eſpecially with an illuſtrious man, named Scipio, and another called Lelius, who ſhall alſo aſſiſt him to compoſe his handſome Comedies; for they ſhall not be like thoſe people of quality, who conceive ignorance beſt becomes perſons of condition, and that it is either ſhameful or unprofitable to be learned. There ſhall be nothing ſo pure, noble and delicate; as his Writings; nothing that can better expreſs the manners and genius of perſons of all ſorts. His Comedies ſhall ſeem better at the hundredth time's reading, than at the firſt; and they ſhall be the delight of all thoſe that have an exquiſite guſt; yet only ſix of them ſhall be tranſmitted to poſterity, which alſo ſhall be for the moſt part imitated from Menander, who ſhall be his great Original; nevertheleſs, they ſhall not favour of the conſtraint or lowneſs of imitators, but they ſhall be as ſo many Maſter-pieces. He ſhall dye with ſorrow, as he returns from Greece to Rome, for having loſt by ſhipwrack, an hundred and eight Comedies which he had made, and ſome incomparable Satyrs.

He that thou ſeeſt next, is Caius Lucilius, who ſhall be a perſon of very great honeſty; and ſo it ſhall be out of a ſentiment of Virtue, that he will compoſe Satyrs. There ſhall be ſomething extreamly divertiſing in his Writings, but much inequality ſhall always attend them. 'Tis true, his defects ſhall not be long reproacht to him; for his works ſhall periſh, as well as thoſe of Turpilius and Africanus, two Comick Poets, whom thou mayſt ſee ſtanding on his right hand.

But the ſame fate ſhall not attend Lucretius: Look upon him as a Poet of an admirable genius, yet he ſhall have ſomething of rudeneſs and impoliteneſs in ſeveral places: but the fault of the age he ſhall live in, and the quality of his argument, ſhall be the cauſe of it. In ſome excellent places, and in his poetical digreſſions, it ſhall be as much as the greateſt Poet of the world ſhall be able to do to ſurpaſs him. He ſhall die mad, by occaſion of being too much beloved; for a Miſtreſs whom he ſhall love, thinking her ſelf not ſufficiently loved by him, ſhall give him a water to drink, which ſhall cauſe his death, in ſtead of augmenting his love.

In the next place take notice of Lucius Pompeius, who ſhall invent a new ſort of Comedies, called Atellane, ſee alſo near him a man that has a cheerful and ſufficiently ridiculous countenance, 'tis Laberius the Author of the Mimicks, that is, of a kind of ſportful Comedy, ſet forth in geſtures and poſtures.

See then a man of quality, named Quintus Catulus, he ſhall make two Epigrams, which ſhall paſs happily to the latter ages, though all his other Verſes periſh, and there ſhall be one of thoſe Epigrams, which ſhall one day give occaſion to the compoſition of ſeveral little works, which ſhall bear the title of The fair Houſe-wife.

After him, behold ſeveral mean Poets in a crowd, and amongſt the reſt Publius Syrus a ſlave, freed for his Wits ſake, who ſhall ſurpaſs all others in the Mimicks, and Laberius himſelf that invented them: but I haſten to ſhew thee the famous Catullus.

Obſerve him therefore as one of the moſt gallant and elegant Latine Poets; but ſee near him with the fair Lesbia his Miſtreſs, who ſhall be reputed to aſſiſt him in the compoſition of his Verſes.

Catullus ſhall be born at Verona, and be univerſally eſteemed; his Epigrams ſhall be divine, although they be not always piquant, as thoſe of Martial, whom thou ſhalt ſee by and by, but they ſhall have an admirable gracefulneſs, both for the manner and for the expreſſions. He ſhall look upon Callimachus as one of his originals, and ſhall tranſlate that work concerning Berenice's hair which I told thee of: In brief, his Epigrams ſhall be of an extream ſweet ſtrain, and of ſo peculiar a gallantry and politeneſs, that none ſhall be able to equal him. He ſhall make ſeveral againſt the chief man of his times, and the maſter of his Countrey, under the name of Mamuna, but that great man ſhall not revenge himſelf, but favor him as formerly, becauſe he ſhall have more eſteem for his works, than indignation againſt his perſon, he ſhall die at thirty years of age, but his glory ſhall be out of the reach of Fate.

Now redouble thy attention Heſiode, for I am going to ſhew thee the greateſt and moſt excellent of Latine Poets. Doſt thou not perceive a houſe ſufficiently ruſtical, before the door of which are all conveniences requiſite for the making of earthen veſſels? and doſt thou not ſee at a little diſtance from thence, a great Poplar, which ſurpaſſes all thoſe round about it; 'tis the birth-place of the great Virgil, whom thou mayſt ſee muſing along a meadow; as he ſhall do one day when he ſhall compoſe ſome of his Eclogues. He ſhall be the Son of a Potter, near a City that ſhall be called Mantua; his Mother ſhall dream that ſhe ſhall bring forth a Lawrel, which ſhe ſhall ſee grow to infinity; being delivered, ſhe ſhall plant a ſprig of poplar according to the cuſtom, which ſhall in a little time become a great Tree, ſurpaſſing all thoſe of the Countrey, and which afterwards ſhall be lookt upon by the people with veneration, and named Virgil's tree. This excellent man ſhall addict himſelf to the ſtudy of Natural Philoſophy, the Mathematicks, and Phyſick, which he ſhall chooſe for his profeſſion, and wherein he ſhall excell. Afterwards by his great worth, he ſhall acquire the friendſhip of a great Emperor, named Auguſtus, and of his Favorite, the famous Mecænas, our love and delight. He ſhall never offend any perſon, and never ſhew the leaſt token of vanity, though Poets in general will be ſufficiently ſubject to this defect. He ſhall have modeſty in perfection; and in brief, ſhall be a real honeſt perſon, as well amiable for his virtue, and for his manners, as admirable for his wit. He ſhall compoſe Eclogues in imitation of Theocritus, which ſhall be infinitely charming; thou ſhalt have the ſame glory of being imitated by him, when he ſhall compoſe a work, which he ſhall intitle Georgicks; and which amongſt the great Maſters, ſhall paſs for his Maſterpiece: it being certain, that in reſpect of art and verity, it ſhall tranſcend all other things whatſoever; though very many perſons, and thoſe judicious too, ſhall wiſh rather to have been authors of his Eclogues, or ſome book of his Æneis, for 'tis indeed a great glory, to be exact and accompliſht throughout; but 'tis a greater in Poetry to effect, to charm, and to raviſh. He ſhall imitate Homer in his Æneis, and the advantage ſhall be attributed to him, for having far ſurpaſſed him, as well as Theocritus, in the things wherein he ſhall have imitated him. But though Homer be leſs regular than Virgil shall be, yet he shall not fail to have his graces; for he shall be more divertising and less severe, and shall abound much in different styles, of which Virgil shall be wholly unfurnished. But in brief, it shall be said to the praise of Virgil, That never man had with an extream handsome genius, and great stock of wit, so excellent a judgement, nor knew so perfectly as he, how far 'tis fit to go in Poetry, and where to stop. But in the middle of his glory he shall dye at Brundusium, whither he shall go to salute Augustus at his return from the East. At his death he shall command his Æneis to be burnt, not being able to resolve to leave it imperfect to posterity; but Tucca and Varus, his friends, assuring him that Augustus will never permit it, he shall consent that it be preserved, on condition that it be published according as he shall leave it, without changing any thing in it, not even so much as some Verses, which shall be but half made. But to render him as glorious after his death, as he shall be during his life, Augustus shall make excellent Verses against that unjust clause of his Testament. Judge then Hesiode, what glory attends thee, being able one day to count Augustus and Virgil amongst thy descendents.

But this is not all yet; for behold him that appears there, 'tis Horace, whose name shall seem to be fatal to extraordinary men; he that thou seest shall be, without scruple, the most gallant of all the Latine Poets; his Father shall be a native of a village of Apulia, and a Son of a freed man, but for that he shall have a mind above his condition, he shall educate his son with as much care, as Princes ought to bring up their own Children. Horace shall have a particular friendship with Mecænas, and likewise with Augustus, who desiring to make use of him for his Letters which he shall write to his friends, shall see himself refused by him without being offended Horace shall have as much wealth as he shall desire; and he shall say one day, to the glory of Mecænas, and his own, I have as much as I need, and if I d sired more, you would not refuse it me. Horace shall be sufficiently cholerick, he shall have a voluptuous soul, and be of the sect of Epicurus, which he shall disclaim at the end of his days, he shall love liberty above all things, and so shall pass his life absolutely free, and please himself chiefly in the Countrey, because there is greater freedome there than otherwhere. He shall make two sorts of works, his Odes which shall be perfectly divine, and his Satyrs, which shall be incomparable not to mention a discourse of competent length, concerning the art of Poetry, wherein shall be very excellent things. There shall be some Odes of Love, others of carowsing, and others perfectly grand and heroical, and all inimitable; so great freedome and facility of Wit shall be seen in them, happy boldness, gallant conceits, and above all, a choise of noble and natural expressions, which cannot be too highly valued. His works shall be throughout affecting, they shall surprise by their little constraint; for he shall pass from one subject to another, without scrupling to forsake any, where it seems good to him, and to go where he shall not be expected. As for his Satyrs, they shall contain the most exquisite and delicate morality, mingled with the most subtile and real raillery, and never shall any other so pleasantly deride vices, as he; nor so ingeniously render them ridiculous. Yet it shall be less impossible (if I may so speak) to imitate him in his Satyrs than in his Odes. But to conclude, he shall die at the age of fifty seven years, after having acquired a glory which nothing can destroy.

After him, cast thy eyes upon Tibullus, a Roman Knight, handsome, well made, and of a good port; he shall be rich and become poor; he shall have so amorous an inclination, that the multitude of his loves shall proceed less from his inconstancy, than from his inclination to love. He shall chiefly celebrate in his Verses, four of his Mistresses, Delia, Sulpitia, Neæra, and Nemesis. He shall have a particular amity with one of the eminentest persons of Rome; named Messala Corvinus, and shall dye in a voyage that he shall make with him, after having had the glory to be the first Author of the Latine Elegy. The style of his Verses shall be amorous, soft, easie, clear, neat, and of extream sweetness and elegancy.

In the next place behold Propertius, an other Roman Knight, he shall imitate Callimachus, Mimnermus, and Philetas, whom I shewed thee before. Behold also near him, the fair Cynthia his Mistress, who shall sometimes help him to make Verses, as Lesbia shall Catullus. His Elegies shall be so handsome, that though the best Judges shall prefer Tibullus before him, yet others shall be of the contrary opinion. There shall be more wit, more conceits, and more amorous sentences in his Verses, but less passion, facility, and elegance.

Dost thou not see at the right hand of Propertius another Poet? 'tis Varus, who shall live at the same time. Horace, and all the rest of the same profession, shall celebrate him as a great Epique Poet, but there shall remain nothing of his but twelve or thirteen verses; so that one day his writings shall not be known, but by the commendations of others.

But it is time to shew thee the famous Ovid, a Roman Knight; dost thou not also see near him a very comely person? 'tis his wife, who shall be nam'd Perilla, and taught by him to make Verses. He shall be born at Sulmo, the Metropolis of the Peligni in Italy, near the Marsi, he shall be at first designed by his father to the Law, and shall succeed well in it; but having all his life had a great inclination for Poetry, he shall renounce that profession, and give himself wholly to the other. He shall be a particular friend to those of the highest quality in Rome, and of very delightful conversation. He shall marry thrice; he shall divorce his two first Wives, and keep the third, which thou seest near him. He shall be banished by Augustus, for having made love to the Princess Julia his daughter, whose deportment shall be very disorderly; some shall believe the cause to have been for being amorous of Livia, wife of that Emperor; but the true reason shall be so concealed, that many different and improbable conjectures shall be made of it. The place of his exile shall be Pontus, a Province of Asia, near the Getes and the Sarmatians. He shall compose many works, the greatest of all which shall be his Metamorphosis, which he shall imitate from the Greek of Parthenius, of the Island of Chios, as to the design only; for he shall much more amplify them; his stile

ſhall have much wit, facility, and copiouſneſs, but more of native Ornament than Art. For the moſt part he ſhall abandon himſelf to his own genius, and not always allow himſelf the leiſure to chooſe his conceits and expreſſions; but yet he ſhall be ſo extreamly amorous, ſo paſſionate, and full of wit, that he ſhall be accounted admirable throughout all Ages. His Books of the Art of Loving, and the Remedies of Love, ſhall get him a great reputation. But it may be ſaid, the Flower of Latine Poetry ſhall dye with him, for his ſucceſſors endeavoring to imitate his Wit, his copiouſneſs, his conceits and ſubtile fancies, ſhall leave the good way, and wander, ſo that inſenſibly, after his days, the Latine Poetry ſhall begin to loſe that ſweetneſs and natural Majeſty, which during ſo long time, rendered it admirable.

For behold that Spaniard with the fierce countenance thou ſeeſt appear there; 'tis Seneca the Tragedian; he ſhall have much wit, but he ſhall favor of the tumidneſs of his Nation: he ſhall be born at Corduba, and in proceſs of time, ſome ſhall attribute part of his Works to a Philoſopher of the ſame name, whoſe mind ſhall be of the ſame temper with his.

In the next place, behold Lucan, who ſhall be born in the ſame City; he ſhall have many admirers, but whoſe Work, to ſpeak equitably, ſhall not be perfectly admirable ſaving in its pieces. He ſhall be juſtly accuſed for not making a concluſion, and for flying always ſo high, that he cannot be followed without wearineſs. He ſhall one day have a Tranſlator among the Gaules, who ſhall get much glory by his traduction. His wife Pella Argentaria, ſhall make Verſes as well as he, but at length an Emperor called Nero, ſhall put him to death, not ſo much for having conſpired againſt the State, as to deliver himſelf from a Rival in Poetry whoſe Works ſhall be better received by the people than his.

After him, ſee an imitator of Virgil, called Statius; and near him his wife Claudia, who ſhall be illuſtrious for her wit; ſhe ſhall make Verſes too, as well as that of Lucan. This Poet ſhall fall much ſhort of Virgil, by endeavoring to ſurpaſs him. In brief, he ſhall be great and ſublime, but moſt often inflated and obſcure.

Then conſider Silius Italicus, a Spanyard alſo ſo great an admirer of Virgil, that he ſhall reverence his Tomb. He ſhall write a Poem of Seventeen Books, concerning the War of the Carthaginians againſt the Romans; he ſhall be Conſul of Rome, the year wherein the cruel Nero ſhall be ſlain.

So likewiſe Valerius Flaccus, who ſhall write of the Argonautes: but do not ſtay upon this ſight; for though theſe muſt be good Poets, yet they ſhall not be of the ſame rank with the others thou haſt ſeen.

But I am going to ſhew thee two that ſhall better deſerve to detain thy view; they are Juvenal and Martial; for though they are not to have all the excellency of the Age of Auguſtus, yet they ſhall have the advantage to be the firſt in the ſtyle they ſhall chooſe.

See therefore Juvenal, who appears firſt; his Satyrs ſhall be leſs mirthful and delicate than thoſe of Horace, but full of wit and life. Horace ſhall always laugh, and never be in choler; Juvenal ſhall frequently be inraged, and laugh more rarely. Theſe two ſorts of Satyrs ſhall divide the Wits, and there ſhall no doubt, be ſome very handſome things, and ſometimes alſo very pleaſant, in Juvenal. He ſhall live under Domitian, he ſhall be ſon of a Freed-man; but having in one of his Satyrs reflected upon one of the perſons in favor, he ſhall be ſent in Commiſſion at the Age of fourſcore years, to the fartheſt part of Ægypt, where he ſhall dye in a kind of exile.

But then behold Martial, who advances a famous Author of Epigrams, and who ſhall merit to be the firſt in his kind, Not but that the Epigrams of Catullus ſhall pleaſe more, becauſe they ſhall be Epigrams throughout (as one day a great Man amongſt the Gaules ſhall ſay) whereas thoſe of Martial ſhall not be ſo but at the end: but indeed they ſhall be in a manner of two differing kinds. Catullus ſhall be full of elegancy, delicacy, and the neat raillerie of the better ſort; Martial, on the other ſide, ſhall have a raillerie leſs polite, but quick, piquant, and ſubtle, and ſhall not want elegance in ſome places. That which ſhall be good in him ſhall be excellent, but there ſhall be ſeveral mean Epigrams amongſt others, and ſeveral which ſhall appear flat in remoter Ages, becauſe the difference of manners and cuſtom ſhall cauſe their agreeableneſs not to be comprehended. Martial ſhall be born in Spain; he ſhall be a very gallant Man; and ſhall live under an Emperor whoſe name ſhall be Domitian.

Next to him I muſt ſhew thee a Poet named Perſius, although he is to precede Juvenal, under the reign of Claudius. His Works ſhall have reſemblance with thoſe of that famous Author; they ſhall be very highly eſteemed of in his own days, but in more remote times he ſhall appear very obſcure to the moſt Learned, yet he ſhall have this glory; that a perſon of high quality, great courage, and excellent Wit, after having been dangerouſly wounded in War, in an occaſion wherein he ſhall ſignalize himſelf, having no other Book to divert him during his ſickneſs but this, ſhall tranſlate it admirably for his pleaſure, and make a Copy which ſhall far tranſcend the original, though he muſt alſo make ſome things of his own incomparably more handſome. But in brief, after Martial, Poetry ſhall reſemble nothing but old age, and decrepitude.

Yet there ſhall be under Theodoſius one Claudian, who ſhall have a handſome facility. There ſhall alſo be born in Gaul upon the bank of the Garoone, a Poet called Auſonius, who ſhall be Tutor to an Emperor, and afterwards Roman Conſul, and ſhall compoſe things full of Wit and Learning. But after all, it may be ſaid, that Latine Poetry ſhall dye together with the Language. 'Tis true, after this Language ſhall be no longer in uſe but among the Learned, there ſhall be Italian Poets in the Ages remote from that of Auguſtus, who ſhall cauſe Latine Poetry to flouriſh again miraculouſly. But ſince the multitude of Poets can never be found but amongſt the living Languages, I muſt ſhew thee in the ſame Country, as it were another Nation and another Scene for Poetry.

For my part (ſaid Plotina then) I am highly pleaſed with the Prediction of Calliope, and though I am ſufficiently glad to be living at preſent, yet I think I ſhould not be very ſorry to be in the days of Auguſtus, to ſee the Poets rich then, and great Lords worthy perſons. Being I am not certain what I ſhould be at that time, (anſwer'd Amilcar) 'tis as good to content my ſelf with being what I am, and proceed with my reading. Which he continued thus,

Behold now, O Heſiode, the ſame Italy again, but imagine to thy ſelf, that it has been over-run by an inundation of forreign Nations, that it has changed its government, manners, and language, that it has groaned for ſeveral ages under barbariſme and ignorance, that it is now beginning again to underſtand good literature, and to remember its antient politeneſs. Thou ſeeſt there the firſt Italian Poet, who ſhall one day be famous; but conſider him as a man, who ſhall chooſe a very difficult Subject to treat of in Verſe, and expreſs himſelf ſo obſcurely, that he ſhall ſcarce be underſtood by them of his own age. He ſhall be born in a City that ſhall be named Florence; he ſhall be known by the name of Dante, and have ſcarce any thing but Fiction in his Verſes.

But now turn thy eyes upon that pleaſant Valley, bounded by a great rock, at the foot of which is a famous Fountain, which alone gives riſe to a River, and which being ſix months high, and ſix months low, ſhall paſs for one of the wonders of Nature. See on the right hand of this lovely vally (in which are ſeen an hundred Rivulets of living water and inartificial channels) a little Meddow, wherein is a man who appears very ſad, and muſes profoundly; 'tis Petrarch, who ſhall be born in the Town of Arezzo, He ſhall love a fair and virtuous Virgin, whoſe name ſhall be Laura, and ſhall have a very handſome houſe in Valchiuſa; ſo ſhall the Valley thou ſeeſt, be one day called, becauſe 'tis encloſed almoſt on every ſide. 'Tis he that ſhall give a perfect example of conſtant and honeſt Love; He ſhall love Laura both living and dead, and he ſhall preſerve ſo much reſpect in his paſſion, that it ſhall be hard to conjecture, whether he were lov'd again or no, ſo full ſhall his Verſes be of diſcretion. Nevertheleſs, they ſhall be very amorous, and he ſhall compoſe more in lamenting the death of Laura, than in extolling her during her life. He ſhall love her one and twenty years with an equal ardour, and they ſhall both love with ſo great innocence, that the glory of their Love ſhall laſt, as long as that of Petrach's Verſes, who ſhall have the honor to be the firſt of his Nation, that underſtood to ſpeak handſomely of Love in Verſe. He ſhall be as deformed as his Miſtreſs ſhall be fair, but he ſhall have ſo handſome a Wit, a Heart ſo noble, and a Soul ſo virtuous, that he ſhall be eſteem'd by all the moſt conſiderable perſons of his time. Whereby he ſhall have many marks of honor during his life, and ſhall be crowned Poet with magnificence in the chief City of the World.

In the next place, behold Ferrara, a very famous City, and in the principal place of it a man who has an ingenious aſpect; 'tis the famous Ariſto, who ſhall make very handſome Comedies and Satyrs; but above all a great Poem, ſo full of different inventions, that though he ought to be accus'd for being unequall'd, yet he ſhall not fail to be admirable in a thouſand reſpects. For he ſhall have a certain kind of divertiſing variety, which ſhall charm his Readers. He ſhall have a Style eaſie, natural, and amorous, the negligence of which ſhall not hinder it's facility from being extreme delightful, and though regularity muſt ſometimes be wanting in him, yet he ſhall pleaſe almoſt perpetually. It were to be wiſh'd indeed, that he would retrench ſome places of his Works, which will not be modeſt enough, but there ſhall be ſeveral others, in which nothing ſhall be found wanting. His defects ſhall be his diffuſeneſs, and exceſs of fancy, and a certain negligence which ſhall hinder him from rejecting ſome of his conceits and inventions. But to conclude, he ſhall be excellent among the excellent of his own Nation.

But then turn thy view upon an illuſtrious and unfortunate perſon, lawful Heir of the glory of Homer and Virgil. He ſhall cauſe ſhame to the Princes of his own times; and he ſhall be the greateſt honour of Italy for Poetry. 'Tis the famous Taſſo I ſpeak of, the greateſt genius of his Nation, and one of the moſt judicious Poets of the World. Almoſt in his childhood he ſhall make an heroick Poem, extremely ingenious, and begin to give the World an eſſay of his abilities, for great Poetry. Afterwards he ſhall make another, the Fable of which ſhall be wonderful, and yet probable, and the ſtyles of it various, agreeable, and natural; the texture of his Works ſhall have no confuſion, he ſhall relate things handſomely, he ſhall excite compaſſion and admiration, he ſhall be very amorous in ſeveral places, and ſhall ſometimes expreſs very much in few Words, though the language in which he is to write, be not ſo proper for that purpoſe as the Latine. He ſhall firſt begin to introduce Shepheards upon the Theater, and ſhall make a Paſtoral Comedy, which ſhall be the pattern of all others, and a Maſter-piece which many ſhall imitate, but none ever equal: he ſhall alſo make ſeveral other commendable Works; but it ſufficeth to tell thee only of the moſt famous. Taſſo ſhall be born in a Town near a very fair City, which ſhall be called Naples, at that time; yet it ſhall one day befall him as it did Homer, that ſeveral places ſhall challenge to themſelves the honor of his birth: he ſhall be of a race ſo illuſtrious, that his Anceſtors ſhall have been Lords of a conſiderable City; but his family being ruin'd, his Father, whoſe name ſhall be Bernardo Taſſo, ſhall deſire to addict him to employments of profit, and hinder him from following Poetry, though himſelf alſo ſhould have a good faculty in Verſe. But in brief, through many adventures Taſſo ſhall go to Rome, afterwards to Ferrara, France, Mantua, and return back into his own Countrey, and then again into Ferrara; but into what place ſoever he goes, he ſhall find glory and poverty. Fortune ſhall begin to perſecute him in Ferrara; Love ſhall be the principal cauſe of all his unhappineſſes; for he ſhall be enamour'd on the Siſter of his Maſter, and render the name of Leonora, famous by his paſſion and his Verſe. Yet he ſhall conceal his Love as long as he is able, and amongſt three Women of the ſame name endeavour to diſguiſe the truth. He ſhall alſo fight, with heroical courage, againſt a man that ſhall have diſcover'd ſomething of it; but at length he ſhall forſake Ferrara, and ſpend ſeveral years wandring and roaming about, without any ſubſiſtence. He ſhall be in priſon, and have a fear to be poiſon'd; and at length ſee himſelf ſo unhappy, and overwhelmed with misfortunes, that the very greatneſs of his mind ſhall ſerve ſerve to render him more miſerable, ſince it ſhall be one of the cauſes of the loſs of his reaſon. He ſhall not have ſo much happineſs as to be ignorant of his folly, and he ſhall have intervals of Reaſon, which ſhall let him know, that he is the moſt unhappy of all men: however, he ſhall ſee his Virtue reſpected, even by a Captain of Thieves, who having beſieg'd a place without knowing of his being there, ſhall change his reſolution as ſoon as he knows it, and deprive himſelf of a great booty, only for his ſake; thus he ſhall be the object of all the World's admiration. In the mean time, the injuſtice of the great ones of his times, ſhall be deteſted by all honeſt people of the following ages, who ſhall judge it ſtrange, that the greateſt Wit of the World, and moſt illuſtrious perſon of his age, ſhould live without being Maſter of ſo much as a poor Cottage of his own, to hide his unhappineſs, although he has been univerſally eſteem'd, and liv'd in ſeveral of the greateſt Courts of Europe. But this ſhall not be the laſt time, that this kind of injuſtice ſhall be ſeen amongſt Grandees, who, for the moſt part, are totally ignorant of the art of rewarding Virtue. But in fine, Taſſo after having endur'd a thouſand misfortunes, and ſear'd all thoſe that might poſſibly befall him, and ſo conſequently undergone them, ſhall dye when he ſhall be ready to be crowned Poet at Rome, as Petrarch ſhall have been; but as for his glory, it ſhall never dye, and his Amynta ſhall come in time to be tranſlated into the French, Spaniſh, Engliſh, High and Low German Languages.

But having now ſhewn thee Dante, Petrarch, Arioſto and Taſſo, behold alſo Bembo, Caro, and Guarini; the firſt ſhall have tn admirable purity of ſtyle; the ſecond a rare faculty of conceit in all his Verſes; and the third ſhall have ſo much wit, that he ſhall be blam'd for it as an imperfection.

After theſe, behold four Poets, whoſe Poetry, though wholly of a different kind, ſhall deſerve all the praiſe that can be given to things of that nature: namely, le Bernia, le Maure, le Molza, and le Caporale.

Next them, ſee there Taſſone, who by a Poem ingeniouſly pleaſant, ſhall merit high applauſe.

Behold alſo Marini, who with his multitude of Writings, ſhall aſtoniſh his Readers. See, in the next place, one Fulvio Teſti, whoſe magnificence and purity ſhall have an air, both great and natural together, and who ſhall in a manner, revive the genius and ſtyle of Horace.

See likewiſe one Gratiani, who, by a great Poem, ſhall acquire much honor.

And then ſee ſeveral Italian Poets in a croud, which I do not name to thee, becauſe I am impatiently deſirous to ſhew thee a lovely Countrey, where my Companions and I, after having gone almoſt round the World, ſhall one day fix our reſidence.

'Tis France, Heſiode, I tell thee of; conſider it as a place which muſt be our new Sanctuary.

But to let thee ſee the progreſs, Poetry ſhall make there, behold a man whoſe aſpect is ſufficiently uncouth, and his attire extraordinary; he ſhall be nam'd John de Meun, and ſhall compoſe a Work which ſhall bear a great vogue a long time; but he ſhall be rather inſpir'd by his own capricious humour than by us.

Doſt thou not ſee in the next place a Poet of quality? he ſhall live under a King that ſhall love the Muſes, and who ſhall make four Verſes upon the Tomb of the fair Laura, Petrarch's Miſtreſs. This Poet ſhall be named Melin de Saint Gelais; his aſpect ſhall be ſweet, ſimple, lively; and his profeſſion ſhall oblige him to a particular modeſty. Yet his humour ſhall be naturally inclin'd to a kind of raillery not very ſcrupulous: he ſhall have an ingenious and quick mind, and ſo near a ſubtilty that way, that it ſhall not be poſſible to be foreſeen, and oftentimes it ſhall not be known what he aims at, till he has done ſpeaking.

Then behold Marat with a grave countenance; no doubt thou wouldſt take him for a perſon that were not fit for any thing but to teach morality. Nevertheleſs, no wit ſhall ever be more ſportful than his. There ſhall be always good ſenſe in his moſt fooliſh raillery, and pleaſant paſſages in his moſt grave diſcourſes. He ſhall be entertain'd in the ſervice of the King, under whom Melin ſhall live. His ſtyle ſhall be ſprightly, caſie, natural, and divertiſing. This Poet ſhall have the honor to be imitated by all Poets that would be pleaſant; and yet be always inimitable.

In the next place, behold the Prince of the French Poets; he ſhall be a goodly perſon of a handſome ſtature and aſpect; he ſhall be call'd Ronſard; his deſcent ſhall be noble; he ſhall be highly eſteem'd, and deſerve it, in his own days; for he ſhall have a very great genius. He ſhall alſo be ſufficiently learned; but being he ſhall be the firſt in France, that ſhall undertake to make handſome Verſes, he ſhall not be able to give his Works the perfection neceſſary to aſſure him laſting praiſes. However, it ſhall always be known by ſome of his Hymns, that nature has been very liberal to him, and that he merited his reputation. His fortune ſhall not be bad, and he ſhall dye ſuperior to poverty.

But now behold Belleau, who ſhall not be without merit; he ſhall be one of the moſt eminent of ſeven Poets of the ſame knot, who ſhall be called the Pleiades, after the example of thoſe among the Greeks. It ſhall be ſaid of him, that he built himſelf a Tomb of precious ſtones, becauſe in imitation of a Greek Poet, he ſhall write upon that ſubject. He ſhall one day tranſlate the Odes of Anacreon, but he ſhall deprive them of a great part of their graces.

But if I pleaſe (interrupted Anacreon ſmiling) I can ſpoil the truth of Calliopes's prediction; for I need only burn all my Odes, to hinder that pretended Belleau from tranſlating them to their diſadvantage. By no means (anſwer'd Amilcar) for there was never any Poet that ſacrific'd a handſome compoſition after he had made it. Since 'tis ſo (reply'd he) proceed then to read, and let him tranſlate me as he pleaſes. And accordingly, Amilcar went on in this manner.

See next a Poet of quality; he ſhall be named Bellay; he ſhall compoſe very lofty and elegant Verſes, and eſpecially Sonnets upon the ſubject of Rome, which ſhall give him much reputation in his days:

After him, behold Jodelle, Cretin, Paſſerat, Olivier, and de Magny; all theſe Poets ſhall be ſufficiently eſteem'd during their lives: but their Works ſavoring of the infancy of the French Poetry, ought not to be nam'd to thee.

Behold,

Behold, next, the French Poet that ſhall make Tragedies with any reputation: his name ſhall be Garnier, and he ſhall be of a conſiderable lineage.

But doſt thou ſee there a Poet with a very agreeable aſpect? he ſhall be call'd Deſportes, and ſhall aſpire to be the moſt amorous of all the French Poets. Indeed he ſhall have a very ſweet and paſſionate ſtile in his time; he alſo ſhall have the happineſs to live in a Court, where Princes ſhall delight in ingenious Productions, and be inclin'd to magnificence. By which means he ſhall become ſufficiently rich, much eſteem'd by all the Grandees, and much in favour with Women of quality.

Then conſider a man of great Dignity in France; he ſhall be named Perron; he ſhall learn all the Sciences of himſelf; he ſhall be intereſſed in the moſt important affairs of Europe, and be highly eſteem'd. He ſhall have a great affection for Poetry, and notwithſtanding his great employments, ſhall not ceaſe to butie himſelf very frequently in making Verſes, but his multiplicity of affairs ſhall hinder him from compoſing any conſiderable number.

Behold, next, an excellent Poet, who ſhall live at the ſame time; his name ſhall be Bretaut; Fortune alſo ſhall be favourable to his merit: he ſhall be endued both with virtue and probity; his Verſes ſhall be full of Wit and Love, and there ſhall be ſome ſo excellent in his Works, that there ſhall never be any French Poet ſo famous, but would wiſh to have been the Author of them. He ſhall be of conſiderable degree in his Countrey; his aſpect ſhall be ſweet and agreeable, and ſhall be at that time, the moſt amorous Poet of France, though Deſportes, whom I ſhew'd thee, will diſpute that title with him: He ſhall be accus'd of not knowing when to make an end in ſome places, and to be ſomething harſh in ſome others. But, to conclude, he ſhall be good amongſt the good of his own times, and ſhall ſee none above him.

After him, look upon that man careleſly and unſutably attir'd: his name ſhall be Regnier; he ſhall be Nephew to Deſportes, and deſerve very much glory. He ſhall be the firſt that ſhall compoſe Satyrs in French; and though he caſt an eye upon ſome famous Originals amongſt thoſe that preceded him, yet himſelf ſhall be an Original in his time; his compoſitions ſhall be excellent, and the meaneſt of them ſhall always have life and quickneſs. He ſhall paint out vices to the life, and the vicious very pleaſantly; laſtly, he ſhall read in a peculiar way among the Poets of his age, in which thoſe that would follow him, ſhall frequently be ſubject to erre.

Conſider, next a Poet, whoſe genius ſhall be great, and ſtyle ſublime; he ſhall have both vigor and boldneſs, and ſhall deſerve to be tranſlated into Latine and Italian. His name ſhall be Du Bartas, and he ſhall affect only high arguments. But for that the French Language ſhall not as then have attain'd to all its perfection, his Works ſhall ſoon after ſeem to have ſomething antiquated in the ſtyle. After this, redouble thy attention, and behold with pleaſure a man who ſhall have the honor to have alter'd the Language of his Countrey, and brought French Poetry to ſuch perfection, that he ſhall be the pattern of all the eminent Poets that ſhall follow him, and be alledg'd as an authority by all thoſe of his own Nation. He ſhall be nam'd Malherbe, and ſhall be of a very honorable lineage, but ſo diſfavour'd by fortune, that he ſhall always be unhappy. 'Tis he that ſhall perfectly conceive the Idæa of excellent French Poetry, and find out the art of making the ſame Verſes both ſtately and natural, majeſtick and ſweet, harmonious and exact. He ſhall not appear to have more wit than another, but the handſomneſs of his expreſſions, ſhall advance him above all. Yet he ſhall have no delicate Soul in reſpect of Love, though there will be exquiſite wit in his Verſes. But in brief, he ſhall be univerſally acknowledg'd worthy of all the praiſes due to excellent Poetry, and ſo ſhall be generally extoll'd by all the World, though himſelf be deſign'd ſcarce ever to praiſe the Works of any.

Next, obſerve that black and ſwarthy man; he ſhall be named Theophile; his deſtiny ſhall not be happy; he ſhall come into the World with a great genius for Verſe; his fancy ſhall be quick and confident; and if his judgement could retain his impetuoſity, and correct the imperfections of his verſifying, he would be Author of admirable compoſitions; but this he ſhall not be able to do, and all the good inventions of his mind ſhall be like Gold in the Mine, which is ſeen always mingled with earth and duſt.

After him, behold Montfaron and De Lingendes, two Poets, who ſhall deſerve well: the firſt ſhall have a handſome faculty in his conceits and expreſſions, and the ſecond an amorous, and paſſionate ſtrain in his Verſes, which ſhall pleaſe all thoſe that have tender hearts.

But now prepare thy ſelf to ſee an Illuſtrious Protector of Poetry, who ſhall be one of the greateſt men of the World: Doſt thou ſee him that holds the Ocean fetter'd, whom victory waits upon, and glory accompanies? 'tis the famous Armand, who ſhall be renown'd in all hiſtories; his birth ſhall be very illuſtrious, the grandeur of his mind ſhall ſurpaſs the extent of all imagination; his heart ſhall be incomparably greater than his fortune, and yet his fortune ſhall be ſo high, that his reſolutions ſhall make the deſtiny of all Europe. He ſhall be faithful to his Maſter, dreadful to the enemies of his Countrey, Victor over all thoſe he ſhall encounter with, and the grand Protector of Virtue and the Muſes. I ſhall ſay nothing of his victories, nor of all his virtues; for it would require too much time; but thou ſhalt only know that that Heroe of the latter ages, in the midſt of his great affairs, and in the heat of War, which ſhall involve almoſt all the Univerſe, ſhall afford us a Sanctuary under him; and my Companions and I ſhall find a Mecænas in him, and almoſt the age of Auguſtus in the Court of France. For that he will not take much time for the Kings ſervice to employ in compoſing many Verſes, he will at leaſt take care for the protection of thoſe that ſhall; and by that means cauſe his pleaſures to be placed in the rank of his virtues. For he ſhall give ſo favourable reception to all perſons of worth, that he ſhall revive all Sciences and excellent Arts. Then ſhall Muſick, Architecture, Poetry, and eſpecially Comedies, reſume new luſtre; and even all handſome compoſitions made after his death, ſhall be look'd upon as caus'd by his influence,

Yet

Yet after him we shall have Protectors in France, and amongst others, there shall be a person in a principal office of State, who shall sometimes hear us favourably by the side of his Fountains. He shall have a very great capacity for all grand affairs, he shall dispatch the most difficult matters without enforcement, and perform most noble actions without vanity; he shall have a lively and piercing mind, and unparallell'd modesty, gravity, goodness, justice and probity; he shall never be false to his word, or his friends; whereby he shall be particularly reverenc'd by all persons that are endu'd with Virtue; and my companions and I will inspire all the Poets of his time, who shall not be few, with the desire of singing his glory. He that should go about to reckon up all the famous Works that shall be made from the time the great Armand shall have favour'd us to the end of that age, shall find the number almost infinite; for never shall there be seen so many great and sublime Heroick Poems, handsome Comedies, charming Eclogues, ingenious Stanza's, elegant Sonnets, agreeable Epigrams, pleasant Madrigals, and amorous Elegies.

But to do thee a considerable favour, behold that Woman who appears to thee; she hath, as thou seest, the resemblance of Pallas; and there is something so sweet, languishing, and passionate in her beauty, that it perfectly represents that charming air which Painters give to Venus. This Illustrious person shall be of so noble a descent, that she shall scarce see any but Royal Families above her own: But to speak only concerning her self, know that she shall come into the World with a more admirable mind than beauty; though as thou seest, she shall be Mistress of a thousand charms. She shall also have a generous goodness, that shall render her worthy of high commendations; but to omit so many other surprising qualities as Heaven shall confer upon her, know, she shall compose Elegies, so handsome, so full of passion, and so exactly accomplisht in all that is requir'd to the perfection of such compositions, that she shall surpass all those that preceded her, and all that shall attempt to follow her.

In the same times shall be sung a thousand exquisite Sonnets in France, which shall pleasantly comprise all the Morality of Love; and it shall be principally in this age, that a particular way of gallant and pleasant kind of Poetry shall be in use, wherein Love, Praises, and Raillery shall be mingled together: but that raillery shall be in the most delicate and ingenious manner: for there is a difference between causing divertisement, and causing laughter: Nevertheless there shall be several Poets, who shall confound the gallant and pleasant sort of Poetry with the Burlesque or Mocking, which the French shall receive from the Italians; although there is much difference in the way of composition of either. There shall likewise be several kinds of Burlesque Verses; the pleasantness of some of which shall consist in the inventions and conceits, and not in the style; Others shall not be truly Burlesque, saving in the expressions: and there shall be one sort so vulgar, mean, extravagant, and gross, and which shall make such unhandsome representations, that my companions and I shall almost eternally disown the Poets that shall be capable of it. Withal, there shall be a numerous Sect, who shall judge it fit to speak no otherwise than the people do, and to be pleasant with no other than vulgar conceits. Not but that 'tis possible to make Works of this kind with very much art, and I assure thee, some shall deserve to be commended and desir'd. But to speak reasonably, as there are few great Architects that attempt to build Palaces with Clay, so also few great Poets can design to make handsome compositions in a popular style. There shall also be other Burlesque Poets, who shall believe themselves sufficiently pleasant, provided they asperse the reputation or the Works of others, and who trusting to the malice of their Readers, shall not be so sollicitous, as to seek to detract with Art, so that without affecting any particular style, they shall sometimes rise high, and sometimes fall low, according as the necessity of their Rhime, or the wildness of their Fancy leads them. But as for gallant and pleasant Poetry, it shall have more affinity with that of the Greeks, than of the Latins; it shall be noble, natural, easie, and agreeable; it shall sometime, deride innocently, it shall commend without much exaggeration, it shall reprove sometimes without sharpness, and shall be ingeniously sportful and recreative. It shall sometimes be soft and compassionate, and sometimes sprightly and cheerful; it shall likewise admit some small glances of Morality, delicately drawn; it shall sometimes be full of agreeable inventions, and ingenious fictions; Love and Wit shall be mingled together in it; it shall have a certain air in the World; that shall distinguish it from all the other sorts of Poetry; and lastly, it shall be the flower of their Wit, who shall be excellent therein. France shall have three or four Poets of this kind in the same age, which shall be admirable, though there will be considerable difference between them: On the other side there shall be during some time, such a multitude of Burlesque Poets, who shall cause no body to laugh, that nothing shall be made so great, as to exempt it from the burlesque of those persons: 'Tis true, in the same age, there shall be so many excellent persons of all conditions, that there shall be some ground of comfort against the multitude of mean Poets. But alas, I shall tell thee Hesiode, that I fear so many excellent pieces of Poetry will not find censors sufficiently equitable, and that that age so full of wit, will not——

'Tis sufficient (Calliope interrupted Apollo, who appear'd to Hesiode with the rest of the Muses;) it is not fit a Mortal should know as much as we, and thou hast told him enough to raise up his mind, and to instruct him. Apollo having done speaking, and the Concert beginning again for some moments, Hesiode imagin'd Calliope gave him a wreath of Laurel, which she held in her hand. Upon which awaking suddenly, Apollo and the Muses dis-appear'd. In which instant he beheld a kind of light that dazled his eyes, and rose up without knowing what he was going to do, having his mind so fill'd with what he thought he had seen and heard, that he was perfectly astonish'd; which he was likewise again, presently after he had something recollected himself, whereupon, beholding a fair and young person, about twelve or thirteen years old, follow'd by three or four Women, and two Men, who after they had descended from their Chariots, chariots, consider'd the native handsomness of this famous Fountain, by the side of which he had slept. Hesiode had never lov'd any to that time, but he had no sooner beheld this fair Virgin, than his heart was affected with the sight. At first he consider'd whether it were not one of the Muses that staid by the Fountains side; but this error was soon resolv'd; for he perceiv'd this person was come thither only out of curiosity, as many others us'd to do. He saluted her very civilly with the rest of her company, and was troubled for having been seen asleep: Not but that the former apparition of the Muses, did still sufficiently possess his mind, but the sight of this fair Virgin surpass'd all other imaginations; whereupon making use of the liberty taken by persons that are at such places, which people go to see out of curiosity, Hesiode approacht these Ladies, and handsomly addressing to them. May not I render a civility (said he) to such fair strangers in informing them at least of some particularities of a place they come to see? We have so little time to be here (answer'd Clymene) that it will certainly be very advantageous to us, if you, being, as probably it seems, one of the Countrey, please to instruct us a little better concerning this famous fountain, the pleasantness of whose water seem'd to invite me to drink of it immediately upon my arrival. But they tell me (added she smiling) 'tis the fountain of Hippocrene, and if I take not heed, I shall not be able to hinder my self from making Verses. And being not assur'd to have so good a faculty as Sappho, I am in a strange perplexity; for there is nothing in the world I should more hate to make ill, than Verses. You speak so agreeably what you intend (answer'd Hesiode) that I believe you will always admirably accomplish what you design to make. But as for my part (added he, smiling) though I dwell sufficiently near this fountain, yet I dare assure you, that your eyes are more powerful to make a versifier, than the fountain which I see; for I have walk'd a hundred times upon its banks, without having had the least temptation to compose verses; and nevertheless within a moment that I have had the honor to see you, I find a strange desire in my self, of being able to tell you, as well in Verse as in prose, that I have never beheld any person so transcendently fair, as you. Clymene blusht at the flattery of Hesiode, who by that means conceiving her more lovely than before, enforc'd himself to speak to her again. Whereupon, the rest of their company mingling in their conversation, they continued above an hour in that place; after which, they all went together to the City, which bare the name of the famous Mountain, consecrated to the Muses; for this fair company came to see the Festival of Cupid, which was to be celebrated. Now Hesiode being a person of much civility, and highly taken with Clymene, he took all imaginable care for her convenience, in seeing the solemnity of this Festival. But it was remarkable, that having never before thought of composing Verses, he notwithstanding made some before he went to his rest that night, and could not hinder himself from it; so that he knew not whether it was the Muses that had inspir'd him, or the fair eyes of Clymene; for the commendation of them was his inducement to the undertaking. In the mean time he understood Clymene was a person of quality of the City of Locri, whose fortune was not very happy, because she was not very rich. He likewise contracted familiarity with one of her brothers, who was then with her, and whose name was Antiphanes. While the Festival of Cupid lasted, he was inseparable from this agreeable company, and compos'd several pieces of Courtship in Verse, with a facility himself was astonisht at, not knowing, as I said, whether the Muses had inspir'd him, or the beauty of Clymene unloos'd his wit. The departure of this fair Virgin, after having afflicted him for some dayes, occasion'd his making of more Verses. But being of an age which easily admits consolation of any thing, his grief did not torment him long. 'Tis true, the applauses which all the World gave to his Verses, contributed much to comfort him, for Glory is a Mistress, whose first favors are always sweet. Whereupon he addicted himself wholly to Poetry, and really acted as if he had been inspir'd; for he studied with such speed, that in very little time several Works of his were seen upon divers subjects, which requir'd different sorts of knowledge; whereby it came to be reported over all Greece, that in a moment the Muses had taught him all the Sciences. He writ a Tract concerning Agriculture, which he address'd to his Brother; he made another of Astrology; he celebrated several Heroes, and Heroesses of antiquity, and spoke much more to the advantage of Women than of Men, to be contrary to the custom of Homer, who had more highly extoll'd Men than Women, relating several examples of illustrious and virtuous Women, which had consented to marry with worthy Men, for their virtue only. Moreover, he made the Epithalamium of Peleus and Thetis; a lamentation upon the death of Batrachus, and a Work which he call'd The Shield of Hercules: at the same time also he began that which he call'd Theogonia, in which he speaks of the original of the gods; he discours'd likewise concerning the art of Physick and Divination; and which is remarkable, having in one of these Works, introduc'd a Nightingale and a Hawk speaking together, he gave the first pattern of those ingenious Fables of Brutes, whereby Æsop afterwards render'd himself so famous. So that having acquir'd a high reputation by this great number of Works, which he compos'd in the space of five or six years, his heart no longer appear'd sensible to any thing but glory and ambition. Then he made several voyages with very much pleasure, because into what place soever he went, his reputation out-stripping him, he found friends every where. But that which caus'd him to be most spoken of, was the advantage he got over Homer, by the judgement of Panis King of Chalcis; for having both made Verses at the celebration of the funerals of Amphidamas, Hesiode was declared Victor; and for having explicated a Riddle, which Homer was unable to do, he obtain'd a Tripod of Gold, which he consecrated to the Muses. Indeed the judgement of Panis was not approv'd by all the World; for the siders with Homer, and the enemies of Hesiode, when they observ'd some person to judge unsutably of any thing, took up a by-word in derision, saying, That it was a judgement of Panis: But however, Hesiode having obtain'd the prize, and plac'd it in the Temple of Delphos, with an Inscription, that signified the glory which he had gained, the advantage remained wholly on his side, and the Victor of him that had overcome all others, could not fail to be glorious. Ambition thus possessing the heart of Hesiode, he studied only to preserve the glory, which he had gotten, and that in such a manner, as it might prove beneficial to his Fortune. To which end at his return from Chalcis, he consulted the Oracle concerning the conduct of his life, which answered him, that he ought carefully to avoid the Temple of Jupiter Nemæus; for which reason he removed far from Peloponnesus, where that famed Temple stands. His Father being dead some days before, and having his estate at his own disposing, he resolved to go to the Court of the Prince of Locri, who was reputed a Lover of Verses. Indeed, it seems the Locrians are more obliged than others to esteem Verses, and those which make them; for the famous Mountain of Parnassus divides their Country. The Opuntines call the Locrians Orientals, and on the contrary, the Osolians count the Locrians Occidentals; the first bear in their Ensignes Aurora, as it uses to be painted, and the other the Evening Star. Now Hesiode having chosen the Court of the Prince of Locri, as a Court wherein ingenious persons might advance their fortunes more than elsewhere, and wherein he might have some knowledge since his having seen Clymene, Antiphanes, and the rest of their company at Helicon, took his journey thither, though without having at that time, any sentiment of that beginning Love he had had at eighteen years of age, for a Virgin of thirteen. Another thing which obliged him the more to go thither, was that he was informed the Prince of Locri had a Favorite, who as well as the Prince his Master, delighted to render justice to merit. There was also another reason induced him to make choice of that place; for the chief Priest of Helicon had a Niece married at Locri, to a man of quality, who was in no mean respect with the Prince's Favorite whose name was Lysicrates. Hesiode then went to Locri, and was entertained at the house of the Niece of that chief Priest of Helicon, who was named Belintha, and her Husband Artimedes. As soon as he was there, he enquired tidings of the fair Clymene, to whom Belintha was an intimate friend. This Woman who was very amiable and sprightly, answered him sighing, that Clymene was in the Countrey, that she preferred sollitude before conversation; that she had bid adieu to the world, and would return to the City, till the rigor of the winter should drive her thither. But Clymene (answered Hesiode much surprised) cannot in my opinion be above 19 or 20 years old, which is not an age in which to prefer solitude before the Court, unless she have lost her beauty by some accident. I assure you (replyed Belintha) that Clymene is as fair as ever she was, and though she were less, yet she has so great a Wit, that she would be always infinitely amiable. It must needs be then, (said Hesiode) that this fair Virgin be possessed with some great discontent, which causes her to hate the World; but however, (added he) she will at least admit of a visit. By no means (answered Belintha) and unless Antiphanes or Ganetor, who are her brothers, carry you thither, I think I dare not do it; for she hates men principally. Then some one perhaps has betrayed her (said Hesiode.) Since several have loved her (answered Belintha smiling) it is no wonder if some of them have deceived her. Oh, I beseech you (replyed Hesiode) tell me a little more exactly what has befallen Clymene, You shall know soon enough (answered Belintha) but nothing at present from me, Nor did Hesiode know more concerning her at that time: And moreover, ambition predominating in his heart, he was more sollicitous of getting an interest with the Prince of Locri and Lysicrates, then learning tidings of Clymene, Accordingly he succeeded happily in the design he had made, and in very few days became highly in favor with the Prince and Lysicrates, and consequently with all the Court; for 'tis the custom for those who are favorably respected by Princes or men in government, to be so likewise by all the rest of the world. Thus ambition feeding it self with hope in the heart of Hesiode, he considered only how to make this beginning of favor become profitable to him, and thought no more of going to seek Clymene, in the Countrey, nor informing himself particularly of what had hapned to her. Yet he contracted a great friendship with Antiphanes and Ganetor her Brothers; but being it was not of them that he could learn the adventures of their Sister, he knew nothing of them then, but imployed himself wholly in the care of his fortune, without feeling in his heart any inclination to love any fair one. He had without doubt a very respectful friendship for Belintha, and Belintha a very tender one for him; but it was absolutely without courtship. At that time the fair Clymene was with an Aunt of hers in the Country, without having any other consolation in her melancholly, than that which she received from the Letters of her dear Belintha, who us'd all means she could to cure her of her discontent. Hesiode lodging at the house of Artemides, had very much freedome with her, and went into her Chamber, and her Cabinet also, though she were not there. And going one day into her Chamber, whilst Belintha was there, he beheld an opened letter lying upon the Table, and though he was very discreet and respected Belintha enough, no to prie into her secrets, farther than she was willing, yet he could not contain from casting his eyes on this Letter, which he perceived was written by a Woman. But that which augmented his curiosity was, that he presently espied his own name in it, which farther instigating him to read it, he took it up, and found it written in these words,

CLYMENE to her dear BELINTHA.

I Am very glad you have found an agreeable Friend, who comforts you for the loss of a faithful one, but though the merit of Hesiode be not unknown to me, yet I leave you to possess his friendship without envy; for I have so bad an opinion of the hearts of all men, that I can never be capable of confiding in any. But my dear Belintha take heed to your self, I conjure you; Love sometimes disguises it self in Friendship, and persons are often in love without thinking of it. You know you understood better than I the sentiments I had for the perfidious.——Be wise by my example, fear the merit of Hesiode, and distrust your self; for certainly if I had not been confident of my self, I had never been deceived by him that has forsaken me for Fortune, which will infallibly one day forsake him. Adieu, my dear Belintha; I have not the power to beseech you not to love me more, although it would be almost necessary for my contentment it were so, for I have no regret in my solitude but for you.

As Hesiode had done reading this Letter, Belintha entred and saw it in his hand; so that having unwittingly left it there, she was sorry for it, and blamed Hesiode for his curiosity; but he desired her pardon for it in so handsome terms, and told her so ingenuously how it came about, that she did not stick to pardon him, on condition, he would not let any person know of his having seen the letter. However, (added she smiling) you may believe, if you please, that shall never have need of Clymene's counsel, and that without it I have so bad an opinion of men, in reference to Love, that were you as much my Lover as you are my Friend, and I might comply with you innocently, yet I would never engage my self to Love; for in truth, after what has befallen Clymene, no trust is to be given to any thing. But Madam (answered Hesiode) do you think I can have seen this Letter of Clymene, and not desire to know her adventures? I confess the curiosity I had to that purpose, was extinguished, but the sight of this Letter has so revived it in my mind, that I can live no longer without knowing them. Sincerely, (added he) I believe there is some kind of enchantment in this Letter: for as soon as I beheld my name writ in it, my heart began to beat; and now I have read it, I have a jealous curiosity to know who it is Clymene complains of, and I hate him before I know him. Yet you are very obsequious to him, (answered Belintha) Is it the Prince, (demanded Hesiode?) No, (answered Belintha) but 'tis Lysicrates. How? (replyed he) is Lysicrates the man Clymene complains of? Yes (answered Belintha) and she has reason to accuse him. I beseech you Madam, (replyed Hesiode) tell me all you know concerning Clymene; for she returns again into my fancy, such as I saw her upon the Bank of the Fountain Hippocrene. Although I know nothing which is not glorious to Clymene, (answered Belintha) yet if I tell you all that I know concerning her, I require that you never speak of it to any person whatsoever. If you require no more (replyed Hesiode) you may please to begin, for I am of opinion, that nothing ought to be kept more inviolably, than a secret intrusted to us, though we should not apprehend that what is told us, ought to be concealed. After this, Belintha caused Hesiode to enter into her Cabinet, and having given order for none to interrupt them, began to speak in this manner.

Since your self have seen Clymene, I shall omit to say any thing concerning her person, saving that as wit advances the esteem of beauty, Clymene is infinitely more amiable than she was when you saw her, because she has a wit, than which none can be more elegant, natural, fit for ingenious things and divertising, and the most charming humor in the World. As for Lysicrates you know his birth is very noble; nor are you ignorant that he is a comely person, and has wit and worth; but however, it may be said you do not know Lysicrates. For before he came to be the Prince's Favorite, he was a thousand times more affectionate to his Friends of both Sexes, for as you know, a man cannot be Fortunes and his own; and has power no longer to give himself to another, when he has no more a right over himself. Now Lysicrates, being infinitely more agreeable than you see him, beheld the fair Clymene, the first time she appeared in the World, and had so strong an inclination for her, and she for him, that the very first day they became friends with a belief, that that kindness would last as long as their Lives. Not that Clymene was yet come to an age, in which she might probably know what friendship was, but having a very forward wit, a tender heart, sensible mind, and sweet nature, she ceased to act like a child, before she ceased to be so. But for that there is something in Clymene's deportment, which infuses awfulness and respect, she being serious and discreet, Lysicrates was a sufficient long time before he dared to speak to her otherwise than as an agreeable Friend. In the mean while, to tell you the truth of things, they were the happier thereby; for the Aunt of Clymene not imagining that Lysicrates was amorous of her Niece, permitted him to speak to her as much as he pleased; and Clymene being averse to imagine that the kindness of Lysicrates proceeded from Love, lived with him with all the confidence and liberty, that a dear familiarity was capable to give. If there was any little news which was not to be told aloud, they whispered it to one another; if any uncouth adventure hapned, they spoke sincerely what they thought of it, if any excellent Sonnet were made, Lysicrates gave it to Clymene, or Clymene to Lysicrates; and thus there being a society of pleasures and little secrets between them, they led a very pleasant life. Clymene without doubt had no great wealth; but being without ambition, she was not therefore unhappy. As for Lysicrates, he was more rich than she, and seemed to be content with his Fortune, and to desire nothing

elſe but to be loved by Clymene. In what place ſoever Lyſicrates heard his Miſtreſs ſpoken of, he heard of her praiſes; and in what ever place Clymene heard her Love mentioned, ſhe was obliged to rejoyce, for the glory he had in being commended by all the World. Now Clymene being very ingenious, diſengaged her ſelf as much as ſhe could from the multitude of viſits, and confined her ſelf to a little ſociety infinitely agreeable, becauſe it conſiſted only of very worthy perſons. Lyſicrates for his part, delighted in no place, ſaving where Clymene was, he attended the Prince only out of duty, and pleaſed himſelf with none but the Friends of Clymene. So long as the fair weather laſted, we walkt continually together in all the pleaſant places about the City; for Clymene's humor and mine; having great reſemblance, we were much pleas'd with walking. Lyſicrates alſo had the ſame inclination. But though theſe two perſons had then a very tender paſſion one for another, yet Clymene would not think it was Love that was in her heart; becauſe having only innocent thoughts, ſhe would believe ſhe had only a friendſhip for Lyſicrates. But on the contrary, I maintained boldly, ſhe had ſomething more than ſhe imagined; and I remember one day amongſt the reſt, ſpeaking to her of her affection for Lyſicrates; I cunningly urged, that if it were no more but friendſhip, that which ſhe had for me would have prepoſſeſſed her mind enough, to hinder her from having ſuch a dearneſs for him. I confeſs to you ſincerely, (ſaid I to her) I cannot comprehend why the friendſhip you bear to me, has not defended your heart againſt Lyſicrates, for you ſay, you will not have him ever pretend to obtain any thing of you, and that you will only eternally love and be loved. I acknowledge it, (ſaid Clymene.) Why then (replyed I) are you not contented with my affection? You know I have been a Lover in our friendſhip, (if I may ſo ſpeak) I was the firſt that ſought to pleaſe you, I have had a thouſand and a thouſand little cares to divert you, you have always been Miſtreſs of my will, you have reigned in a ſoveraign manner in my heart, you have known all my ſecrets, and have truſted me with all yours. Alaſs! my dear Belintha (anſwered Clymene bluſhing) when two ſuch friends as we affect one another, without Love, they have not many ſecrets which are agreeable either to relate to hear. But yet, (replyed I) you were not formerly weary of me, a trifle diverted you, we ſpoke a thouſand innocent follies, which we would not ſpeak even to a Lover. I agree with you, (anſwered Clymene) but on the other ſide, a Lover tells me a thouſand agreeable blandiſhments, which a female Friend cannot. Yet there are not many Friends of our Sex more flattering than I, (added I,) for I ſcarce ever ſee you without commending you; ſometimes I ſay you have a rare complexion, ſparkling eyes, and a cheerful humor, and at other times I commend your ſtature; nor do I think Lyſicrates extols you more than I. So that requiring nothing but eſteem, dearneſs, care, and obedience, and not pretending that your affection for Lyſicrates ſhould ever ſatisfie the leaſt of his deſires, I ſee not (ſaid I) why you are not contented with my friendſhip, who have all the love for you, you can challenge, and have this advantage, that it does not expoſe you to detraction. Ah cruel friend, that you are! (cryed Clymene) you take pleaſure to inſult over an unhappy perſon. I do ſo at leaſt (anſwered I) in convincing you of your inſincerity; for you ought to confeſs that you love Lyſicrates, as all virtuous Miſtreſſes do their ſervants, and that in very truth, you give hope to him that has touched your heart. I confeſs (replyed ſhe) I wiſh he would hope; but I declare to you withall, that I ſhould be infinitely troubled, if I could reproach my ſelf for haveing given him juſt cauſe to hope. You ſpeak after ſo ſtrange a manner, (ſaid I,) that I doubt not but at length you will come to love Lyſicrates, till you become unhappy by him, and perhaps leſs loved. That would be hard Fortune, (anſwered this lovely Virgin) if one ſhould deſtroy the ardor of a Lover, by giving him tokens of affection, and he muſt needs have an ingrateful heart, and an ill-natured mind But my dear Belintha, (added ſhe) fear not that unhappineſs to me, for I ſhall never love Lyſicrates too much. I wiſh it, (ſaid I to her) for your contentment, becauſe I am perſwaded the beſt Friends are the moſt dangerous Lovers,, and that all men in general are to be feared. But how confident ſoever Clymene was of not loving Lyſicrates too much, yet ſhe came by degrees to love him with a dearneſs which cauſed all her diſcontent and all her happineſs. However, notwithſtanding the affection ſhe had for him, her Virtue continued immovable. She ſuffered him at length to ſpeak to her of his paſſion, and gave him ſeveral innocent teſtimonies of her own, but Reaſon and Virtue were always Miſtreſſes in her heart. That which was remarkable in this adventure, was, that in the beginning of Lyſicrates love, he offered Clymene ſeveral times to mary her, without the conſent of his Parents, who by reaſon of the ſmall fortune of this fair Virgin, would never have approved the match, but ſhe having a great and generous heart, oppoſed the thing ſhe deſired, and told Lyſicrates that if Fortune did nothing conſiderable for her, ſhe judged ſhe ought not to marry him, for fear of rendring him unhappy. For as for my part, (added ſhe) according to the ſentiments of my heart, I ſhould account my ſelf happy in a Cottage, provided you were contented there. But ſince I ought not to believe you can regulate your ambition, as I could mine, I muſt refuſe that which I deſire, and reſolve rather to be always unhappy, than to expoſe you to repent your ſelf of having ſacrificed your Fortune to your Love. How? Madam (anſwered Lyſicrates) can you believe it poſſible for me to change the ſentiments I have for you? and that my Soul is ſo devoted to intereſt, as to eſteem my ſelf unhappy in a condition wherein you can be capable of contentment? No, no, you know not the heart of Lyſicrates, and you do him a ſtrange injuſtice. For were it not that I fear, leſt the height of my Fortune is not worthy of you, I would not leave you one moment in quiet. But to tell you the truth, I am ſo ſenſible in all that concerns you, that I ſhould fear to become perfectly miſerable, if I did not ſee you perfectly happy. Therefore my dear Clymene, (added he) it is requiſite my Love make me ambitious, and I muſt looſen my ſelf in ſome ſort from you, in order to be conjoined inſeparably to you, and go and make an intereſt with the Prince, if possibly he may be so favorable to me as I imagine. I beseech you, Lysicrates, (replyed Clymene) tell me not you will become ambitious through Love, for these are too imperious passions, each of which require an intire heart, and who glory in destroying one the other by turns. If you ever discover that weakness in my heart, (answer'd he) take your affection from me, treat me as a Villain, and as a Traitor, more criminal than one unconstant. But moreover, Lysicrates (said she) you will attempt a harder matter than you imagine, which is to give bounds to Ambition. When men desire a thing, they do all they can to obtain it; when they have obtain'd it, they desire another greater, and imagine themselves nearer it than they were to that they obtain'd first. So that great imployments evermore approaching at the rate that favor increases, the desires are heightned, when one would think they ought to be satisfied. Thus all the passions uniting into one single one, it oftentimes happens, that Ambition extinguishes Love, weakens Friendship, changes all pleasures into one sole delight, and likewise in that manner changes the hearts of those that suffer themselves to be possess'd with it, that they are no longer to be known for the same persons, nor do they know those they did formerly; yea, they no longer know themselves. You speak this with a certain fierce and melancholly air (answer'd Lysicrates, smiling) which would almost make me think, that you believe already, I forsake you to follow Fortune; and in the mean time, I have not yet so much as resolv'd to go and seek it. After this, he added a thousand sweetnesses and blandishments, full of generosity, which pleas'd Clymene infinitely, who related them to me the next morning. And indeed, during some time, it was not possible to testifie more love than Lysicrates did to this discreet Virgin. He thought his visits never long enough, moments were as tedious as ages in all other places; but in her conversation, whole days seem'd to him but moments. He writ to her every day, and oftentimes more than once. When he could not see her, he sought out people with whom he might discourse concerning her: he was zealous, assiduous, punctual, and careful, to seek out even the least occasions to please her. Wherefore Clymene, as her ill fate would have it, believing at that time, nothing could ever diminish so strong a passion, laid a foundation of eternal felicity, upon the Love of Lysicrates, and so ingross'd all her joy in her affection, that she no longer cared for any other sort of divertisement. Lysicrates having a house in the Countrey, very near that, where Clymene at present resides, she lik'd far more to be in the Countrey than in the City, provided Lysicrates were her neighbor: on which occasion in the Songs he made for her, he sometimes nam'd her his Shepherdess, and sometimes Amaryllis; and she gave him the name of Thyrsis, in the answers she made to him; for Clymene, no doubt, makes good Verses, for one of her Sex, though she carefully conceals it, and makes no ostentation of being a Wit.

Thus liv'd these two persons, till there happned to be a great Hunting made by that Prince of Locri, at which Lysicrates was present, and seem'd so promising a person in the eyes of the Prince, that he talked with him a long while: and being well satisfied of his ingenuity, he made him a thousand Caresses, and commanded him to see him oftner than ordinary. I, who understood this from Artimedes, went to congratulate with Clymene, who was very joyful for the honor the Prince had done to her Lover; who was not less pleas'd to see Fortune prevent his endeavours. Yet he believ'd his joy proceeded only from the interest of his Love; so that he us'd a thousand obliging expressions to Clymene, when he came to entertain her in private. Some days after he was higher in his blandishments; for you must know, that after the day of the hunting, the Prince desir'd Lysicrates to see him every day. Whereupon, all the Court looking upon him as a Favorite, many insinuated to be his Friends, and endeavour'd to testifie more respect to Clymene; who being perfectly generous, counsell'd Lysicrates to take as much time as he could, from his conversation with her, to bestow it upon his attendance with the Prince. However, remember (said she to him) that I claim your heart to be always mine, and presume the favors of Fortune will never be so pleasing to you, as those you receive from me. I also require (added she) that you do not design to go so far as Fortune will lead you; for generally she casts them down headlong who give up themselves wholly to her conduct. Resolve therefore to acquire as much Estate as is competent for an honest person of your condition to become happy, and no more; and do not endanger the loss of all to gain all; 'tis better generally to renounce a great fortune, and live in tranquility with an indifferent one, than to rise up enviers to your self by your grandeur. 'Tis glorious to be envy'd for Virtue, but it is not always to be so for Riches which are gotten; for, to speak in general, all men so pertinaciously maintain what they possess, that when a man becomes extraordinary rich in a little time, people are apt to believe that he became so unjustly. Put bounds then to your ambition, my dear Lysicrates, for if you do not, infallibly you will become both unjust and unhappy. I beseech you, my dear Clymene (answer'd he) do not suspect me to have a Soul sway'd only with interest; for I swear to you, the love I have for you, is the sole cause of the servitude wherein I engage my self; and unless you will be ungrateful, you must be accountable to me, for all the cares I shall have to please the Prince; you must pitty me when I am with him, and believe I shall think only of you, and that 'tis you I shall serve in serving him; for unless you promise me this, I shall not be able to deprive my self of the joy of seeing you every moment, and dividing my self between my Master and my Mistris. Clymene hearing Lysicrates speak with so much love, had her heart mov'd with it, and generously exhorted him, to constrain himself to see her more seldom, and yet to love her always. And accordingly Lysicrates began to be ingratiated with the Prince, who gave him a considerable employment, fifteen days after this conversation. In this beginning, Lysicrates had so much joy when he went to see Clymene, that he seem'd more amorous of her. He was so troubled when he was to part from her, he writ to her so frequently, and appear'd so careful to do civilities to all those he thought she lov'd, that she had great reason to be satisfy'd with him. Nevertheless leſs, ſhe acted with a little more reſervedneſs towards Lyſicrates; after he began to be in favour, being unwilling (ſhe ſaid) he ſhould ſuſpect her of doing him favours upon the account of intereſt. But the brothers of Clymene, whoſe hearts were not ſo noble as hers, were deſirous that ſhe would treat Lyſicrates with more dearneſs, out of a deſign they had to raiſe their fortunes by his means. Yet this diſcreet Virgin following her own reaſon, and not their ambition, liv'd, as I told you, with all imaginable prudence, though ſhe had an infinite dearneſs in her heart for Lyſicrates. Whilſt ſhe reflected upon her own deportment, and that of Lyſicrates, ſhe began to think it ſtrange, he took no notice of her changing her treatment of him, and likewiſe took it ill, that in the augmentation of his favour, he no longer mention'd rendring their fortune one day inſeparable, as he had done formerly. It ſeem'd to her, his diſcourſe was more ſparing than it had us'd to be, whereof complaining to be one day in the Countrey, whither ſhe went for two days; Well, my dear Belintha (ſaid ſhe to me) do not you perceive that Lyſicrates makes little difficulty to diſpenſe with ſeeing me almoſt at all, and does his duty ſo eaſily, that if he take not heed, he will ſoon fail in the firſt of all duties. But Lyſicrates (ſaid I to her, according as I then believ'd) ceaſes to ſee you for for ſome time, in order to ſeeing you all his life after in quiet. No, no, Belintha, (reply'd Clymene) do not deceive your ſelf, the heart of Lyſicrates is already chang'd, and I am the moſt miſtaken in the World, if ambition do not abſolutely deprive me of him. That which moſt troubles me (added ſhe, bluſhing) is, that I would certainly know whether they are the favours of fortune or mine, which hinder Lyſicrates from ſpeaking to me ſometimes, ſuch things as might give me ground to think he believes it not impoſſible, but that we may one day live together. Lyſicrates's Soul (anſwer'd I) muſt needs be much devoted to his intereſt, if the alteration of his fortune change his heart; and he muſt be very deſtitute of reaſon, if he ceaſes to love becauſe he is lov'd. Ah! Belintha (cry'd Clymene) men are much more unjuſt than you imagine, and their love more various than I believ'd. For indeed, to diſcover to you the bottom of my heart, Marriage in general frightens me; I find there is oftentimes much folly, or at leaſt much boldneſs in reſolving upon it; but though my reaſon make me know all the troubleſome conſequences of it; yet I confeſs to you, when it comes into my mind, that perhaps Lyſicrates would not marry me if I ſhould be willing to it: indignation ſeizes me, and I have almoſt more deſire to hate him, than if he had committed an infidelity againſt me; becauſe in ſome occaſions one may be unfaithful, without doing any act, and a Lover can ſcarce ever be unwilling to marry his Miſtriſs when ſhe deſires it, unleſs it be upon ſome injurious motive. For is there any thing more extravagant than to think that the teſtimonies of dearneſs which you have given, ſhould be effective againſt your ſelf? Nevertheleſs 'tis true, that the injuſtice of men is ſo great, that after having a thouſand times requeſted innocent favors from a perſon whom they love, if ſhe comes at length after a thouſand ſervices, to grant the ſame to them, they oftentimes render their virtue ſuſpected, and cauſe that in deſiring her for a Miſtriſs, they do not wiſh her for a Wife. Moreover, my dear Belintha, I do not conceive that two free perſons can love one another perfectly, nor even wholly with innocence, if they have not at leaſt the thought, that it is not impoſſible for them to become one day inſeparable, and if they do not entertain themſelves with the hopes of a thouſand pleaſures, whereof the ſole conſideration makes them paſs hours and days agreeably. Perhaps (added ſhe, ſighing) if Lyſicrates ſhould offer me to day to marry me, I ſhould not marry him; for having a heart ſo great as I have, 'tis poſſible his great fortune might hinder me from it. But, to ſpeak freely, I would, in order to my contentment, be aſſur'd of the power to become his Wife when I pleas'd. However, I tell you once again. Lyſicrates does not at preſent think of it; and I cannot conjecture, as I told you, whether they are the favours of fortune, or my own, that hinder him. But (ſaid I to her) all the favours that you do him being innocent, you cannot accuſe him of ſuch a ſentiment as you ſpeak of. Did you well underſtand the injuſtice of men (anſwer'd ſhe) you would ſpeak otherwiſe, for do not love them, they forſake you; love them, they deſpiſe you, and in what manner ſoever you act with them, you are almoſt always deceiv'd. As Clymene was ſpeaking thus, ſhe receiv'd a Letter from Lyſicrates, wherein were only theſe words.

Lyſicrates to Clymene.

I Could not viſit you yeſterday, nor can I wait upon you to day; and I know not likewiſe, whether I ſhall have opportunity to ſee you to morrow: but I know well that I hold all time for loſt, which I ſpend in abſence from you.

Clymene, after ſhe had read this Ticket, anſwer'd to it in theſe terms.

Clymene to Lyſicrates.

'Tis very much that you remember you ever ſaw me, and do not forbid me to hope to ſee you again; for when people are taken up with affairs of profit at Court, 'tis very difficult to attend to any of pleaſure in the Countrey.

Clymene ſeal'd up this Letter, and deliver'd it to him who brought that of Lyſicrates. In the mean time an urgent affair happening to Clymene's Aunt, which oblig'd hither; we arriv'd here in that very evening. Which being known to Lyſicrates, he came the next morning to the houſe of Clymene; but he was no ſooner there, but he deſir'd permiſſion to read a packet of importance, which he had receiv'd by the way; and he read it accordingly with very much attention.

And

And that which was remarkable, was, that in going to close it up after he had read it, he let fall the Letter which Clymene had writ to him the day before, and which he had not yet open'd. He blush'd with shame as soon as he perceiv'd it, for he had forgotten to read it; but Clymene blusht with indignation when she observ'd it. So that perceiving he had not yet seen it, she took it, and breaking it open hastily, Believe me, Lysicrates (said she to him) 'tis fit to write to you no longer any but Letters of affairs; for, as for those of friendship, you have no leasure to read them; and which is more disobliging to continue to write such to you, you have so little care of them, that they may easily be read by others. Lysicrates endeavour'd to excuse himself with the multitude of affairs he had had; No doubt you have too many (answer'd Clymene roughly) and therefore 'tis fit I dispense with all the cares you have been accustom'd to take in reference to me; for though you have much fewer than formerly, yet I have robb'd you of some moments. 'Tis true, Madam, (reply'd he) I am less frequently with you, than I was at the time when I was not oblig'd to attend the Prince; but nevertheless I am there often enough, and no doubt, as often as I can. Ha! Lysicrates (said she) when one thinks that he is long enough present with his Mistriss, there wants not much, but that he will be weary of being with her at all; and therefore if you will credit me, give your self wholly to your Master, and take no further thought concerning me. Lysicrates perceiving Clymene was in choller, was ashamed of what had happened, and address'd to her with so many gentle and sweet expressions, that he made his peace in some manner before he went away: for Clymene having a very great inclination towards him, lov'd him as greatly culpable as he appear'd. At that time there hapned some difference between the Oriental and Occidental Locrians; upon which, the Prince went to the War, whither Lysicrates follow'd him, and perfectly gain'd his favour by the brave actions he perform'd During this absence, he writ sufficiently often to Clymene, but they were rather Letters of News, than Love-Letters, and more related to what pass'd in the Army, than any thing else. Upon which, Clymenes's mind was extreamly incens'd; yet her indignation was really, only Love disguis'd; for she was as sensible of Lysicrates's glory as of her own. 'Tis true, that which defended him in her heart, was, that she knew he believ'd he lov'd as dearly as heretofore, and did not take himself to be ambitious. At his return he went to see her as soon as he was arriv'd; but his visit was so short, that the sum of it was only to tell her, he would wait upon her as soon as he could. But his affairs multiplying as his favour increas'd, he had then so little time of which he could dispose, that it may be said, he had not leasure to love Clymene. Oftentimes when he was at her house, he spent half of the time he was there, in receiving several Messages and Letters, or else in answering them, after having requested her permission to that purpose. He was no longer the same Lysicrates, who entertain'd her with agreeable discourses and blandishments, he was a restless ambitious person, who found himself happy in no place. Clymene was sensibly afflicted at it; but I can say, I never saw a more tender, nor yet more discreet grief than hers; for she conceal'd it so well, that I was the only confident of her discontents. One day she would have hid from me some Verses which she had made; but I having gotten them, she was necessitated to suffer me to keep them on condition I would not shew them.

I beseech you (interrupted Hesiode) repeat to me the Verses of Clymene. I will (answer'd Belintha) provided you will never speak of them; for perhaps you will find them sufficiently amorous: I promise you all you please (reply'd he) provided you recite the Verses to me which I have so great a curiosity to hear. And accordingly Belintha having recollected them in her memory, recited these that follow, which Clymene made for the ambitious Lysicrates.

SUre you by amorous flames were ne'r possest,
Since mine (alas!) do so unhappy prove,
That fierce ambition drives me from your breast,
Slighting the charms of Innocence and Love.

Now new designs are follow'd, other cares,
And fresh desires; and your Inquietude
Is your delight, whilst tumults of affairs
Are priz'd above the peace of Solitude.

My charming Desart, which e'r long so sweet,
So lovely seem'd, is unattractive now,
My tendereſt sighs no longer your delight:
'Tis Goddess Fortune now to whom you bow.

Her splendor you pursue, and humorous Laws
Embrace, no longer now your own or mine;
Her beauty now your adoration draws:
Though, Thyrsis, know, her favours are not kind.

No choice she uses in her Gifts, no Love;
Oft-times, in one day her caresses cease;
To deareſt friends she does unconstant prove,
Mocking Men's hopes with guileful promises.

She loves disord'rous change, and wild confusion,
And baseſt flatterers for her Creatures takes;
Go then, Ungrateful, follow her delusion Which seldom Virtue but unhappy makes.

Pursue her still; to me no more address;
None but her favors let acceptance find.
'Tis shame to love a simple Shepherdess;
That thought sutes only with a vulgar mind.

Ambitious hearts a quiet life despise;
Fortune's the object of a Heroe's love.
Whil'st in her hand all the World's treasure lies,
And Sea and Land alike her power do prove.

A hundred times she can you Victor make,
Yet has not the disposal of my heart;
That's in my pow'r, O gods! what is't I speak?
(Alas!) in speaking so, a sigh does from it part.

Beholding

Beholding you, a ſecret check of mind
Tells me, My heart no longer is my own;
Though it repines, and I can only find
The ſoothing of ſweet words t'appeaſe its moan.

'Twould be deluded; come, deceive it you,
Thyrſis, and to your Amaryllis ſwear,
That conſtant to your chains and ever true,
Her Rival Fortune you'll renounce for her,

Perhaps, this moment in her eyes you'll ſee
Wherewith to cure the moſt ambitious mind:
Perhaps, this moment, ſuch fidelity,
Such ardent paſſion in her Soul you'll find,
That you'll account to be belov'd a pleaſure
Greater than that of gaining flitting Treaſure.

Oh precious moment! haſte to eaſe my pains;
Your preſence to my griefs would comfort ſpeak,
I can no longer bear ſuch heavy chains;
Support them, Thyrſis, or I ſhall them break,

But yet in breaking them I ſhall expire;
Rather connect them with a faſter tie.
'Tis Love that quickens me; for were that fire
Extinct, my heart would forthwith faint and die.
This torment I had rather ne'r forgo,
Than be without it and my Lover too.

How? (cry'd Heſiode after Belintha had recited theſe Verſes) did Clymene, that very Clymene, whom I ſaw by the ſide of the famous ſpring near Helicon, make ſuch amorous Verſes as thoſe I have now heard? Yes (anſwer'd Belintha) but although they were very pertinent to affect the heart of Lyſicrates, yet the generous Clymene, who was unable to reſtrain her ſelf from compoſing them in the tranſport of her ſorrow and affection, could not reſolve to let them be ſeen by him for whom they were made. On the contrary, ſhe affected rather to diſguiſe her regret: So that Lyſicrates believing her well ſatisfi'd with him, was very merry, whilſt ſhe was extremely melancholly and penſive: for wh t reſolutions ſoever ſhe made, it was impoſſible for her to ceaſe loving Lyſicrates. How unhappy am I (ſaid ſhe to me one day, when I endeavour'd to comfort her) for I reſent a grief of ſo ſtrange a nature, that I cannot almoſt hope to be cur'd of it. If Lyſicrates were unfaithful, as many Lovers are, and tranſfer'd his affections from me to another, deſpight would ſuddenly cure me; I ſhould paſs from Love to Hatred, and from that to contempt, which would afterwards leave me in a quiet indifference. But as for the manner after which he ceaſes to love me, they whoſe hearts are not very nice in love, would almoſt believe Lyſicrates not abſolutely culpable: But, according as I apprehend things, inconſtancy would ſeem leſs horrible to me, than the change which is hapned in his heart, ſince the alteration of his fortune. There is frailty and weakneſs in ordinary inconſtancy, but there is unworthineſs and poorneſs of mind in the change of Lyſicrates; but though I ſhould dye of diſcontent, I will drive out of my heart a paſſion which is not criminal, but only becauſe he that excited it is not worthy of it. Moreover, though he ſhould be willing to return to me, he would not have leaſure to think of it, he has ſo many important affairs in his head, which all the punctualities of a dear paſſion could not conſiſt with. But (ſaid I to her) why do not you change, as well as Lyſicrates? Be ambitious as well as he; and without conſidering whether he loves you as much as he did heretofore, diſſemble your ſentiments, and engage him, at leaſt to eſtabliſh your fortunes, ſince he is able to do it. No, no, (anſwer'd this generous Virgin) I will never have any obligation to a man who loves me leſs than he ought, and whom I intend to love no longer. And though my fortune were much more unhappy than it is, I ſhould be abſolutely uncapable to receive any thing from a perſon that had depriv'd me of his heart. I know my brothers are of a different opinion, and would have me ſacrifice my ſelf to their intereſts; but they ſhall never oblige me to follow their inclinations. When Lyſicrates was not in favour, they condemn'd the affection I had for him; and now they think it neceſſary for their preferment, no doubt they will blame the manner, after which I intend to treat him for the future. However, I will continue firm in my reſolution. But (ſaid I to her) at leaſt give Lyſicrates to repent. I ſhall give him ſufficient (anſwer'd ſhe) for I find my heart will not ſo ſoon obey my reaſon. Accordingly Clymene continu'd to love Lyſicrates in ſpight of her own reſolutions; that which ſuſtain'd her paſſion was, that Lyſicrates ſome days ſpoke to her with as much love as ever he had done. Indeed it was ſufficiently ſeldom that he diſcours'd with her in private, for he had always ſo many affairs, that he ever began to ſpeak to her with theſe words, I have but one moment to ſpend with you, or two at moſt, I have not leaſure to tell you any thing; or ſome ſuch like expreſſions. Things being in theſe terms, there was a great aſſembly, wherein Clymene was oblig'd to be preſent; whereupon, deſiring to appear handſome there, that Lyſicrates might ſee ſhe deſerv'd his affection, ſhe omitted no ornaments that might render her more amiable: And indeed, ſhe out-ſhin'd the beauty of all the other fair ones, and ſo pleas'd the Prince that he ſpoke not to any Lady but Clymene; not but that the Prince had heard Lyſicrates was amorous of her; but he beheld him ſo aſſiduouſly at Court, that he thought it was no very violent Love. Clymene who beheld the Prince's civility towards her, interpreted it at firſt as an indulgence to his Favorite; but at the end of the Ball, when he entertain'd her a part, ſhe chang'd her opinion; for after having given her a thouſand praiſes, I find you ſo charming (ſaid he to her) that I cannot but wonder at the aſſiduous attendance of Lyſicrates at Court; for had I ſuch a Miſtriſs as you, aſſuredly my Maſter, if I had any, ſhould be worſe ſerv'd than I am by him. Clymene bluſh'd at the Prince's diſcourſe, and anſwer'd to it with ſo much wit, that ſhe ſeem'd to him ſtill more fair. So, that having his fancy fill'd with the Idæa of her he ſpoke of none but Clymene all the reſt of the evening. He likewiſe ſpoke to Lyſicrates concerning her, with earneſtneſs; but in caſe (ſaid he to him in the preſence of a friend of Clymene's, who inform'd her of it the next morning) I ſhould

maugre all my reluctancy, become amorous of your Miſtreſs, and if you ſaw me ready to die for love, would you be generous enough to yield her to me, and not hate me? No doubt (anſwer'd the ambitious Lyſicrates) I ſhould be very unhappy, if that ſhould come to paſs, but however, my Lord, (added he) it would be ſo great an honor to Clymene, that, her intereſt conſider'd, together with the reſpect I have for you, I think I ſhould reſign her to you; and that your happineſs, and that of this fair perſon, would comfort me for my infelicity. Lyſicrates ſpoke this with ſo free an air, that it was perceivable he ſpoke his real ſentiments: whereupon the Prince, who till then had lookt upon the inclination he had for Clymene, as a thing he was to oppoſe, with the friendſhip he bare to Lyſicrates, now perceiving Clymene not ſo deeply fix'd in his heart as he imagin'd, flatter'd his beginning paſſion ſo ſweetly, that having ſeen Clymene five or ſix times in a very few days, he became infinitely amorous of her; for he is a Prince whoſe paſſions are violent, during which he is not ſcrupulous of doing any thing to content them. In the mean time Clymene underſtanding what Lyſicrates had anſwer'd the Prince, became extreamly exaſperated in her mind, though ſhe diſſembled her diſcontent. Indeed within a little time ſhe had occaſion to diſcover it; for the Prince's paſſion being grown too great to be kept in his own breſt, he diſcover'd it to his Rival, before he made it known to his Miſtriſs; but it was in ſuch powerful terms, that Lyſicrates ſaw clearly he muſt either loſe Clymene, or his fortune; wherefore not ſticking a moment what choice to make in this difficulty, he told the Prince, he ſacrific'd all his pleaſures to him, that he would be his confident, and intercede with Clymene for him: And the truth is, Lyſicrates, who had always obſerv'd Clymene to have a very great mind, imagin'd the hope of marrying the Prince, would cauſe her to approve his action; not conſidering that ſometimes there is more grandeur of courage in deſpiſing fortune, than in ſeeking it. Yet he did not abſolutely reſolve to renounce the affection of Clymene, but intended to make it ſerviceable to him, for the further augmenting of his greatneſs and wealth. In which thoughts he went to viſit her when having deſir'd a private conference with her, and ſeeming more ſad than he was, he prepar'd her mind with much addreſs to hear ſome unwelcome matter, which he ſeem'd to be very loth to tell her. Clemene immediately believ'd his buſineſs was to inform her, that the Prince intended to marry him to one of his Coſins, who was a very rich young Lady; but at length he told her the end of his viſit was to acquaint her that his Maſter was his Rival; not but that (ſaid he to her) I am generous enough to ſacrifice all my joy to your good fortune; and after having been your ſlave, am willing to become your ſubject; for I doubt not but if you menage the Prince's love well, he will at length ſufficiently affect you to make you his bride; but indeed I find it no eaſie matter for one to deprive himſelf of that which he loves, how generous ſoever he be. 'Tis true (added he) our affection has been always ſo innocent, that it might ſubſiſt all our lives: at leaſt I know I ſhall be always a devoted ſervant to the fair Clymene, and no change ſhall ever happen in my heart: It ſhall not be ſo on my part (anſwer'd ſhe haſtily) for I declare to you, I will never be yours; however, think not 'tis out of any purpoſe to menage the Prince's love, as you ſpeak. I hate ambition, which has driven me out of your heart, too much to receive it into my own, and you occaſion me ſo to contemn all men in general, that I believe it not poſſible for me ever to eſteem one particular perſon. Do not expect therefore that I ſhould confirm your fortune; for all I can do, is only to contrive how to ruine it; and if any thing could induce me to admit of the Prince's love, it ſhould be only the opportunity of bringing you into diſfavor with him. But to ſpeak truth, I look upon you as ſufficiently puniſht, by being no longer in favor with me, and therefore I ſhall not ſeek a revenge which would fall upon my ſelf; for in the ſentiments I am in, I abhor the love of any whatſoever. I intend now to love nothing but ſolitude, and I hope to live more contentedly in it, than you will do at Court with all your favour; for where there is private ſatisfaction and pleaſure, there needs not much care to be taken for the favor or diſfavor of thoſe that are in government: But to do you a good office this laſt time, know that all thoſe who flatter you, deceive you, that they whom you take to be moſt your friends, are envious and diſguiſed enemies, that all thoſe who ſee you think themſelves better entitled by deſert to the Prince's favor, than you; that as ſoon as you are turn'd out of favor, you will find your ſelf left alone by all your party, and that there was only Clymene in the World, that could not deſert you in adverſity. But ſince you forſook her as ſoon as you were a favorite, ſhe takes her turn to abandon you, and caſts you off for ever. Therefore hinder the Prince from coming to ſpeak to me of his pretended paſſion; for looking upon him as a man that loves one whom I ought to hate, it would be difficult for me to preſerve the reſpect which I owe unto his quality. Lyſicrates hereupon offered to ſwear to Clymene, that he was ſorry his Maſter was his Rival, that he had not ſpoke to him as he did, but only not to increaſe his paſſion; and that as for her, ſince ſhe was ſufficiently generous, not to be flatter'd with the hope of marrying the Prince, he deſir'd nothing of her, but to act with ſuch addreſs, that he might be cur'd of his paſſion, without occaſioning a breach between them. Whereby Clymene always perceiving his Ambition ſuperior to his Love, became ſo incens'd, that ſhe abſolutely commanded him to depart; which accordingly he was enforc'd to do. Not long after which, I went to give her a viſit, and I aſſure you I never beheld a perſon more diſcontented and enraged. As it fell out cruelly for her, the Prince came to ſee her the ſame day; when being ſtill diſturb'd in mind, ſhe ſpoke to him with a reſoluteneſs that ſurpriz'd him, for as ſoon as he began to tell her he lov'd her, and would love her eternally, I beſeech you my Lord (ſaid ſhe to him) forbear to engage me in a deſign which can never give you any ſatisfaction. For though I appear gentle and am ſo really, yet I have an inexpugnable conſtancy to remain in the reſolution which I have taken; by reaſon of which it would be impoſſible for you to perſwade me, that I ought to admit of your affection. 'Tis enough that Fortune has plac'd you above me, to cauſe me me to ſuſpect all your diſcourſe: and I am ſo much a friend to equality, that ſince you have advanc'd Lyſicrates, I can no longer look upon him as formerly. I love Merit and Virtue, but I love them principally without ſplendor, and without being ſet off by any thing elſe, which prepoſſeſſes my judgement; Leave me therefore, my Lord, as a perſon who accounts it a glory to be an enemy to ambition: you will find a thouſand who will love your fortune more than your worth, and receive that with joy which I refuſe with reſpect. However, upon the account of equity, I am oblig'd to tell you, that Lyſicrates has ſpoken ſo well of you to me, that he has wholly ruin'd himſelf in my opinion. After which, my Lord, deſire no more of me; for it would be to no effect. Clymene ſpoke this with an air, that ſo wel manifeſted to the Prince that ſhe lov'd Lyſicrates, was incapable of ambition, and could not love him, that his heart being not yet ſo ſtrongly engag'd, but that he might hope to diſingage it, he ſpoke to her with very much civility, and like a man that would owe nothing to his high condition. But at length, ſaid he to her, after many other things, The favour which I requeſt of you, is, that you will continue to love Lyſicrates; or if you cannot do that, that you will permit me to hope, that perhaps you will one day love me. Theſe two things which you demand, my Lord (anſwer'd ſhe) are not in my power; for I find that I ſhall hate Lyſicrates, and I ſee no appearance that I can or ought ever to love any. After this the Prince departed: The ſame night ſhe intreated me to require of Lyſicrates, all the Letters ſhe had written to him, and charg'd me to deliver to him all thoſe ſhe had receiv'd from him, and to aſſure him ſhe contemn'd him as much as ſhe had eſteem'd him, and wiſh'd, with all her heart, ſhe could as much hate him, as ſhe had formerly lov'd him. But, my dear Clymene (ſaid I to her) are you well aſſur'd that Lyſicrates will reſtore you your heart, when he gives you back your Letters? go not ſo faſt, I beſeech you? and take time to examine your ſelf. Ah! no, no, (anſwer'd ſhe) I will never, while I live, love a man who loves Fortune better than me, who can love me without ever thinking to render our deſtiny inſeparable, who can even ſacrifice me to his Maſter, and be a confident to his Rival. The heart of Clymene is too tender, too ſenſible, and too generous, to ſuffer ſuch indignities. I had much rather be always miſerable; the little wealth I have is an ordinary effect of the blindneſs of Fortune, which is not opprobrious to me; but were I ſo poor-ſpirited, as to pardon Lyſicrates, it might be reproacht to me eternally. Clymene thus continuing firm in this reſolution, oblig'd her Aunt, over whom ſhe had a great influence, to go the next morning into the Countrey. For my part I went to Lyſicrates, in whom I found ſuch a combat of contrary thoughts, that I could not but commiſerate him; for he lov'd Clymene ſtill, but ambition was always moſt powerful in his heart; and though he were ſtill a Lover, yet it was not with his firſt ardor, and conſequently Clymene could not be ſatisfy'd with it, becauſe all diminution of Love is a crime. He made ſome difficulty to reſtore me her Letters, but at length he deliver'd them, and receiv'd his own. Since that time the Prince has chang'd his ſentiments, and Lyſicrates has continu'd ambitious, and caus'd his Love to yield to another paſſion. Nevertheleſs he offer'd two or three times to do ſomething for the Fortune of Clymene, but ſhe generouſly refus'd him. So ſhe has ſpent a whole year in the Countrey, buſying her ſelf ſometimes in Reading, ſometimes in Painting, and ſometimes in Walking: She loves Gardens and Flowers, and and an univerſal ſentiment of goodneſs cauſes her to divert her ſelf with keeping Birds, and divers rare and domeſtick Animals, which afford amuſement to her Melancholly. Yet ſhe is come at length to have only an indifference for Lyſicrates, ſo that ſhe is as fair as ever, and ſomething more amiable; for a little caſt of melancholly, makes her countenance charming and ſweet, that the ſight of it cannot but raviſh.

Your relation concerning Clymene (anſwer'd Heſiode) gives me extream contentment, and I ſhall have cauſe of complaint againſt you, unleſs you bring it ſome way to paſs, that I may ſee her. Yet I am very ſorry ſhe hates ambition, for I confeſs to you, I am born naturally ambitious. My reaſon tells me, that ambition is the foundation of all great actions; that without it there would be no Heroes, and ſcarce any eminent virtues; but however, I abſolutely contemn Lyſicrates, becauſe I am not of opinion, that Love and Ambition, are two Paſſions incompatible. I conceive a man's love may make him ambitious, as in ſome caſes he may become amorous through ambition: Had Lyſicrates been an ambitious perſon, honourably and worthily, he would have ſhared his fortune with the fair Clymene, and not changed his ſentiments by changing his life. But in fine, (added he) I am reſolved to ſee her, and though I ſhould go to viſit her alone, I will go and do it before three days be expir'd. Belimba making ſome difficulty to carry him to her, he went alone to ſee the charming Clymene. But it fell out, by chance, that Belimba was there the ſame day; for it being a journey but of two hours, ſhe frequently made viſits to her, though ſhe deſign'd no ſuch matter in the morning. And Heſiode alſo deſirous to make a ſecret to her of his deſign to ſee Clymene, till he ſhould have executed it, acquainted her not at all with it. When he arriv'd at the place where Clymene was, her Aunt was gone to make a viſit to ſome of her neighbors, and her ſelf was ſeated amongſt the Willows, upon the bank of a River, and was reading that Work of Heſiode, where he makes a Nightingale ſpeak to a Sparrow. A Virgin that waited upon Clymene, was at work in making a collar of ſeveral ſorts of Ribbons, wreathed together, for a very handſome Dog, which Clymene much affected, and which then lay negligently upon the bottom of her Robe, which by chance was ſtretcht upon the graſs. At Heſiod's approach, Clymene's Dog roſe up; but inſtead of barking at the ſight of him as a ſtranger, the pretty creature, by that inſtinct which makes brutes know thoſe that love or hate them, went to fawn upon him, who anſwering his kindneſs, the firſt thing Clymene beheld, was Heſiode ſtroking her little Dog; for though it was a very long time ſince ſhe had ſeen him, yet knowing that he was at Locri, ſhe ſoon was aſcertain'd it was he; wherefore riſing up, and advancing towards him very civilly, I think (ſaid ſhe to him ſmiling) this Animal, who is of a kind that was never accus'd of ingrati-

rude, would help me by his carreſſes to acknowledge the pleaſure you have given me this day by the Verſes you have made, the reading of which has been ſo delightful to me, that I was reading them the third time, when you arrived. I am extreamly proud (anſwered Heſiode) of being able to entertain you in your ſolitude, and I draw no unhappy preſage, from ſeeing that an Animal you love, has already begun to love me. If Belintha were here, (replyed Clymene) ſhe would blame you for the complement you make me; for ſhe ſo much decryes my too great affection towards brutes, that ſhe would venture to maintain, you have a blind complacence which would pervert me. She had ſcarce ſpoke theſe words, but Belintha came thither, who having left her Chariot in the out-court, went to the place where it was told her Clymene was. You come very opportunely, (ſaid this fair Virgin to her) to hinder Heſiode from being perplexed; but why did not you come together. For my part (anſwered Belintha) I knew nothing of Heſiode's journey, and he has made a ſecret of it to me. After your having had the cruelty (replyed Heſiode) to refuſe to bring me hither, I did not think I ought to tell you my deſign, for fear you ſhould make uſe of the credit you have in this place to prevent my admiſſion. In truth (ſaid Belintha, obliging them to walk) you are to be blamed for coming to ſee Clymene, for ſhe is the moſt unjuſt perſon in the World, in preferring her Deſart before her friends. And moreover, (added ſhe ſmiling) I am to advertize you, that with all your merit you ſhall never be ſo much loved by Clymene as that Dog which you ſee. Heſiode (anſwered this fair Virgin ſmiling) ſhall certainly not have ſo great a ſhare in my careſſes, but he has ſufficient in my eſteem to be ſatisfied, and I thank him for bringing in a Nightingale, and a Sparrow, ſpeaking together in one of his Works; for 'tis aſſuredly a ſign, that he is not in the error wherein you are, to the diſadvantage of all Animals in the World, to whom you are ſo much an enemy, that you go about to take from them that little beam of light the gods have given them, which guides them ſo exactly in things that are profitable or delightful to them, and gives them this prerogative above men, that there is never any ingratitude in their hearts. Acknowledgment is found in thoſe of Lyons, and no queſtion would be too in thoſe of Tygers, if they were gently us'd: careſſes and benefits are never loſt amongſt the moſt ſavage Animals, but frequently amongſt Men. Diſſimulation and deceit are ſcarce ever found amongſt brutes, and if they have ſubtilty, 'tis only to avoid dangers, or ſeek wherewith to ſubſiſt. It ſeems (ſaid Belintha with a low voice) one ſingle ingrateful Man makes you judge all Animals acknowledging; but however (added ſhe aloud) though Heſiode were of your opinion, I ſhould not diſclaim my own, nor hinder my ſelf from decrying the inclination you have to love brutes. For that you may not miſtake, (continued ſhe ſpeaking to Heſiode) you muſt know that if Clymene were even amorous of any one, ſhe could not reſolve to give him a beaſt which ſhe loved; and if at any time you would be aſſured of her heart, deſire her Dog of her, and you ſhall ſee whither it will not be more hard to obtain the one than the other. You ſpeak very excellently, (replyed Clymene) in comparing my Heart and my Dog together; yet I am not offended at it, (added ſhe) for they are both faithful and can love well. But are you not aſhamed (ſaid Belintha) to attribute Reaſon and Friendſhip to beaſts? But do not you deceive your ſelf, (ſaid Clymene) when you will not know, that a little Bird, who makes its neſt very proportionably, is more ingenious than a hundred dull Men whom I know, and that a poor Dog, who follows me every where, and moans when I forbid him, has more friendſhip then a Man who is obliged with nothing, and who injures all thoſe whom he ought to ſerve. For my part (ſaid Heſiode then) I confeſs I could willingly amuſe my ſelf in obſerving the Reaſon of Beaſts, if it be fit ſo to term that Light which Nature has given them; and I am alſo ſenſible of their kindneſs. I have always obſerved (anſwered Clymene) that cruel Men hate Beaſts, and uſually good perſons love them, or at leaſt, cannot endure any hurt ſhould be done them. But as for ambitious people, who are ſo ſatisfied with themſelves, and cannot think but of great things, they take no care to obſerve the Neaſt of a Swallow, to admire the labor of Piſmires, the ſinging of Nightingales, the love of Turtles, and the kindneſs of Dogs, nor to amuſe and divert themſelves innocently with the careſſes of theſe poor Animals, whoſe felicity is ſo eaſily accompliſht. For it ſuffices to that of my Dog, that he ſuffer not hunger, that he find a little Brook to drink at, that he lye upon the corner of my Robe, and that I make much of him. He comes not but when I will, he goes away when I pleaſe, he is ſilent when I think good; if I chide him, he does not remember it a moment after, and is not leſs ready to careſs me. Judge therefore I beſeech you, whither that perſon would not be happy, that ſhould find another whoſe heart were ſo tractable. But however, (replyed Belintha) I cannot ſuffer that that ſhould be called Reaſon in Beaſts, which is only a blind inſtinct, and makes them act whither they will or no. Ah! my dear Belintha, (anſwered Clymene) how noxious is the power of choice oftentimes unto us, and that ſupream Reaſon which arrogates ſo much to it ſelf, and makes no account of inſtinct, but cauſes us to commit faults, againſt Virtue, and even againſt our own pleaſures. 'Tis certain, (ſaid Heſiode) that the power of choice occaſions all the errors of Men, and that at leaſt brutes have this advantage in their miſery, that they preciſely know every thing that is fit for them. Some avoid heat, and ſeek cold: others flee cold, and follow heat, without any variety in their kind: but as for men, though they are born and dye alike, and that conſidering them in themſelves, it ſeems they have need only of the ſame things to be happy; yet it is certain, that their reaſon, which is various according to their different tempers, is oftentimes that which cauſes the happineſs of one, and makes the infelicity of another, and they apprehend things ſo differently, that they agree neither in reference to the gods which they adore, nor the Laws which they follow, nor vices, nor virtues, nor even in their peculiar pleaſures. 'Tis not ſo with Animals; that which is good to one Nightingale, is good to all the Nightingales of the World; all fierce beaſts have need of Dens; all Neaſts of Swallows are alike, there there is no different architecture in them, and every ſpecies of animals has an immutable reaſon that governs it (as I may ſo ſpeak) which pleaſes and charms me: for amongſt us every one makes himſelf a reaſon after his own mode, ſo that when we would find out true reaſon among ſo many different reaſons, 'tis a very difficult task. You ſpeak admirably well (anſwered Clymene) for a diſcreet man who flies the World, and an ambitious man who purſues it, may both have Wit indeed, however differently they reaſon. This proceeds (replyed Belintha) for that men are as different amongſt themſelves as Animals are in their kinds, and there is oftentimes as great a diſſimilitude between one man and another, as between a bird of prey and a Turtle, ſo that every one muſt reaſon according to himſelf, and not according to another.

But however, it muſt be acknowledged, that humane reaſon has ſomething very noble and ſublime in it, by attempting to raiſe its knowledge even to the Heavens, and to the Center of the Earth, and he that ſhall conſider the infinite number of profitable and delightful Arts which men have invented, the great number of Sciences whereof they are capable, the wiſe Laws which they have made, the different Ornaments which they have brought into the World, will laugh at the Neaſts of Swallows, the labour of Bees, and the Husbandry of Piſmires. I confeſs (anſwered Heſiode) that the reaſon of men is worthy of admiration for its vaſt extent, that conſidering it in it ſelf, that half-reaſon of animals is but obſcurity in comparison; but to ſpeak truth, the bad Uſe men make of it aſtoniſhes me, and cauſes the poſſeſſion of ſo great a good to ſeem leſs advantageous to me, ſince 'tis ſo difficult to imploy it aright. And on the contrary, beaſts ſcarce ever make any bad uſe of that light which nature has given them. 'Tis true, (ſaid Clymene) there was never any Honey, but what was ſweet, nor Piſmires which did not providently labour, nor Swallows which made Neaſts after different manners. But it is not ſo with men; for they will not ſo much as build their Houſes alike. There is many times folly in their buildings, when they make them too magnificent for their own condition. On the other ſide, beaſts who can content themſelves with things neceſſary, and can make and proportionate them to their own uſes, ought to make men bluſh, whoſe reaſon cannot bound their deſires, whoſe natural incapacity ſtands in need of inſtructors, experience, examples, and practice, for the knowledge of the leaſt of thoſe things which are neceſſary; whereas the moſt ſtupid of all animals have that within themſelves which is ſufficient for them, without intermeddling with that which does not belong to them. Bees and Butterflies take from flowers that which is convenient for their reſpective uſes, without offering to oppoſe one another; they have not ſet limits to their Empire; all the Lillies and Roſes of the Spring are to them in common; and men with that ſublime reaſon which renders them Maſters of the World, have eſtabliſht War in it by eſtabliſhing the Laws which divide the Univerſe. They have brought all kind of Vices into it, by the many inventions ſubſervient to pleaſure; they have made all the miſeries which are in the World, by looking upon ambition as a lawful thing, ſince without it all men would be in peace; and in brief, they have introduced all the unhappineſſes of which they complain, although the gods have enriched the Univerſe wherewith to render them all happy. Who would think (interrupted Belintha ſmiling) that the love Clymene has for this poor little Dog which you ſee follows her, and underſtands nothing of what ſhe ſays, ſhould cauſe her to ſpeak ſuch handſome things, and that after ſo ſerious a manner? who could imagine, that a perſon who has ſo much Wit, ſhould take pleaſure in trifling with a Dog? I have already told you (anſwered Clymene) that the love of beaſts is a ſign of gentleneſs and humanity, and that it is cruelty to do them harm: but I add alſo, that all that loves is amiable, that all that inſinuates it ſelf with kindneſs, deſerves to be ingratiated, that that which has no ingratitude deſerves to be well treated, and that ſince it is not forbidden to love Flowers, Fountains, and Statues, it may well be lawful to love cheerful and pretty animals which love you, and divert you, without ever doing you any harm. But in brief, (replyed Belintha) 'tis not our purpoſe to extoll the deity-reaſon of brutes, and condemn the uſe of the reaſon of men; but only to know whether Amity, which is the moſt precious thing in the World, and which ought to be the greateſt recompence of the moſt conſiderable ſervices, and the moſt noble prize of merit and virtue, ought to be employed in loving a little Dog. I am willing (added ſhe) humanity ſhould be exercis'd toward beaſts, that no miſchief be done them, and that people delight themſelves with them if they pleaſe; but I would not have them loved with the ſame kindneſs wherewith we loved mankind, and which ought to be ſo precious, that it ought not to be given to friends, without well examining whether or no they be worthy of it. As for me (anſwered Clymene ſmiling) who have not found amongſt men whereon to employ my affection conveniently, I muſt love where I can love without fearing to be deceived. 'Tis not (added ſhe) that I grant I love my Dog with the ſame kindneſs wherewith I ſhould love a Friend. But for that, all afflictions mankind is capable of, have the ſame original all ariſing out of the heart, Belintha is pleaſed to confound my kindneſs to brutes with my true friendſhip, and thereupon to inveigh againſt me without any juſt ground. The fair Clymene (ſaid Heſiode) ſpeaks her reaſons ſo agreeably, that inſtead of condemning her, I wiſh I were not what I am, and had the honor to be hers in what manner ſoever. Endeavor then (anſwered Belintha) to be her friend if you can, and do not wiſh to be her Dog, for then I ſhould infallably hate you. Ah! cruel Belintha (cryed he with ſome earneſtneſs) I believe it is difficult to be no more than the Friend of Clymene. Did you ſay, (anſwered that fair Virgin) it were no eaſie thing to gain my friendſhip, you would have reaſon; for contrary to my natural humor, I am become the moſt diſtruſtful perſon in the World, and in my preſent ſentiments I give no credit to words, nor cares, nor ſervices; I know not well whether I ſhould truſt time, which they ſay diſcovers the moſt concealed truths. Therefore 'tis better to leave me in my Deſart to hear my Nightingales. Perhaps (replyed Belintha ſmiling) you may hear complaints in it as ſweet as theirs; for Heſiode ſings at leaſt as well as they, and I ſee he beholds you with ſo much pleaſure, and hears you with ſo great admiration, that I cannot aſſure but that he loves you a little too much already. I perceive (ſaid Clymene) you have a deſign to jeſt, but yet I muſt tell you that when I ſaw Heſiode the firſt time upon the Banks of Hippocrene, he loved me a little, in leſs time than ſince his arrival. I confeſs it, (anſwered Heſiode) and I ſhould certainly have always you loved, if I had always ſeen you. But Madam, your Fortune calling you elſewhere, and mine retaining me then at Helicon, I forſook you for the love of glory, which I have always ſince ardently affected. You ſee (replyed Clymene, looking towards Belintha) it is my Deſtiny to looſe my Conqueſts by ambition. Glory and Ambition (anſwered Heſiode) are not wholly alike. However, (ſaid Clymene) I am very glad you are cured, and that I underſtand it from your own mouth. Heſiode bluſht at this diſcourſe, and going to anſwer to Clymene, he could not contain from ſaying with a great ſigh,

O gods! what is't I ſpeak?
Alaſs! in ſpeaking it, a ſigh do's from me break.
And ſecret trouble from my paſſion grown
Tells me, my heart no longer is my own.

As ſoon as Heſiode had ſpoken theſe Verſes of Clymene, which he had remembred ſince Belintha ſhewed him them, he became much perplexed; but he found them ſo exact an anſwer, to that which Clymene had ſaid to him, and they agreed ſo well with his thoughts, by changing only one word, that he could not hinder himſelf from uttering them. Nevertheleſs Clymene and Belintha both bluſht when they heard them. The firſt looked upon her friend with indignation, and upon Heſiode with confuſion; and Belintha on the contrary beheld Heſiode with anger, and Clymene with ſhame. Heſiode for his part lookt upon Belintha as if he deſired her pardon, and upon Clymene with much love. But at length Belintha deſiring to pacifie her friend, began to ſpeak gently to her, and beſeeched her to ſuſpend her choller till ſhe had heard her. And accordingly ſhe told her of the accident of the Letter which Heſiode had ſeen, and which ingaged her though unwillingly to tell him what ſhe knew concerning the love of Lyſicrates, which Heſiode could not but have learnt otherwiſe from a hundred perſons. I grant what you ſay (anſwered Clymene) but in telling Heſiode what he would have kown from others, there was no need of ſhewing him the Verſes, which no perſon ever ſaw beſides your ſelf. Your having made them ſo amorous (replyed ſhe) cauſed me to think, that by ſhewing them to Heſiode when I was ſpeaking of Lyſicrates, I ſhould give him the greater averſion againſt him. But however (added ſhe) I will make my peace with you, and am only troubled how Heſiode will make his with me. By deſiring your pardon (anſwered he) and acknowledging to you ingeniouſly, that the excellent Verſes of Clymene, ſo well expreſſed my thoughts, that I could not contain from ſpeaking them; for if I ſhould have ſtudied all my life, I could not have made any ſo pertinent. I perceive (ſaid Clymene ſmiling) that though I am offended with both of you, prudence obliges me to pardon you equally, and to reingratiate you together; for if I ſhould be angry in good earneſt, Belintha would perhaps ſhew my Verſes to all the World, and poſſibly Heſiode might think I took that ſeriouſly, which he has ſpoken meerly in a frolick: Wherefore I declare to you, that I pardon you, on condition you will never ſpeak of thoſe Verſes to any perſon whatſoever, nor to me as long as you live. Though it be ſufficiently difficult (anſwered Heſiode) to forbear commending them, yet provided you do not forbid me to ſpeak of you and my ſelf, I conſent never to ſpeak to you of any thing elſe. After this Clymene handſomely diverting the converſation, obliged them to change their diſcourſe, and betake themſelves to walk in ſeveral delightful places. In the mean time, evening drawing on, Belintha commanded her Chariot to be brought thither. 'Tis I (ſaid Heſiode) that ought firſt to think of departing, for I promiſed the Prince to be with him again very betimes; but to ſpeak truth, 'tis eaſie to forget things in the preſence of Clymene. I know not (anſwered ſhe) whether you forget the Prince whilſt you are with me, but I am aſſured you will forget me when you are with the Prince; for the Court is a place, wherein people uſually think of nothing but what they ſee, and abſent perſons are little dreamt of. You have reaſon (replyed Belintha ſmiling) but for ſuch an abſent as you are, I believe you are thought of every where. Our language is ſo rich and copious, (anſwered Clymene) that it was not neceſſary to make a new word to flatter me with. If I may judge of the ſentiments of Belintha by my own (ſaid Heſiode) ſhe has reaſon to invent new words to tell you what ſhe thinks; at leaſt I know none that can expreſs what I think of you. After this, Heſiode gave the hand to Belintha to lead her into her Chariot, and without remembring what he had ſaid before concerning his promiſe, to be back early with the Prince; or conſidering that he might go faſter on horſeback than with Belintha, he deſired of her a place in her Chariot, that he might have as he ſaid, at leaſt the pleaſure to ſpeak concerning Clymene, after his departure from her; and accordingly he went with this amiable Lady. During the way, he ſpoke of nothing but Clymene; ſometimes he extolled her beauty, ſometimes he admired her wit, he was charmed with her ſweet deportment and modeſty, the tenderneſs of her heart pleaſed him above all things, and he could not conceive how it was poſſible Lyſicrates could ceaſe to love her; for I have a heart (ſaid he) as ambitious as he; but I conceive if I had been in his place, ambition could not have deſtroyed my love, which would have been more ardent in a great, than a mean fortune. If you become amorous of Clymene (anſwered Belintha) we ſhall ſee how you will act. I aſſure you, (replyed Heſiode) I will not examine what I have in my heart for Clymene, for fear of finding in it that which would be little advantageous unto me, if it ſhould be in any great meaſure, for I know 'tis much more difficult to engage an intelligent perſon to love the ſecond time than the firſt, eſpecially when the former Love proved unfaithful: and therefore I am resolved to visit Clymene, as seldome as possible: for I have never had any true sentiments of love, but when I beheld her upon the Bank of Hippocrene, and when I saw her this day. In truth, it must needs have been love that caused me to repeat so precipitously and imprudently, the Verses which I remembred; for I was never before reproached for the least indiscretion. I would not (said Belintha) that you were very amorous of Clymene, for we ought never to desire evil to our friends: But I wish you had perswaded Clymene to come a little oftner to the City, and to desist from so obstinate a love of solitude. Clymene seemed so lovely (answered he) that I believe if I saw her often enough to presume to perswade her not to hate the World so much, she might oblige me to prefer the desart she inhabits above all things; for I confess to you, I was never so much taken with any person as with Clymene. See her no more then (replyed Belintha) for it would be too much to loose you, after having lost her. In this manner Hesiode and Belintha entertained themselves, till they arrived at the City. Whither, as soon as they were come, Hesiode went to wait upon the Prince, who chid him very obligingly, as also Lysicrates did, for returning so late contrary to his promise. And the Prince having caused him to be diligently sought for, understood that he was gone to Clymene's house, though Hesiode intended to keep it secret from Belintha. Upon which taking occasion of pleasant raillery upon him, they very much surprised him. Do you know (said the Prince of Lori to him) that I had the most violent beginning of love for Clymene, that ever person had? and that if she had managed the inclination I had for her, there is nothing so difficult but she might have obliged me to, if she had pleased? but her coldness towards me, time, and reason, have cured me. As for Lysicrates, who loved her extreamly, and was not hated by her, I am perswaded the respect he had for me; obliged him to renounce a passion, which is sufficiently incompatible with all other kinds of obligement. I did not think, my Lord answered Hesiode coldly) that reason and friendship were remedies for love; at least, I am assured they would never cure me, if I were amorous. But are not you Clymene's servant already? (said the Prince.) No doubt (answered Hesiode) I have much admiration for her; but as for love, I conceive none would dare to become amorous of that which you have loved. But on the contrary, (replyed the Prince) your passion would afford me contentment for I am perswaded you have so curious a judgment, that your weakness would justifie that of mine. Perhaps, my Lord (said Hesiode) Lysicrates would not be of your opinion. I assure you, (answered the ambitious Lysicrates) that the pleasures of the Prince are so dear to me, that being perswaded the love you have for Clymene, would excite you to make more Verses to divert it, I should counsel you to it, though I could till be your rival; but as the Prince was pleased to say, the purpose of confining my self inseparably to his service, has absolutely drawn me off from Cymene. Since it is so (said Hesiode sighing) for the future I shall not defend my self against the charms of Clymene, and give up the reins to my own inclination, in spight of the resistance of my reason.

After this, the Prince and Lysicrates diverted to other discourse; but Hesiode did not cease to think of Clymene, when he ceased to speak of her, and as long as the evening lasted, he could not with draw his fancy from her. The next morning he made Verses upon her, the day after he sent to know her condition, and writ her a very gallant Letter, which she answered with much civility, though in a manner which signified, she had no desire to renew familiarity with the World, and would not discourse half of her Wit, though there appeared very much whether she would or no. Some days after, Belintha and Hesiode returned to the house of Clymene's Aunt, who received them very well, and promised them that assoon as winter began to make the Countrey naked, she would carry Clymene to the City. Whereupon Hesiode at his return, composed very handsome Verses, wherein he prayed Winter to hasten, to appear with his Isicles, and conjured Autumn to make speed away; he wisht the spring would be slow in coming, to the end winter might continue the longer: He introduced the several pleasures of all the seasons, and beseeched those which are peculiar to winter, to draw Clymene to the City, and retain her there so long as they could. Have a care said he, (with all the gracefulness that Poetry gives to this sort of things) of suffering your selves to be driven away too soon by the pleasures of the spring, which would carry her away from us to the Countrey; for these pleasures are not, in truth, but the pleasures of shepherds and shepherdesses, whereas you are really magnificent: pleasures which serve Princes and Kings, and assembling all worthy persons to the same places, have a thousand advantages above all those other half-savage pleasures, which have need of rivers, gardens, and fountains, to make them delightful. Then addressing again to winter, he exhorted him not to hurt the youth and beauty of the spring, assuring him, that whilst Clymene and he should be together, no person would think of desiring the season of roses. But though these Verses were excellent, Hesiode did not publish them, but shewed them only to two or three persons; for perceiving his affection to Clymene growing very ardent, and come to a good degree already, and being not ignorant that a publick love is a love without pleasure, he kept secret all the compositions which he made upon this fair virgin, by which means there is none of them seen in the collection made of his Works, of which many other things also are lost. One thing was remarkable, that the same day he sent the Verses to Clymene, which he addressed to winter, the Sky was clouded, the wind became violent, and blew off most of the leaves of the trees, as if Winter had began that very day, and granted Hesiod's request. And accordingly the following days hapning to be more foul, Clymene being deprived of the benefit of walking, was constrained to return to the City with her Aunt. But though she was resolved to fly all the World as much as she could, yet being unwilling to appear too rustick, she could not avoid being seen by all the honorable persons of the Court. The Prince himself made her a visit, and carryed Lysicrates with him; but the Prince's heart being then affected towards another person, he beheld her without love, and spoke of his former mer passion, as if he had spoken to a Friend. As for Lysicrates, no doubt he could not see her without being troubled; but she treated him with so cold and fierce an aspect, and he was always so ambitious, that it may be said, what he resented then, was rather shame and perplexity, than love. But thence forward he never saw her, except in the presence of the Prince, and by consequence very rarely. The case was otherwise with Hesiode, who thought himself well in no other place; for though the Prince and Lysicrates could not live without him, he could not live longer with them, because he could not live longer without Clymene. This very much perplexed him, for being the Favorite of the Favorite, who made use of him to be with the Prince, when himself could not, he had always a hundred businesses to do, which instead of being delightful to him as formerly, were then insupportable, because all that hindered him from seeing Clymene, was distastful to him. At first, ambition offered to oppose it self to this passion in his heart, but it was already so violent, that changing his sentiments in few days, he thought of nothing which took up his whole mind before, and derided his former ambition. How obliged am I to Clymene, (said he one day to one of his intimate Friends for having cured me of a passion, whose pleasures are always unquiet, and for haveing given me another whose torments are ever agreeable. I must have lost my reason, could I have thought it possible to be happy with good fortune only. For indeed, provided a Man be content, what matters it whether it be in a Cottage or a Palace. Things without us, are not those which give true satisfaction, but the sentiments of the heart; so that since I look upon Clymene as a person who alone can make my felicity, and whose beauty, wit, and virtue, are of greater value than all the treasures of the World, wherefore should I confound my self in seeking happiness by other ways. Riches are things which are not desired, but to have several others; but the possession of a person whom we love passionately, and with reason, is satisfactory of it self. I confess to you (said his friend to him) that I find true wisdom, in that which you say; but that which amuses me, is, that thing of things, which you did not dream of a few days since. And yet you are not much improved in Wit in that time. I grant it, (replyed Hesiode) but I have more Love, and contrary to the custom of that passion, which often enough injures Reason, it fortifies mine, and makes me know, that ambition is for the most part rather a weakness than a true greatness of Soul. If a Man could by just ways become Master of all the favors that a great Prince can confer, I conceive generosity would require him to endeavor to frame himself to do good to others; but however, I know not whether Reason would oblige him to put his Virtue to so difficult a proof. The danger is, (added he) that a man whose inclinations are very liberal when he is in credit, may sometimes be carried to some injustice by a principal of Virtue, and be as unjust as one that is covetous, to the end to obtain wherewith to be prodigal; but though this should not be, yet he is always lyable to be accused. All miserable persons believe, if they were in the places of those who are happy, they should do admirable things. In the mean time we see the greatest part of those whom fortune has raised, use their happiness ill, and forget their past infelicities, for fear of having pitty of those of others. I could never have believ'd, (said Hesiode's Confident) your Love could have so well taught you morality. You deride me (answered Hesiode) but did you know what sweetness I feel being free from ambition, you would judge I have cause to hold my self extreamly obliged to Clymene. Alas! my dear Hesiode, (replyed he) A person that begins to love, sees only delightful things, hope renders all easie, he is so glad that he loves, and so delighted only in thinking that he may be loved again, that his heart abandons it self to joy, without having cause to do so, but if you continue to love Clymene, you will soon tell me other news. Do not doubt, my dear friend, (said Hesiode) whether I shall continue to love Clymene, for I find I shall love her till death, and I take no other care but to be loved again by her. To which purpose Hesiode omitted nothing that might conduce, of all the diligences which an ingenious, amorous, and gallant person is capable of using, when he designs to be beloved. But though Clymene esteem'd him infinitely, notwithstanding her reluctancy (for she desired to hate all men, and lived with such reservedness that there was no reasonable ground to hope to become happy) yet its true, hope so easily arises in the heart of a Lover, who loves ardently, that he can never absolutely despair: besides, Belintha loving Clymene very dearly, could have wished she did not hate Hesiode, to the end she might have loved her Desart less; and moreover, having much kindness for Hesiode, she could have been glad that the love he had for Clymene, would more straitly have confined him to Lysi, than he was by the favors of the Prince and Lysicrates, who being always desirous to establish himself more in the reputation he was in, was not unwilling to fasten Hesiode to his interests, to the end he might converse with the Prince, and have a faithful friend to accompany him in all his pleasures, when he could not himself. But this was so far from giving Hesiode contentment at that time, that he was disgusted with it, and ambition became so weakned in his heart, that he resented no other than that of being loved. He had also so great a contempt of Lysicrates, in regard of what had passed between him and Clymene, that if prudence had not with-held him, he had rejected his friendship; for he not only undervalued all the agreeable qualities of Lysicrates, but hated him, as if it had been himself that had been offended by him. Yet he perceived this sentiment was something strange; for said he, one day to himself, though unworthiness may be found in the procedure of Lysicrates, yet it does not concern me to hate him; for if he were not guilty of this crime, he would be loved and happy, and I a thousand times more miserable than I am. 'Tis not added he, but that he contributes to my unhappiness another way, for he is the cause that all men are suspected by Clymene, and that she defends her heart against me, as she would do against him, if he should attempt to reconquer it. However, I ought not to despair, though I have no cause of hope given me; for as it is out of a sentiment of glory, that Clymene hates Lysicrates, so ſo its poſſible out of a ſentiment of equity, ſhe may love a man who is totally contrary unto him. In the mean time, though Heſiode viſited Clymene very often, there was ſcarce any beſides ſhe, that underſtood he had no more ambition; for he frequently attended upon the Prince too, and Lyſicrates, and deported himſelf ſo prudently, that there was none but Clymene and Belintha, who obſerved the great paſſion he had in his Soul. So that Antiphanes, and Ganetor, Clymene's Brothers, looking upon him as a perſon that was much reſpected by the Prince and his Favorite, went to ſee him every day, and teſtified much friendſhip to him. On the other ſide, Heſiode to render them favorable to him, ingratiated himſelf a little more in the Court, to the end he might do them ſome good office there, and have the more liberty to viſit Clymene. But when this fair Lady in the beginning of the Spring returned to her Deſart, it was eaſie to obſerve, that the cares of Heſiode were divided; for he did nothing but make appointments to go ſee her, ſometimes with her Brothers, very often with Belintha, and ſometimes alone; no longer caring for Favor or Fortune, nor any thing but to ſee Clymene, to write to her, and to make Verſes upon her, under the name of a Shepherdeſs. For his inclination leading him to ſpeak of Countrey matters in his Verſes, he conceived Love in Poetry had ſomething more charming and more ſweet with that reſemblance of ſimplicity, than with that of Nymph or Goddeſs. Clymene taking good notice of his ſentiments, intreated Belintha ſeveral times, to indeavor to make Heſiode change his intentions, but his Friend told her ſmiling, that till ſhe forſook her ſolitary humor, ſhe would rather ſend her a thouſand Lovers, than free her from one. Things being in this poſture, Heſiode went for two days to the Houſe of Clymene's Aunt, with her Brother, during which the Prince was gone to one of his houſes in the Countrey, and had diſpenſed with him for following him. Belintha was likewiſe of this Company, with two other handſome Ladies her friends; ſo that the Deſart was then very delightful. When Heſiode was ready to ſet forth, a Packet was brought him from Lyſicrates, and delivered to one of his attendants; he was minded to read it preſently, but being told the Company waited only for him to depart with them, he referred the reading of it till he came upon the way. Yet he did not perform his intention, for Clymene ſo took up his mind, that he never remembred the Packet he had received, though he did not queſtion but there was ſomething in it which concerned the Prince's intereſt. So he went to Clymene's houſe in this forgetfulneſs, and which was more ſtrange, was there till very late the next day without thinking of it; and 'tis likely he would have returned to Locri in the ſame manner, had not an accident befallen him. The houſe where Clymene dwelt being ſeated in a pleaſant Countrey, walking was the chiefeſt delight it afforded. So, as ſoon as the Sun permitted the Ladies to injoy that divertiſement commodiouſly, Clymene obliged her friends to take the ayr. The company being one evening in a Meadow beſet round with Willows, and divided by a River whoſe Banks were all covered with various ſorts of flowers, they divided themſelves inſenſibly; ſo that Clymene and Heſiode found themſelves alone, ſeparated from all the reſt about thirty paces; ſome walkt, others ſate down, and others ſung. As for Clymene, having found a little flowry place on the bank of the River, where the little Dog ſhe loved was layd down, ſhe leaned againſt a Willow, and ſhewing Heſiode the goodlineſs of the Countrey endeavored to hinder him from ſpeaking to her of that which ſhe ſaw well he had in his Soul. But to imploy him the more, ſhe intreated him to ſhew her once again the Verſes he had read to her an hour before, wherein he deſcribed the Countrey life after a very handſom manner. Heſiode was willing to obey her with diligence, and ſought for the Verſes, but inſtead of them drew forth the Packet of Lyſicrates, which he had not yet opened, and had received at his coming from Locri. This ſight ſurpriſed him; but inſtead of being troubled at this adventure, as Lyſicrates was for that of his own, when he let fall a Letter of Clymene in her preſence without having opened it; Heſiode laught at it, and would have put up the Packet again without opening it, if Clymene who knew the hand and bluſht at it, had not askt him whither he newly received it. No, Madam, (ſaid he to her) and Artemides at whoſe houſe I Lodge can teſtifie to you that I received it when I came from Locri. But why then did not you read it upon the way, or ſince you were here? (ſaid Clymene.) Becauſe I am wholly unlike Lyſicrates, (anſwered he) and whereas Ambition deſtroyes love in his heart, love deſtroyes Ambition in mine. Clymene bluſht at this diſcourſe, and was very ſorry for having been ſo curious; but becauſe what Heſiode ſpoke might ſtill be diverted, ſhe made no application of it, and without anſwering to it told him, it was fit he opened his Packet, for fear leaſt there might be ſome Order from the Prince in it. For though (added ſhe) I am an enemy to great Ambition, yet I am none to your happineſs. If it be ſo, Madam (ſaid he to her) it will be very eaſie for you to render me happy. In the interim, if you deſire I ſhould know the import of this Packet, be pleaſed to take the pains to read it; for in a place where you are, I can do nothing but behold and admire you. Though all that comes from Lyſicrates diſpleaſes me (anſwered Clymene) yet out of reſpect to you I will ſee what he commands you: and accordingly ſhe opened the Packet, and beheld in it a Letter from Lyſicrates who deſired him to come to the Prince, who had writ with his own hand theſe words at the bottom of the Letter;

I will not command you to come, becauſe I would be more oblig'd to you if you come as ſoon as you know I deſire it.

When Clymene had done reading the Contents of this Letter aloud; But what will you ſay to the Prince (ſaid ſhe) for not having obey'd him forthwith? I know not (anſwer'd Heſiode) but I know I care not what he will ſay of it, provided that without being offended, you will ſuffer me to thank you for having cur'd me of Ambition. For indeed, Madam, though you ſhould be all your life ungrateful to the moſt reſpectful paſſion that ever was, I ought always to thank you, for having having freed me from one, which has none but falſe pleaſures, to give me another whoſe torments are delightful, and make me account my ſelf more happy in being with you on the bank of this River, than I ſhould be with the greateſt Prince of the World if I were his Favourite. You are ſo perſwaded (anſwer'd Clymene) of my hatred to ambition, becauſe I hate an ambitious perſon, that you mind only ſpeaking on that ſubject. But to hinder you from conſtraining your ſelf unprofitably, I will act with you as with a man I eſteem, and in whom I ſee a thouſand good and delightful qualities——. I beſeech you, Madam, (reply'd Heſiode) go not to caſt me into deſpair, and fear nothing from my paſſion. If it be diſguſtful to you, I will conceal it as long as I live; but do not attempt to deſtroy it, for it would be in vain. And to hinder you from believing that I diſſemble, when I ſay Love has deſtroy'd Ambition in my heart: If you pleaſe, I will never ſee the Prince nor Lyſicrates more, I will renounce all kind of ſociety, I will diſclaim all the World, and all my Friends; for you are all the World to me, you have united all my paſſions into one, and I conſider only you in all the Univerſe; I will even renounce glory, if you deſire it, though I have always much affected it, and there is nothing which I will not do to teſtifie that I love you ardently. Heſiode ſpoke this with an earneſtneſs ſo full of love that Clymene was ſurpris'd at it; notwithſtanding ſhe continu'd firm in the reſolution ſhe had taken, and anſwering with very much diſcretion, I confeſs to you (ſaid ſhe to him) the manner after which you ſpeak, both ſurpriſes and afflicts me: for I know you ſo well, that I think I ought not wholly to dis-believe the truth of what you tell me. And therefore I am ſorry to ſee that ſo deſerving a perſon as you, conſtrains me to tell you things which afflict you. But I ſhould be ingrateful, unjuſt, and a diſſembler, if I conceal'd from you the true ſtate of my Soul. I beſeech you, do not conceive an ill-grounded hope of my ſincerity; for I will hide nothing from you which may be to your advantage, nor diſſemble that which is againſt you. I confeſs to you, that 'tis now ſome time ſince I underſtood I was not indifferent unto you, and though I believe you love me a little leſs than you think, yet I am convinc'd you love me more than I deſire. I ſhall tell you once again that I eſteem you as much as I can, that I ſee nothing in your heart, but what ſeems to me noble, nothing in your wit but handſome and excellent, that in renouncing Ambition for love of me, you do that only thing of the World which can be moſt agreeable unto me. But after all, Heſiode, I have ſo much unjuſtice, as that I can never confide in the virtue of any whatſoever, after having been deceiv'd. And though you ſhould believe I might in time change my ſentiments, yet there is another obſtacle which you can never ſurmount, which is, that you know I have lov'd Lyſicrates, and ſo I cannot think, if I ſhould admit your affection, but that you would believe I had an eaſineſs in my heart, which I have not, and that there needed no more but ſaying to one I love you, to oblige me to anſwer favourably. In the mean time this is ſo remote from truth, that with all your merit, and all the affection you profeſs for me, I believe you can never oblige me to love you: the moſt obliging expreſſion I can give you, is, that if I had always continu'd to ſee you, when I firſt ſaw you at Helicon, and you had always lov'd me, no doubt I ſhould never have lov'd Lyſicrates, but ſhould have affected you. But, Madam, (ſaid he to her) ſince you do me the honor to tell me, that if you had lov'd me heretofore, you would love me ſtill, why will you not love me for the future, ſince you love Lyſicrates no longer? No queſtion, I am not leſs worthy of your affection, than I was at that time, and I love you a thouſand times more: conſider then, Madam, conſider well what you ſay, and do not attempt to deprive me of all hope, for I cannot but hope that the conſtancy of my Love will overcome all the obſtacles, which oppoſe my happineſs, and that you will not be always unjuſt. I beſeech you, Madam, wherefore ought I to be puniſh'd for the unworthineſs of my Rival, ſince I do not reſemble him? He loves Fortune more than you, and I deſpiſe it only becauſe I love you; Ambition grows in his heart in ſpight of his Love, and Love in mine, in ſpight of my Ambition. Lyſicrates could live no longer without a Palace, without Magnificence, and without a great number of flatterers which encompaſs him; and I ſhould live happy with you only in a ſimple Cottage, in the midſt of a wilderneſs, without all ſociety but yours. Moreover, you ought not to imagine that I would think you had a general facility in your heart, if you favour'd my paſſion; for a Lover is not worthy to be lov'd, if he can ſuſpect his Miſtriſs of ſo great a defect; and he is not ſo much as worthy to be eſteem'd, if he loves a perſon ardently whom he does not eſteem infinitely. And beſides, Madam (added he) having reſus'd the heart of a Prince, and of a gallant and deſerving Prince, you are ſufficiently juſtify'd from that kind of weakneſs. Should all you ſay be true (reply'd Clymene) I ſhould ſtill have ſeveral reaſons, which would oblige me to defend my heart obſtinately; and therefore, Heſiode, leave me in peace in my Deſart, and forſake not Fortune for a perſon who can never be but her own. Once more, leave her in quiet in her ſolitude, to enjoy a tranquillity, which gives time for agreeable muſings; and continue in the tumult of the world, which has ſo much pleas'd you, and pleaſes you ſtill more than you believe. You are unjuſt, Madam (anſwer'd Heſiode) for above theſe fifteen days I remember every moment four Verſes, which I made in an ardency of mind, ſince I ſaw you, and repeat them ſighing, a hundred times a day.

O peaceful quiet, happy ſolitude!
Could I forſake you for inquietude?
Farewell Ambition, with Diſaſters croſt,
What avails Greatneſs, when Content is loſt?

After this, Madam, (added he) will you ſtill ſay you have not inſpir'd me with the love of ſolitude: and accuſe me always of loving the tumult of the Court, and the turmoil of affairs? I, (I ſay) who ſpeaking againſt thoſe who enrich themſelves by unjuſt ways have declar'd that they were unhapppy in not knowing, that ſometimes the half is better than the whole, and that men were miſerable in being ignorant, how ſweet it is to live with the Herbs of ones own Garden;

Garden; ſince if they knew it, the labour of one day would ſuffice for their ſubſiſtence all the year. Judge then, if you have reaſon to accuſe me. The Verſes (reply'd ſhe) which you recited, and thoſe you ſpeak of, pleaſe me well; but, you know, Poetry is oftentimes guilty of untruth. However, ſuffer me to thank you for having ſpoken ſo well of muſing in few words; for it is really more Miſtreſs of the World than is believ'd. After this Clymene, notwithſtanding Heſiode's reluctance, went to joyn with the company, who all re-aſſembled together in a place very delightful, Belintha knowing Clymene and Heſiode admirably well, perceiv'd, as ſoon as ſhe ſaw them, they had been ſpeaking of ſomething which employ'd their wits, whereupon, when night was come, and Belintha and Clymene were retir'd into their Chamber, Belintha ask'd her friend ſmilingly, if Heſiode recited Verſes to her all the while he entertain'd her apart. I wiſh he had with all my heart (anſwer'd Clymene) he would leſs have perplex'd me than he did. But what was it he ſaid (demanded Belintha) that troubled you ſo much. I beſeech you, my dear Belintha, (anſwer'd ſhe) do not ſtill oppreſs me, but ſuffer me to forget all his diſcourſe. When we deſire ſo much to forget things (reply'd Belintha ſmiling) we never forget them at all: and moreover, to ſpeak truth, I cannot conceive that ſo worthy a perſon as Heſiode, has told you any diſtaſtful matter; for he has not told you that he hates you. No, (anſwer'd Clymene bluſhing) but he has been ſo bold as to tell me he loves me, and to tell me ſo in ſuch a manner, that perſwades me he ſpeaks no untruth. How? (ſaid Belintha haſtily) and is it the declaration of the love of a very worthy perſon that you would forget? Believe me (added ſhe) do not endeavour it, for I have an abſolute perſwaſion, 'tis the only thing of the World that was never forgotten by any. You ſpeak with ſo little ſeriouſneſs (anſwer'd Clymene) that I am almoſt inclin'd not to anſwer you any thing. You ſpeak with ſo little ſincerity (reply'd Belintha), that the beſt courſe I can take, is to diſcourſe with you in raillery. You believe then (ſaid Clymene) that I am willing Heſiode ſhould love me. No, (anſwer'd Belintha) but I have a ſtrong belief, that if Heſiode never does any thing but love you very reſpectfully, and very ardently, you will not hate him for it. Hatred is a great word (reply'd Clymene) but in the ſentiment I am in, you will do me a very great pleaſure, if you can hinder Heſiode from perſiſting to love me; for I am perſwaded, the kindneſs you have for me, and that which he bears to you, makes more than half of his paſſion; and I am confident, the deſire you have to draw me out of my Deſart, has induc'd you to put the folly into his head, wherewith he entertain'd me to day. I ſhould confirm your opinion more (anſwer'd Belintha) if I ſhould tell you that he has ſpoken to you by my counſel, and give you occaſion to believe, that what he has ſaid to you is but a fiction; but being I am too ſincere to do that, I tell you what I think, which is, that Heſiode loves you a thouſand times more than Lyſicrates ever did. However, (added ſhe ſubtilly) I offer to do all that I ſhall be able, to hinder him from coming hither again, and I will alſo peremptorily forbid him in your name, if you pleaſe. I ſpoke to him with an aſpect (reply'd Clymene, without taking notice of her friends ſubtilty) that perhaps will deterr him from continuing to ſpeak to me of his pretended paſſion. I will then ſay nothing to him (anſwer'd Belintha ſmiling.) Ah! cruel friend (cry'd Clymene) will you always deride me? After this, Belintha diſcours'd to her more ſeriouſly, telling her a thouſand things to the advantage of Heſiode, conceiving nothing could happen more advantageous to her, for one of her humour, than to be lov'd by ſo excellent a perſon as he, and whoſe paſſion was both reſpectful and innocent Nevertheleſs Clymene continu'd in her ordinary ſentiments, however, in the bottom of her heart, ſhe was not ſorry that Heſiode lov'd her. Wherefore ſhe recounted to Belintha very exactly, all that he had ſaid to her, and the adventure of Lyſicrates's Letter, very different from that of that ambitious Lover, towards whom ſhe found her hatred and contempt increas'd, the more ſhe began to eſteem Heſiode. In the mean time, having read what Lyſicrates had written to him, and the Prince's Poſtſcript, ſhe would oblige Heſiode to depart the next morning, to go to him; but he refus'd it, and choſe rather to hazard the Prince's diſpleaſure, than forſake Clymene, and give her ground to believe, that he was not capable of abandoning all for her ſake. Yet he return'd at length to Locri, without having gain'd any thing upon the mind of this fair Virgin. At the return of the Prince, he excus'd himſelf the beſt he could, without much earneſtneſs; but from that time, getting always greater familiarity with the brothers of Clymene, he was oftner in her Deſart, than at Court: ſo that having ſuch frequent occaſions of ſpeaking to her, and teſtifying his love, he began to ſhake the reſolution ſhe had taken, of never loving any. Nevertheleſs ſhe conceal'd her ſentiments for a long time, although ſhe knew none ever had a more tender paſſion, than that of Heſiode for her. He admir'd all that ſhe ſpoke, the leaſt of her actions charm'd him, he lov'd the ſame things that ſhe did; he obſerv'd even the places, where ſhe us'd moſt frequently to walk, to the end he might go muſe there alone, when ſhe was not there, and he could not be with her. Clymene on the other ſide underſtanding his worth, virtue, and love more, reſented a ſecret delight in being lov'd by Heſiode; and though ſhe believ'd not that ſhe lov'd him, yet ſhe did not wiſh he would ceaſe to love her. But at length the conſtancy of Heſiode, the counſels of Belintha, and Clymene's own inclination caus'd her to conſent that he might ſpeak the moſt ſecret ſentiments of his heart to her; and, by degrees, ſhe came to acknowledge that he had moved hers, and that, provided his affection were innocent and conſtant, he might aſſure himſelf he ſhould be tenderly lov'd. Belintha alſo underſtood this ſtrait engagement, and was the only Confident of this virtuous love. Heſiode deſir'd then to oblige her to ſuffer him to ſpeak to her relations, that he might marry her: but ſhe told him, that having been once deceiv'd, ſhe crav'd his pardon; if ſhe could not ſo ſoon truſt his affection, that ſhe was a profeſt enemy to repentance, and that to the end they might never repent of their mutual affection, it was requiſite they made yet a little longer tryal, whether it were as firmly eſtabliſht as ſhe deſir'd.

In the mean time they did not ceaſe to fancy to themſelves a thouſand contentments in a ſweet and quiet life, which they deſign'd to lead, when their fortune ſhould be inſeparable. In which expectation, they enjoy'd a thouſand innocent ſweetneſſes; their love was tender, delicate, and ingenious, to make them find out ways to render it ſecret. Belintha alone knew all that paſt between theſe two perſons; for after Heſiode came to be favoured by his Miſtriſs, he ſpoke no more of his paſſion to that friend of his, to whom he had communicated ſomething of it in the beginning. A ſlave, who was very faithful and ingenious, called Troilus, carried his Maſters Letters, and brought him the anſwers of them. Heſiode and Clymene made little preſents to one another of ſeveral gallant things, which paſs'd not in the ſight of the World but for gifts of friendſhip, though they were indeed teſtimonies of Love; they told one another all their thoughts; Heſiode writ nothing but he ſhew'd it to Clymene, and Clymene had not a thought but ſhe told it to her dear Heſiode. She did that for him out of gallantry, which Belintha told him ſhe would never do; for ſhe gave him that beloved dog of hers, for her kindneſs to whom ſhe had been ſo much reproacht. Thus by a thouſand little obligations (which afford the greateſt pleaſures of love, when they are done with a certain way of dearneſs, which redoubles the ſenſibility of the hearts of thoſe to whom they are perform'd) Heſiode and Clymene enjoy'd a thouſand innocent pleaſures. In this conjuncture (as all Courts are ſubject to ſudden revolutions) ſo great a diſguſt hapned between the Prince and Lyſicrates, upon occaſion of an Office which he had diſpos'd of, that all the favor he could obtain of him, was to have permiſſion to abide at an antient houſe of his in the Countrey, which was near to that where Clymene reſided. This diſgrace of Lyſicrates, no doubt did not much afflict this fair Virgin; nevertheleſs ſhe was much troubled at his coming to be her neighbor, and much more ſome days after, when this diſgraced Favorite, finding her by chance in a Walk, out of an odd humorouſneſs of love felt his firſt flame ſo ardently rekindled, that without ſticking a moment, he accoſted Clymene: and ſeeing her alone, with two Women that follow'd her, while her Aunt was walking at a good diſtance with an old Prieſt; You ſee Madam (ſaid he to her) that bad fortune returns me to you; but I ſhall take it for good, if you will pleaſe to forget all the crimes whereof you have accus'd me though they be not perhaps ſo great as you have believ'd them; for you know I began to be ambitious only for your ſake. Is it poſſible Lyſicrates (anſwer'd ſhe roughly) that you can have the boldneſs to ſpeak to me as you do? and can you believe, without having loſt your reaſon, that I am ſo poor of ſpirit, as to endure your affection again? No doubt you would be glad to find ſome conſolation during your exile, and that in a time wherein all your flatterers have forſaken you, it I would admit of your flatteries; but, Lyſicrates, you are miſtaken, it can never be; it will be much eaſier for you to make your peace with your Maſter, than to obtain your pardon of your Miſtreſs. Bethink your ſelf therefore of returning to Court, and leave me in my deſart; for if you make a cuſtom to come and trouble me, I ſhall ſoon forſake it, only to be at diſtance from a man, whoſe diſcretion has been ſo bad, as that he has choſen rather to follow capricious fortune, who at length forſakes all whom ſhe favors, than to be faithful to a perſon who lov'd you ſufficiently, to eſteem her ſelf happy without the aſſiſtance of her benevolence. I beſeech you, charming Clymene (cry'd Lyſicrates) do not caſt me into deſpair; I conſent, that all my paſt ſervices be loſt, do but you grant me the favour to begin anew to ſerve you, without having any other right to your affection, than that which a thouſand diligences and reſpects may acquire for me in the time to come. No, no, Lyſicrates, (anſwer'd Clymene) I will not do what you deſire; he that is once gone out of my heart, never finds re-entrance. If I hated you ſtill (added ſhe with a coldneſs full of ſcorn) perhaps it would not be impoſſible, but that I might love you again one day: but the manner of your acting with me, having made me paſs from anger to hatred, and from hatred to contempt, and from that to a total indifference, no change can ever happen in my mind to your advantage. However, being you are unhappy, a little kind of generoſity makes me forbear to ſpeak any thing more ſevere to you; and I content my ſelf with forbidding you ever to ſpeak to me of your pretended affection, or to come to ſee me. After this Clymene left Lyſicrates, who dar'd not follow her, for fear of incenſing her more againſt him: but love having really aſſum'd its antient place in his heart, he went the next morning to viſit Clymene's Aunt, who receiv'd him civilly as an unfortunate perſon. Heſiode was there at the ſame time; but there was much difference in the manner, wherewith Clymene ſpoke to theſe two Rivals; for ſhe ſpoke not to Lyſicrates, except to upbraid him; but to Heſiode with extream ſweetneſs, who notwithſtanding could not but reſent ſome ſmall diſcontent, to ſee Lyſicrates renew his Courtſhip to Clymene, which he preſently took notice of. Sincerely (ſaid he with a low voice to this fair Virgin) the misfortune of Lyſicrates afflicts me, and gives me cauſe to fear; I could wiſh rather for my own ſake, that he were ſtill the Prince's Favorite. I ſhould take this ill (anſwer'd Clymene) if you ſpoke it ſeriouſly; but being there's no doubt but 'tis only to ſhew that you apprehend all that can be apprehended of things, I pardon you. However, if Lyſicrates does not break off coming hither, I will ſoon cure your mind of an ill-grounded jealouſie. To which purpoſe Clymene having in vain prohibited him coming to ſeek her, endeavour'd to oblige her Aunt not to admit him more. But ſhe being a good and generous perſon, believ'd it would be ſomething unhandſome to forbid an exil'd perſon her houſe: Whereupon Clymene conjur'd her that ſhe would pleaſe to go to Locri for ſome time, to the end ſhe might avoid the unwelcome viſits of Lyſicrates. This reſolution gave very much joy to Heſiode; Belintha alſo was extreamly glad of it; and Lyſicrates in his deſart ſaw himſelf equally caſt off by his Maſter and his Miſtriſs, and to make him the more unhappy, the two moſt violent paſſions in the world, continu'd in poſſeſſion of his heart. For being then without any near hope to ſatifie them, they did not deſtroy one another, and he was ready to give himſelf himself again wholly to that which should afford him most ground of hope. In the mean time all the world rejoyc'd at Locri, for the return of Clymene; and Hesiode and she carried their affairs so well, that their affection pass'd rather for a gallant friendship, than a true love; because indeed among ingenious persons there is a certain genius, which makes their affections mutually sutable and correspondent. About this time several Feasts were made, at which Clymene was present with delight; for though she always lov'd, and much affected solitude, yet she could not but love all companies where Hesiode made one, who, without variation of his sentiments, ever preferr'd her above all things, and was a thousand times more diligent in his attendance upon her, than on the Prince, whom he waited upon no oftner than decency enforc'd him, Clymene having never been so well satisfi'd as at that time, had never before appear'd so lovely; for besides that joy embelisht her, she was of better humour, her wit was more pleasant, and she made so many conquests in a little time, that no discourse was more frequent, than concerning the charming excellencies of Clymene. The Prince himself having seen her again, after having broken off with a Mistris, whom he had at that time, re-engaged himself to love her, and resolv'd absolutely to conquer her heart by his addresses, without interposing his authority. By this means the felicity of Hesiode was strangely check'd; for though he had as much esteem as love, for Clymene, and when he listned to his own reason, could not suspect her to be unfaithful to him; nevertheless these two Rivals of his, strangely perplex'd him, and excited greater fear in him, than himself could reasonably approve. He was oblig'd both to the Prince and to Lysicrates, reason and generosity requir'd him to be obsequious to the first, and respectful to the latter: but Love dictated to him to hate and destroy them, since they both employ'd all their endeavors to destroy his felicity, in establishing their own. But that which afflicted him most, was, that he could not reason to the contrary, but with like regret. If he consider'd that Lysicrates was unhappy, and Clymene might, out of pitty, suffer her self to be regain'd by him; he imagin'd also that the Prince of Locri by the lustre of his quality and his authority, might at length come to please her: thus both the happy and the unhappy gave him inquietude. Yet the Prince's love gave him otherwise some consolation; for upon his declaring himself, that multitude of Lovers who throng'd to Clymene's house, retir'd, Lysicrates also in his desart, was troubled to understand, that the Prince began to love Clymene again: that which augmented his grief, was, that he consider'd his Courtship as well prejudicial to his own passion, as to his ambition, because he fear'd lest this fair Virgin, to keep him in eternal exile, would admit of the Prince's affection upon that condition. Clymene on the other side, suffer'd as much as Hesiode and Lysicrates: for being a person, whose affection was very tender and sincere for Hesiode, and whose great and virtuous soul was above ambition, she was extremely griev'd to see the love of the Prince and Lysicrates, and to observe the discontent of Hesiode; for she knew not what remedy to use to it. When she was at Locri, the Prince visited her every hour; when she was in the Countrey, Lysicrates troubled her, as much as he could, and she had no pleasure any longer, but what cost her a thousand regrets. Hesiode liv'd still at the same rate with her; but he sigh'd so often, when he could do it, without being seen be Clymene, that it was easie to be observ'd he suffer'd more than he profest; for out of a deep respect he had to her, he did not let her know that he was desperately jealous: Not that Clymene did one action, or spoke one word, which he could condemn; but the conjuncture of things seem'd so cross, that he could not hinder himself from fearing least the same destiny which occasion'd it, reserv'd some other of greater cruelty for him. Clymene on her part, did all she thought her self oblig'd to, to content Hesiode. She did not speak to him of the sentiments which she observ'd in his mind, because she would not complain of them; so that this unhappy Lover, not having so much as the comfort which complaint affords, suffer'd more than can be imagin'd, especially because he thought it always unfit to make any discovery of his jealousie. For (said he to himself) when any one has ground to be jealous, he ought not to think of complaining, but endeavour to love no longer; and if his jealousie be ill-grounded, it is unjust to go to torment an innocent person. Thus Hesiode's greatness of mind and respect restrain'd him from discovering his jealousie, and he was more unhappy than all others that are possest by that passion. That which tormented him yet more strangely, was, That the Prince intreated him to make Verses in relation to his Love; but though he judg'd he would be displeas'd with him, he excus'd himself from it, and told him it was absolutely impossible for him to make Verses of that nature, if his heart were not touch'd with the same passion, and if he did not express his real sentiments. At this time there arrived at Locri, two Lydians, very skilful in Musick, especially in that kind which moves the heart, and excites it to tenderness, languishing, and love. They were persons of wit and honesty, and very great friends one to another; they both plaid so admirably upon the Harp, that none was heard go beyond them, since Orpheus, whether they plaid together or apart. But the wonder was, they were so well consorted, that the same Instruments in the hands of an excellent Master, who has an exquisite ear, could not be more harmonious than their two Harps were. There airs were very handsome, and accurately compos'd; and they sometimes made so mollifying and amorous a sound with the strings they toucht, that without the assistance of words, the hearers hearts were melted, and their minds mov'd to a transport; whereby disposing the sentiments of those in presence as they pleas'd, they constrain'd them to conspire with their harmony, and become merry or sad at their Will. But besides this admirable faculty, one of them not only compos'd excellent Sonnets, as well as his illustrious friend, but sung after so passionate and affecting a manner, that there were no words but appeared amorous in his mouth. So that these two excellent men being arriv'd at Locri, were the admiration and divertisement of the whole Court, and consequently were caressed by all persons. The Prince caus'd the fair Clymene to hear them several times; but however, none had ſo much intereſt in them, as Heſiode, who loved and underſtood Muſick, and of whoſe compoſure they ſung ſeveral excellent Songs, having before been a long time in Greece. Heſiode knowing the power he had over them, eſpecially over him that had the excellent voice, could not forbear to relieve the jealouſie wherewith he was tormented, by making a Sonnet upon that Subject. Which when he had compos'd, he gave it ſecretly to that Lydian, who was ſo much his friend, and whoſe name was Uſclames, intreating him to ſet it to an air, ſutable to the words, and to tell the Prince and all the Court, when he ſung it, that he had had it a long time, and knew not who was the author of the Verſes: but to the end the buſineſs might be more concealed, Clymene was named Iris in the Sonnet, yet he would have the name of Shepherdeſs remain in it, that ſhe whom it related to, might make the application of it, when ſhe heard it ſung. But after he had reſolv'd the matter in this ſort, he repented himſelf, and thought it would be better to uſe it otherwiſe, Therefore he requeſted that excellent Muſician, only to make an air upon the words which he gave him, and ſet it down in Notes, without ſaying any thing, or taking notice, if it were ſhewn him to ſing, that he had ever heard ſpeak of it. And accordingly the matter was executed ſo; For after the air was compos'd, and the Lydian had delivered it to him in Notes, he writ the Sonnet all along in a diſguiſed hand, to the end Clymene might read it afterwards. After which he folded it up, and by a ſlave unknown to his Miſtriſs, ſent it to her, with order not to diſcover who ſent him. But the better to know how the thing would ſucceed, Uſclames who made the air, was at Clymene's houſe, when Heſiode ſent the Sonnet; and as chance would have it, Belintha was there too; ſo that Heſiode could not fail of being well inform'd of that which paſt. The ſlave arriv'd, and preſented the packet he was entruſted with to Clymene, who preſently opened it, conceiving it was a Letter. But ſhe was much ſurpriz'd when ſhe beheld the following Sonnet in it, nd ſett two Notes after the manner made uſe of in Muſick at that time.

Sonnet.

IRis when firſt under your Empire brought,
The cruel'ſt martyrdom, was ſweet, I thought
And while you tortur'd, you did chiefly bleſs,
Alas! no jealouſie did then my heart poſſeſs.

I hop'd my conſtancy, whilſt yet no ſenſe
Of love, had made in you indifference,
Had undergone your greateſt rigidneſs:
Alas! no jealouſie did then my heart poſſeſs.

Who would have thought, my doubled cares to you Should be to pleaſe you, and diſpleaſe you too
At the ſame time, ungrateful Shepherdeſs?
Alas! no jealouſie did then my heart poſſeſs.

As ſoon as Clymene had read the firſt couplets of this Sonnet, ſhe knew Heſiode had made it, and ſuſpected he that was then with her, had made the air. But that ſhe might not diſcover her ſelf too much, in caſe ſhe was deceiv'd when ſhe had read the Sonnet, ſhe gave it to Uſclames, and addreſſing to him, I beſeech you (ſaid ſhe) take the trouble to ſing this Sonnet to me, before I ſend away him that brought it, to the end I may know whether the air of it be as paſſionate as the words. But, Madam, (anſwer'd he) I ſhall ſing it ſo ill, if I do it without having ſtudied it, that I ſhall do injury to him that ſent it you. However (reply'd Clymene) I requeſt you to ſing it as well as you can, and take no care for the reſt. The ingenious Lydian made ſhew of ſeeking out the air, and drew towards a window to ſtudy it, and ſinging half aloud, one would have thought he endeavour'd to make ſtrains on the ſudden. But at length the love of his own work not permitting him to ſing an air of his own compoſing, he ſung it admirably well, and made it appear to Clymene and Belintha, that it was perfectly fitted to the words, and that it would be hard to make an air of four ſhort Verſes with more gracefulneſs, ſweetneſs, and paſſion than this. In truth (ſaid Clymene then to him ſmiling) If your ſelf had been the compoſer of this air, you could not have ſung it better than you have done. After which, calling for her Writing inſtruments, ſhe writ the Letter which follows in anſwer to him that had ſent her the Sonnet.

I have ſo good an opinion of him that made the handſome Sonnet I receiv'd, that I believe ſhe for whom it was made, can never give him cauſe of jealouſie; yet it would have been pitty if he had not been jealous, ſince that paſſion has caus'd him to make ſuch excellent Verſes, and ſo handſome an air. Adieu; When you are willing to be known, you may be ſo.

After Clymene had writ this Letter, ſhe ſhew'd it to thoſe that were with her, that ſhe might ſeem to make leſs matter of it; but for that ſhe fear'd if it ſhould be publiſh'd, it might prejudice Heſiode with the Prince, ſhe deſir'd Belintha, and Uſclames to be ſilent of it; as accordingly they were. But Clymene did not think that ſhe had a young Slave to her Servant, who had an excellent voice, and without her obſervation, had heard all that was ſaid, ſaying the requeſt which ſhe made to Belintha and Uſclames, not to ſpeak of this adventure. In the mean time Heſiode hearing in what manner Clymene had receiv'd his Sonnet, knew ſhe underſtood he was the Author of it, and finding a ſufficient ſweetneſs in her Letter, he was glad he had intimated his jealouſie to her without offending her. Therefore he thank'd Uſclames, and intreated him to keep his ſecret faithfully; and diſcover'd himſelf alſo to Belintha, that ſhe might be the more ſecret in it; for a ſincere confidence is more obliging to fidelity, than that which truſts a thing by halves. The next morning he went to Clymene's houſe, and came thither ſo conveniently, that he found her all alone. As ſoon as ſhe ſaw him, ſhe chang'd colour, and reproving reproving him obligingly for his jealouſie, 'Is it true (ſaid ſhe to him) that you have ſo bad an opinion of me as to be jealous? Ah! Madam (anſwered he) can you think it poſſible for me to love you without jealouſie, when I ſee I have two ſuch Rivals? Lyſicrates as you know, has had the glory not to be hated ſo long as he was not Ambitious; and the Prince of Locri has ſo many qualifications to make himſelf loved, that I could not but fear he might come to be ſo. So that all I could do, was reſpectfully to conceal my jealouſie from you. What you ſay, is ingenious, (replyed Clymene) and there may be ſome appearance of love in it; nevertheleſs, there is none at all, and the jealouſie you are poſſeſſed with cannot be cauſed but by a weakneſs of your heart, or an unjuſt diffidence of my fidelity. But to teſtifie to you (added ſhe) that I do all I can to comfort you, tell me what courſe I ſhall take to cure your mind. You know my unhappy fortune permits me not to be any where elſe but at Locri, or in the Country; if I am in my Deſart, Lyſicrates cauſes your ſuſpicion; if I am here, the Prince's love makes you jealous; and in the mean time I know no where elſe to be. What then can I do more than I do? that is, I treat Lyſicrates rudely, I give the Prince no hope, and I grant you all the innocent favors that Virtue permits me. Speak Heſiode; and if I can do any thing more for you, tell it me; but conſult your reaſon a little, and do not follow only your paſſion. Alaſs Madam, (anſwered he) I do no longer diſtinguiſh the counſels of my reaſon from thoſe of my love, and I am ſo little maſter of my ſelf, that I am not able to anſwer any thing. All I can ſay, is, that my jealouſie is cauſed only by exceſs of love; for I eſteem you more than you can imagine, and I can never believe you capable of doing any thing which is not juſt. But after all, I do not ceaſe to fear, and I imagine ſometimes that perhaps you ought not to love me, and that I am not generous enough in not counſelling you to embrace the paſſion the Prince has for you, and to baniſh me. But to ſpeak truth, this thought is ſo weak in my Soul, ſo little durable, and a moment after I find it ſo oppoſite to true love, that I repent of it as of a crime. You have reaſon (replyed Clymene) and I like better your being jealous than generous in that manner, though I very much love generoſity. I am obliged to you for this ſentiment, Madam, (anſwered Heſiode) and I ſhould be much more if you could take the reſolution to prefer the dearneſs and fidelity of my love above all things. Is it not to prefer you above all things (replyed ſhe) not to love any but you in the whole world, and to contemn all mankind for your ſake? 'Tis far more then I deſerve (anſwered he) but 'tis not enough, to render me happy; for to overcome all the infelicities that perſecute us, it is requiſite you would pleaſe our fortunes ſhould become inſeparable. But Heſiode (replyed ſhe) do you not conſider what you ſay; for do you think the Prince would leave us in peace if you had married me? and do you imagine my Brothers, whoſe inclinations are low, and devoted to intereſt, and who expect all their fortune from the Love the Prince profeſſes to me, will conſent to our happineſs. No Madam, (anſwered he) but ſince you love me ſo much as to deſpiſe the Prince's affection, and conſequently have no intention to advance the fortune of Ganetor and Antiphanes, at the loſs of your own contentment; It will be requiſite to render me happy without their conſent, to forſake Locri, and go to Helicon, where I have fortune enough to content a perſon ſo generous as you are. Though that which you propoſe to me, (replyed Clymene) be ſuch that I think I cannot reſolve upon it, yet I do not take it ill that you have propoſed it; becauſe it not being contrary to innocence, I am equitable enough not to be diſpleaſed that you deſire a thing of me, which ſeemlineſs will not ſuffer me to grant. For though I have neither Father nor Mother, and my Brothers have comported themſelves towards me after a manner, which may diſpenſe with me for part of the reſpect I give them, yet it is ſomething diſagreeable to a perſon who ſcrupulouſly loves her reputation, to forſake her Relations and follow the Fortune of a man out of her Native Countrey though ſhe marry him. Therefore I conjure you, make this propoſal no more to me, and let us await our happineſs from Time, and our own Virtue. If Lyſicrates do not ſpeedily make his peace with the Prince, I am perſwaded the Prince will baniſh him out of his Countrey, and if Fortune recall him to the Court, he will leave me in quiet in my Deſart, whither I will return as ſoon as he has left it. And as for the Prince, no doubt he will ſoon change his ſentiments; for 'tis not the cuſtom for perſons of that quality to make long Courtſhip. Therefore have a little patience, and in the mean time if you will oblige me conſiderably, be not jealous at all, or at leaſt be ſo indifferently; for as to wholly diſclaiming that paſſion, I am not ſcrupulous to oblige you to a thing ſufficiently difficult, if it be true that you love me ardently. Alas! Madam, (anſwered he) do not you know that 'tis almoſt as impoſſible to give bounds to jealouſie as to the Sea; and that when a perſon begins to be poſſeſt with it; he cannot hinder its increaſe? So that Madam, it is rather in your power than mine to reſtrain it; for I doubt not but if you will take ſome care of an unhappy perſon who loves you infinitely, you will hinder him from abandoning himſelf to that furious paſſion which wholly engages all that are poſſeſt by it, and is a greater enemy to reaſon, than love which occaſions it. After this, Clymene diſcourſed with Heſiode with ſo much virtue and dearneſs, that part of his jealouſie was diſpelled. Yet the calm which re-eſtabliſht in his mind continued not long; for the next morning there hapned an accident which afflicted him ſenſibly.

The Prince being in Clymene's chamber where thoſe two famous Lydians made an admirable concert for an hour, which charmed all the company, afterwards obliged Uſclames to ſing an aire; but whilſt he was tuning his harp to obey him, the Prince began to reprove Heſiode obligingly, for having refuſed to make Verſes at his requeſt: who deſiring to divert that diſcourſe, took occaſion to tell him that Clymene had a young ſlave whoſe voice was ſo excellent, that had ſhe had the art of Uſclames, ſhe would have raviſhed all the World. The Prince who was willing to take notice of all that belonged to Clymene, deſired ſhe might be called, to the end Uſclames might hear her, her, and judge whether her voice deſerved the trouble of teaching. Whereupon Clymene, who was more willing to entertain the Prince with ſinging than diſcourſe, commanded the young ſlave to be called. She was cheerful, ſprightly, confident enough, and very obedient; ſo as ſoon as her Miſtriſs commanded her to ſing, ſhe began. But Clymene, Belintha, Heſiode, and Uſclames were ſtrangely ſurpriſed when they heard her ſing the firſt couplet of Heſiode's Sonnet, for they had taken no heed to this young ſlave, and ſuſpected not ſhe could have remembred it. Clymene bluſht, Heſiode was amazed, Uſclames beheld her with aſtoniſhment, and Belintha could not contain from bidding her ſing another. Upon which the Prince obſerving theſe ſeveral commotions, asked Belintha why ſhe would not have the Girl ſing that ſong, which ſeemed to him very pleaſant? Becauſe 'tis ſo old (anſwered ſhe bluſhing) that no body ſings it. For my part (replyed the Prince) I never heard it. In truth, my Lord (ſaid the young Slave confidently, whilſt Clymene was whiſpering ſomething to Uſclames,) 'tis probable you have not heard it; for it is ſo new that a man whom I know brought it yeſterday in Notes to my Miſtreſs. This anſwer raiſing the Princes ſuſpicion, cauſed him to ask her who gave her this Sonnet. This diſcreet Virgin, judging it more dangerous to deny than confeſs it, told him ſhe knew nothing of it, and that Uſclames was preſent when it was brought her. For my part (ſaid Belintha) I believe it was intended more to Uſclames than to Clymene; for it ſeems to have been made by ſome one, who would intimate to him that he is not the only compoſer of handſome ayrs. But why did you ſay (anſwered the Prince) that the Sonnet was old? In truth, my Lord (replyed ſhe) I can give no other reaſon but that I was ſo unwilling to hear an ayr ſung ill, which Uſclames yeſterday ſung admirably, that I endeavored to divert the Girl from ſinging it. Since Uſclames ſings it ſo well then (ſaid the Prince) I deſire I may have the pleaſure to hear him. Perhaps my Lord, (anſwered Uſclames,) having ſung it but once, I ſhall not well remember it. But being it was ſent with Notes to Clymene (reply'd he) you may ſing it as well to day as yeſterday. Clymene conceiving it unfit to make ſo much difficulty to ſhew it, ſince the Verſes were written in an unknown hand, gave it to Uſclames, from whoſe hands the Prince took it, calling Heſiode to him, to help him (he ſaid) to conjecture who was the Author of it. If it were a greater work (anſwered Heſiode) it would be eaſier to find out who had compoſed the Verſes; but three couplets of a Sonnet, which run all in the ſame ſtrain, are not very fit to diſcover the compoſer by. Yet there is a certain cloſe (replyed the Prince roughly.

Alas! no jealouſie did then my heart poſſeſs.

Which makes me ſuſpect one perſon. But to judge of the ayr as well as of the words, it is requiſite to hear Uſclames ſing. Then this illuſtrious Lydian making ſemblance of not underſtanding it, ſung it as if he were unaſſured whether he did right or no. But though he diſſembled, the Prince underſtood that he had compoſed the ayr of this Sonnet, and ſuſpected Heſiode to have made the Words. This ſuſpition was no ſooner in his mind, but he lookt upon Clymene, ſo unhappily for her, for Heſiode, and for himſelf, that he perceived ſome kind of correſpondence in the looks of Heſiode, and this fair virgin: ſo that recalling a hundred paſt things, he became jealous in a moment, and did not doubt, but that the negligent attendance of Heſiode on him, was an effect of his love to Clymene, and that the rigor of Clymene was an effect of her affection to Heſiode. For (ſaid he within himſelf) if ſhe were amorous of no perſon, it were not poſſible but ſhe would embrace the affection of a Prince, who is able to advance her fortune. Being of a violent humor, he could not altogether hide the agitation of his mind, yet he did not declare himſelf then, but went away in great haſte, only telling Clymene as he departed, that the next time he ſaw her, he would tell her who had made both the ayr, and the words of this Sonnet. You will do me a pleaſure, my Lord (anſwered Clymene coldly) for in truth I know him not. If you did not know him (replyed he as he went forth of her Chamber) I ſhould not, and I know him only becauſe you do, and your eyes have told me. Having ſpoken this with ſufficient fierceneſs, he went away: Heſiode was obliged to follow him, and ſo was Uſclames: ſo that only Belintha was left with Clymene, who did not think it prudent to chide the young Slave much, who had cauſed ſo troubleſome an adventure, but told Belintha ſhe had not done well in ſaying the Sonnet was old. Belintha anſwered, ſhe was too much aſtoniſhed; and then unprofitably blaming themſelves, they ended their diſcourſe with complaints; for they very much feared the Prince would baniſh Heſiode if he came to know certainly that he was his Rival, and was loved. As ſoon as Heſiode could get at liberty from the Prince, he returned to the houſe of Clymene, with whom he had diſcourſed with very tender reſentment. Yet they reſolved never to diſcover the truth, for Uſclames was ſo much a man of honor, that they did not fear he would fail of his promiſe. In the mean time the Prince having well conſidered what had hapned, reſolved not to teſtifie his thoughts openly, till he fully underſtood the matter: in order whereunto knowing Clymene's brothers were ambitious, and would ſacrifice all to their own intereſt; that Antiphanes was ſubtle, and Ganetor ſufficiently pragmatical, he reſolved to make uſe of them, to diſcover really whether Heſiode were amorous of Clymene, and Clymene loved him. He ſpoke to them both therefore apart, and gave them ground to hope all things from him, and intimated as if it were poſſible he might marry their Siſter, in caſe he could be loved by her, and ſo at length diſpoſed them to be faithful Spies for him with her. But though he had much recommended the ſecret to them, and told them all he thought concerning the Sonnet, yet they communicated it to one who told it ſeveral others. So that within three days, it was noiſed throughout both Court and City that Heſiode was amorous of Clymene, and that he was jealous of her; and Heſiode's Sonnet was ſo generally known that there was ſcarce any perſon but ſung,

Alas!

Alas! no jealouſie did then my heart poſſeſs.

By which means the news of this adventure flying to Lyſicrates's Deſart, ſenſibly afflicted him, for he conceived that if Clymene loved Heſiode, it would be impoſſible for him ever to regain her heart. Wherefore having then no hope either to re-ingratiate with the Prince, or recover Clymene's affection, he found himſelf extreamly unhappy, and more within a few days after, when Clymene's brothers, relating to the Prince whatſoever they heard or knew, to make themſelves look't upon as neceſſary inſtruments, told him that Lyſicrates was again become amorous of their Siſter, although they had received divers good Offices from him during the time of his being a Favorite. The Prince was ſo incenſed with this news, that he ſent to command Lyſicrates to depart his Dominions, and it was not without much difficulty that he obtained fifteen days to take order for his affairs. In the mean time Antiphanes and Ganetor forgetting nothing in order to diſcovering the truth, having gained that young Slave to their purpoſe, who ſo unſeaſonably ſung the Sonnet, they underſtood by her that Troilus the faithful Slave of Heſiode brought Letters to Clymene very frequently, and that ſhe uſed to put them in a Cabinet, to the ſight of which ſhe admitted no perſon beſides her ſelf. After they had learnt this, they made an appointment for a Walk of recreation in a place a good diſtance from Locri, to the end their Siſter might be obliged to be preſent at the entertainment. But at the very moment they were to ſet forth, Ganetor fained himſelf ſick, and went not with the Company. As ſoon as they were gone, he ſent away upon ſeveral pretended occaſions all thoſe that might oppoſe his purpoſe, and having none with him, but the young ſlave whom he had corrupted in Clymene's Chamber, he ſent for a man who was very dextrous at ſuch buſineſſes to cauſe him to open and ſhut again Clymene's Cabinet, wherein ſhe carefully kept all Heſiode's Letters. By this means Ganetor came to know the whole ſecret of the innocent affection of Clymene and Heſiode. But though he found nothing but what atteſted the virtue of his Siſter, yet looking upon this Love of hers as an obſtacle to the advancement of his fortune, he came on a ſudden to hate both his Siſter and Heſiode. However, he cauſed the Cabinet to be made faſt again, putting into it all the Letters he had ſeen, and the Verſes Heſiode had made in ſecret for her. And he did all this ſo exactly in the ſame order he found it, that Clymene perceived nothing at her return. But when Antiphanes ſpoke with Ganetor, he was much ſurpriſed to learn what he told him; but though they reſolved abſolutely to ſerve the Prince, even with the loſs of their ſiſters glory if he pleaſed, rather than not promote their Fortune, after having well conſidered the matter, they thought it not fit to diſcover the whole truth to the Prince, becauſe in caſe he ſhould know Clymene preferred Heſiode before himſelf, he might ceaſe to love her. Wherefore they reſolved only to ſay that they had diſcovered beyond all doubt, that Heſiode loved their Siſter, but that they could not yet find out whether or no he were beloved by her. They alſo determined to ſpeak to Clymene, very mildly at firſt, and afterwards if ſhe would not yield, to threaten her, and to have recourſe to the ways of greateſt violence. So they told the Prince all they had reſolved to acquaint him with, who being aſſured of Heſiode's love, began to hate him as much as he had formerly loved him, and took up a reſolution to baniſh him as well as Lyſicrates. Yet he deferred it for ſome days, becauſe he was deſirous to know fully whether he were loved by Clymene, which could not be diſcovered but during his abiding there. But upon divers occaſions he made it ſufficiently apparent that he had changed his ſentiments towards Heſiode. For falling in diſcourſe to ſpeak of Homer and him, he laughed and ſaid, Homer was the Poet of the Lacedemonians, becauſe he taught War; but Heſiode only the Poet of the Helotes, becauſe he treated very much about agriculture; detracting by this raillery from the glory of Heſiode. In the mean time Antiphanes and Ganetor took occaſion one morning to ſpeak to Clymene. At firſt they flattered her, and told her with much ſweetneſs, all they deſired from her; but perceiving that, though ſhe anſwered them with much civility, they could not bring her to what they wiſh't, they fell into ſtrange inſolence againſt her. What? (ſaid Ganetor to her) have you ſo pitiful a ſpirit as to prefer a man that pretends to be a Wit, before a Prince? to have no conſideration of the greatneſs of your houſe, nor the fortune of your brothers, provided you may ſatisfie a fooliſh paſſion that is entered into your head? Ah cruel ſiſter that you are! you ſhall repent it, and your beſt courſe will be, to be cruel to Heſiode, if you love him. Clymene being tranſported with grief, to hear her Brother ſpeak in this ſort, could not contain from breaking out into theſe terms. Alaſs! (ſaid ſhe) how cruel are ye, who can have the injuſtice to think of deſtroying an innocent perſon, who has done you ſervice in a thouſand occaſions, and whoſe virtue is far above the rank of the greateſt Princes in the World? how can you be the confidents of the Prince's love, and purchaſe your advancement with the price of my honor, for without telling you that I love Heſiode, or am loved by him, I only intimate to you, what you are not ignorant of, that Sovereigns never marry for love, and therefore according to reaſon being obliged to look upon the paſſion your Prince has for me, as criminal, you ought not to be his agents and confidents in it; you ought rather to die with ſhame, for ſeeking your fortune by ſo unjuſt a courſe; for if I were in your place, I ſhould rather go ſeek it at the Wars, and owe it to my Sword, than to my Siſters eyes. Perhaps we will follow part of your counſel (anſwered Antiphanes ſufficiently rudely) and taking his brother by the arm to cauſe him to go away out of Clymene's Chamber, theſe two furious perſons left her. Clymene then repenting of having ſpoken ſo much to them, endeavored to retain and appeaſe them, but they would hear her no longer, and left her in incredible ſorrow. Her grief became yet more perplexing ſome days after, for Heſiode diſcovered by the faithful Troilus, that Lyſicrates, (who during the time of his being favorite, had gotten together wherewith to be rich, into what place ſoever he went) cauſed all his moſt precious things and wealth to be put into a ſhip; and to revenge himself of the Prince, and satisfie his own love, he layd a design to carry Clymene away with him by violence; and being very much beloved by the Officers of the Prince, he was advertised that himself was suddenly to be banisht. Clymene was infinitely perplext at the understanding of these two misfortunes which were designed to her. On the one side, she was in fear for Hesiode's life, knowing that her brothers were capable of the most violent resolutions; she considered his banishment with more horror than death, and was more in fear of being carried away by Lysicrates, than of dying, and she so dreaded to stay alone under the power of the Prince who loved her, that she knew not which of all her unhappinesses to fear most. Alas! (said she to Hesiode with extream sorrow) Is it possible for an affection so innocent as ours to be so unhappy? and are you a criminal for loving one that loves you? Ah! my dear Clymene (answered he) 'tis no crime of yours, for if you loved me perfectly, we should not be long unhappy. I have told you formerly, that I have wealth enough to be happy with a person that can be contented with things handsome and convenient. So that if you were capable of taking up a generous resolution, I would marry you with the consent of your Aunt, to whom alone you owe respect (since your brothers are not worthy to be what they are) and so uniting our fortunes together for ever, we shall escape both the violence of the Prince, and Lysicrates, and the injustice of Antiphanes and Ganetor, for whom I will always have some consideration, though I know well they hate me in perfection. I perceive indeed (answered Clymene) that that which you propound to me, is the only thing which can rescue us from all the pressures of unhappiness together, but (my dear Hesiode) I have so little accustomed to do any thing inconsistent with ordinary seemliness, that I find a strange repugnance in my self, to examine only whether this ought or ought not to be done. And if we should not be able to execute our design, but be discovered, we should make our fortunes worse, and be a hundred times more miserable. Alass, my dear Clymene (replyed Hesiode) Is there a greater unhappiness than to be constrained to be separated, and that for ever? This, no doubt, is the greatest (answered Clymene) but if I should see you a prisoner for my sake, and I should live under the power of the Prince, or in the possession of Lysicrates, I should perhaps be in a condition more deserving compassion. But Madam, (replyed he) when I shall have received the command, which must cause me to depart the dominions of the Prince of Locri, if I obey him, will you not find your self under his Power? will you not be in danger of Lysicrates's violence? and if I do not obey him, as there is great likelihood I shall not be able to obey him, shall I not be in danger of the things which you can most fear? For as for my self, Madam, I confess to you, I cannot resolve to forsake you; and I conceive if you determine not to render me happy, I shall be forced to take some course to conceal my self here in the house of some friend, to the end to be always in place where I may defend you, or at least to have the sad consolation of dying near you. Consider therefore Madam, what you intend to do; but above all things do not constrain your sentiments; and if to my unhappiness, there be in your heart any thought favorable to the Prince, be so generous as to tell me; for if it be so, I have nothing to do but dye, and I shall have respect enough for you, to go and dye out of your presence. Ah! cruel as you are (cryed she) can you only imagine that what you say is possible? If it be not (answered he) why will you not resolve to take the only course which can render us happy; for if you do not take it, I declare to you, I cannot hinder my self from believing that I am not necessary to your felicity, that you can live without me, that you believe I am able to live without you, and that measuring my affection by your own, you are utterly ignorant what a true love requires. For where perfect love is, Madam, a person that is loved cannot be refused in any thing which is not contrary to love. And besides, is there any crime in my request? are not you alone Mistress of your own will? is it not free to choose with whom to spend ones life? and would it not even be against virtue, not to follow my fortune? You have promised me an eternal love, and notwithstanding you are willing to break it, without any other reason to tell me, than that in marrying you secretly, with the consent of your Aunt, who you know will approve it you shall commit, you say something incongruous to ordinary decency. Is it not sufficient (added he) that what I desire is not repugnant to innocence? grant it me then (continued this Lover falling upon his knee, and taking her by the hand, which he grasped with extream dearness, and do not render me, the most unfortunate of men. As Clymene was considering what she should answer, Belintha entered, who seemed very sad. A moment after, some person coming for some small business to Clymene, she was obliged to go to the door of her chamber: and Belintha took the occasion to speak to her apart: I am infinitely grieved (said she to her) that I must tell you what I newly understood, to wit, that your brothers have conceived so horrible a hatred against Hesiode, that you ought to fear all things from their violence: do not ask me farther, but if you will follow my counsel, oblige him to go out of the way for some time. Clymene then resented an extream grief, though she had not the liberty to testifie it; for at that very instant, the Captain of the Prince's guards came thither, who finding her at her chamber doot, I desire your pardon, Madam, (said he to her) for the unwelcome commands I have to acquaint you with. The Prince having understood Hesiode was here, gave me order to come and seek him. Hesiode hearing himself named, advanced towards the Captain of the guards, who told him, with all the civility his office permitted him to have in this unpleasing occasion, that the Prince commanded him to depart from Locri the next day, and out of his Dominions two days after. Hesiode's mind being prepared for this command, he appeared not at all surprised witht, but answered him that brought it, without being moved; who having done his Message, departed, and left these three persons at their liberty, of speaking what they thought for

for Belintha ſo well underſtood all that paſt between Heſiode and Clymene, that ſhe did not prejudice their freedom. Then it was, the amiable Clymene felt her ſoul cruelly afflicted, and Heſiode making his laſt attempt to move her, deſir'd the aſſiſtance of Belintha, as a faithful friend. For my part (anſwer'd this generous Lady) though I muſt loſe Clymene if ſhe does what I deſire, yet there is no doubt, I had rather never ſee her more, than ſee her unhappy. And moreover (added ſhe) having ſome relations at Helicon, I hope I ſhall not loſe her for ever. Whilſt Belintha was ſpeaking thus, Clymene wept, and had not the power to ſpeak. But at length after Heſiode had us'd the moſt paſſionate expreſſions in the world to her, and Belintha had preſt her to take up a generous reſolution, ſhe told Heſiode, that provided he would conſent ſhe ſhould marry him, ſhe would then conſent to follow his fortune, and endeavour to get away ſecretly, in caſe her Aunt would not forſake her. Heſiode then expreſt all that a dear Love could inſpire him with, to thank Clymene: after which, Belintha went to move her Aunt, and acquitted her ſelf ſo well of this commiſſion, and ſo urgently repreſented all the ſad conſequences which might attend their adventure, that this woman (who hated her Nephews, lov'd her Niece dearly, had no children, whoſe treaſure and jewels was eaſie to tranſport, and who was perſwaded the Prince's love to Clymene was not innocent) eaſily inclin'd to that which Belintha propounded. Whereupon going to find Heſiode and Clymene, they conſider'd all together what they had to do. The reſult was, that to take away all the Prince's ſuſpicion, Heſiode ſhould depart the next morning from Locri, and ſhould likewiſe give out, that he intended to leave the dominions of the Prince within two days after; but ſhould go and conceal himſelf in a little houſe of Belintha's, upon the ſea-ſide beyond Molycria, not far from the Temple of Neptune; in which, two days after, a great ſacrifice was to be made, where every year was a great confluence of perſons of all conditions. That in the mean time Clymene's Aunt ſhould be at the ſacrifice, that afterwards Belintha ſhould carry her to her houſe where Heſiode was conceal'd, and that the night following they ſhould embark in a little Fiſher's Veſſel, to deceive thoſe who might have any knowledge of their departure; that afterwards they ſhould land fifty furlongs from thence, in a place where horſes ſhould attend them, that ſo they might go to a Town, and provide a chariot to carry them to Helicon, where there marriage was to be accompliſh'd. Heſiode nevertheleſs, for his own ſatisfaction, deſir'd Clymene that ſhe would promiſe him to be his, in the preſence of his Aunt and Belintha; which being done, fill'd him with a joy greater than he was able to expreſs. But, not to give any ſuſpicion, Belintha told Heſiode, it was not convenient for him to ſtay longer with Clymene; and accordingly, having entertain'd her apart a quarter of an hour, whilſt Belintha was ſpeaking to her Aunt, he bid her adieu; and though he knew their ſeparation was not to be long, yet he was griev'd with incredible regret, and fear'd in the bottom of his heart (notwithſtanding all his endeavours againſt it) leſt ſome great unhappineſs ſhould befall him, when he was gone out of her ſight. He fancied, that aſſoon as he ſhould be out of Locri, the Prince would attempt to do ſome violence to him, or that Lyſicrates would carry her away when ſhe went to the ſacrifice, Clymene perceiving ſo great a ſorrow in his eyes, was ſo ſenſibly mov'd with it, that ſhe could not contain from endeavouring to comfort him. She gave him her hand very obligingly, and looking upon him with as much love as modeſty, You ſeem to me (ſaid this diſcreet Virgin) ſo afflicted for an abſence of three days, that I am glad I have not condemn'd you to eternal ſeparation. Go then my dear Heſiode, goe; but that you may expect me with ſome contentment, believe, I conjure you, that I ſhould have been as miſerable as you, if I had not conſented to our happineſs.

May I believe it, Madam (anſwer'd Heſiode) and may I go and wail for you with the ſatisfaction of thinking that you leave your Countrey without repugnance for my ſake, and that without me you could not live happy? Yes, my dear Heſiode, you may, (reply'd ſhe) and there is nothing ſo obliging which I do not permit you to believe, now virtue doth not prohibit me. After this he kiſt her hand reſpectfully, and left her to go and provide for her departure. But Antiphanes and Ganetor cauſing Clymene to be always obſerv'd by the young ſlave whom they had corrupted, underſtood confuſedly, that Heſiode had had a long converſation with her, Belintha, and their Aunt; and that this Lover parted from Clymene after a certain manner, which might ſeem to intimate, it was not with intention of never ſeeing her more; which highly exaſperated their former indignation. In the mean time Clymene's Aunt, to give the leſs ſuſpicion of her deſign, went to her houſe in the Countrey without carrying Clymene thither. The next day after Heſiode's departure, Lyſicrates hearing of it, went to ſee her, and profeſt ſo violent a paſſion for her Niece, that he ſeem'd never to have been more amorous of her, than at that time. And indeed, pretending no longer to the Prince's favour who baniſht him, Love reſum'd new force in his heart: wherefore confirming himſelf in the deſign he had to carry away Clymene, and knowing ſhe was wont to go to the Temple of Neptune, the day the great ſacrifice was to be made there, and then to go and lodge at the houſe of Belintha, which ſtood not far from the Temple, he reſolv'd to execute his deſign that day, and took no other care but in order to it. On the other ſide, Heſiode obeying the Prince's Orders in appearance, departed from Locri, and being unwilling to carry any other attendants with him, beſides his faithful Troilus, whom he had brought out of his own Countrey, he diſcharg'd the other ſlaves he had hir'd at Locri, and went only followed by this, to whom he carefully recommended the favour'd dog which Clymene had given him, as a token of love. All the Court was troubled for Heſiode's exile, the Ladies, repin'd, and the people murmured after a manner, which made it evident how great his reputation was. As for the Prince, he was extream joyful, when it was told him Heſiode had obeyed his Orders: but at length, the day of ſacrifice being come, Clymene's Aunt, who was return'd out of the Countrey, took a Chariot with Belintha and her Niece, and went to that famous ſacrifice, where a numerous multitude was assembled. But as for Clymene, she went thither with a joy wholly peculiar to her self, in the thought, that after the sacrifice, she should go to the house of Belintha, that she should there see her dear Hesiode, and soon after be out of the jurisdictions of the Prince of Locri, without fearing the violence of Lysicrates, and that she should at length see her self inseparably united to the fortune of that man, whom alone in the world she could affect. Thus she went thither with her mind fill'd with a thousand delightful thoughts, she was indeed something troubled to think she should leave her dear Belintha; but the hope of seeing her again at Helicon, comforted her for part of that discontent. So they arriv'd at the Temple of Neptune, which stands on the Sea shore, not far from the Cape of Rium, in a very pleasant situation; for it has a prospect to the delightful City of Molycria, which appears in a half circle towards the Sea, which lies immensely patent to the view, from the gate of Neptune's Temple, which is bedeckt with Sea-ornaments. For between the pillars are seen several statues of the Nereides, and upon the bases of the pillars, and the friezes which are about the Temple, several large sculptures, representing the Trophies of prows of ships, oars put across, broken boats, and shatter'd sails. The day appointed for this famous sacrifice was so fair, that never was a more glorious seen; and the Sea so calm, that one would have thought all the waves had even'd themselves for the more decent celebration of this Festival of Neptune. The sacrifice was begun with all the customs requisite; but because there use to be several delightful passages to be seen on such occasions, Scaffolds were erected for the Ladies of quality, before the great Gate of the Temple, where the ceremony was perform'd. Clymene was upon one of these scaffolds, well dispos'd to take much pleasure in the ceremony; for though the Prince was present there, yet she was free from trouble, because it belong'd to him to be always near him that offer'd the sacrifice in his name; and that according to the laws of the ceremony, he was not to go out of the Temple till night ended it. So his presence was no obstacle to the secret design of Clymene, wherefore she appear'd very pleasant, and took delight in beholding all the various offerings which were brought thither a little before the sacrifice. First, two hundred Fishermen, very agreeably attir'd, presented themselves with silk lines in their hands, and went respectfully to offer silver hooks to him that receiv'd the offerings. After them two hundred others, attir'd with fillets, and crown'd with sea-weed, went to present every one a fish, in baskets of bulrush covered with flowers; after them a hundred daughters of Fishermen, attir'd in green, and their hair dishevel'd like Sea-Nymphs, carried little baskets full of cockles, and offer'd them to Neptune. Then came a hundred old Mariners with Oars painted and adorn'd with Flowers, which they carried and laid down at the foot of Neptune's statue, to testifie by that submission, that it was he that sav'd them from suffering shipwrack. When all these offerings were made, the accustom'd sacrifice was perform'd, after which was heard a concert of voices, which sung a hymn in praise of Neptune, which Hesiode had compos'd this year, and was accounted so admirable, that never had any comparable, to it, been sung before. While it was singing, and all the rest of the multitude was in profound silence, there was on a sudden heard a strange kind of noise among them that stood furthest off, with a great murmure and confusion of voices. A moment after, the throng was divided, and there were seen four Fishermen, bringing a dead man all bloudy upon Oars laid across, who having found him in this condition, not far from the place where the River Daphnus discharges it self into the sea near Molycria, brought him hither where this great assembly of people was, to the end it might be known who he was. This lamentable object troubled the Assembly; but it afflicted the fair Clymene much more sensibly, who after the men had laid the body upon the ground, perceiv'd the Dog she had given to Hesiode amongst the Fishermen, and going to lye down upon the Corps, which she instantly knew to be Troilus, that faithful Slave of Hesiode; for the Scaffold whereon she stood was sufficiently near, and his attire remarkable, not to be unknown or mistaken. She no sooner knew him, but she made a great shreek; a moment after, a thousand voices forc'd her to turn her eyes towards the Sea, where the people imagin'd Neptune was ready to appear, because they perceiv'd the water rise up after an extraordinary manner, with something moving in it, which they could not well discern. Clymene's mind being then very inquieted with seeing the Slave of her dear Hesiode, in this condition, look'd upon this commotion in the Sea as others did, though her thoughts were wholly otherwise imploy'd. Thus she stood and beheld, as all the rest of the World did, that this object which appear'd so confusedly, coming nearer and nearer, became more visible every moment. So that insensibly approaching it was perceiv'd to be a great Troop of Dolphins, who carried a body upon their backs by turns, discharging the burden from one to another, as they drew nearer towards the shoar. This object surpris'd the whole multitude in such manner, that it fix'd the eyes of all the company from the Prince to the meanest Fisher; but especially of Clymene, who no sooner perceiv'd it, but, without well knowing the reason of it, she was seiz'd with such a universal trembling, as fear gives them who are most capable of it. In the mean time these charitable Dolphins approaching always towards the shore, mutually aiding one another, came at length so near it, that they cast the body, which they had carried upon the Bank, and that so gently, that it remain'd extended upon the Gravel, as if it had been a man asleep, having his countenance turn'd towards Heaven, after which they plung'd themselves again into the Sea, and departed from the shore. But this body was no sooner upon the Land, but the Dog which lay upon that of Troilus run to the shore, and howling in a most doleful manner, laid himself down upon the body which the Dolphins had brought thither. Clymene, who beheld the action of this Dog, first trembled with fear, and then suddenly blusht again; and advancing towards the side of the Scaffold which look'd towards the Sea, she heard several voices which said, It was the body of Hesiode, which was seen upon the Bank. Whereupon, resenting a passion not to be expreſs'd, and not being Miſtriſs of her ſelf, ſhe ſtrecht out her hand to a man who help'd her down the Scaffold, and was follow'd by Belintha through the throng to the place where the body lay. But coming thither, ſhe beheld her dear Heſiode dead, who having receiv'd a great wound in the Throat with a Sword, ſeem'd to have been aſſaſſinated. At the ſame inſtant Antiphanes and Ganetor by the Prince's order, approaching towards the body, to the end they might aſcertain him whoſe it was, came thither at the ſame moment that the unfortunate Clymene did. But as ſoon as they appear'd, the Dog which ſhe had given Heſiode, and who then lay upon his body, leapt up with an extream fury, ſometimes againſt Antiphanes, and ſometimes againſt Ganetor, as if he would fly in their faces, and accuſe them of the death of his Maſter, which Clymene obſerving, and all the people looking upon it as ſomething prodigious, and perceiving the wounds of Heſiode begin to bleed afreſh, and Antiphanes and Ganetor appearing aſtoniſh'd at it, Clymene could not contain her ſelf from ſaying in the tranſport of her grief, turning towards her friend who was near her; Ah! my dear Belintha, I ſee not only Heſiode dead, but I ſee alſo that they which murder'd him are my brothers. After, this fair and afflicted Lady being able to ſpeak no more, reſented ſuch an exceſs of grief, that ſhe fell down in a ſwound near the body of Heſiode. Belintha ſate down by her, and holding her in her arms, did all ſhe could to revive her. In the mean time the people having heard what Clymene ſaid, comparing her words with the action of that faithful Dog of Heſiode, did not doubt but Antiphanes and Ganetor had murder'd him; beſides that, they appear'd ſo aſtoniſh'd, that their countenances accus'd them. Now Heſiode having been very well belov'd, and the people having newly heard a Hymn of his compoſing in the honor of Neptune, wherewith they were very much affected, believ'd they could do nothing more acceptable to the God, whoſe Feſtival they celebrated, than to ſacrifice to him the Murderers of him, who had ſo excellently ſung his glory. Whereupon, the Brothers of Clymene endeavour'd to return towards the Prince; but the multitude ſetting upon them, ſtrangely treated and affronted them. It being not the cuſtom to wear Arms, during the Solemnity of this Sacrifice, there was no difficulty in laying hold upon theſe two execrable murderers: who, inſtead of juſtfying themſelves, deſir'd they might be led to the Prince, and that the People would protect them from the violence of thoſe that ſet upon them; but alledging the Prince would puniſh them for offering to revenge the death of a man whom he had baniſht, they made their own conviction evident. Whereupon the people crying out, it was fit to kill them, otherwiſe Neptune would be incens'd: This revenge becoming a zeal of Religion, it was impoſſible for the Prince or the Prieſt to reſcue them from being torn in pieces by the multitude, and caſt into the Sea. The unfortunate Clymene hearing the cry on every ſide, They are dead, and Heſiode reveng'd, underſtood her Brothers were put to death, after having ſlain her dear Heſiode; for it was preſently known by ſome Shepherds, who had ſeen it, that theſe ambitious Brothers had murder'd him with Troilus, upon the Bank of the River Daphnus, near the place where it falls into the Sea; that afterwards they had thrown the two bodies into the Sea, one of which was caſt up again by the waves upon the ſhore, and the other brought by the Dolphins near the Cape of Rium. The Prince hearing Clymene was near the body of Heſiode, went thither to her, after he had diſpers'd all the incenſed multitude, who ſo well reveng'd the death of Heſiode, that they pull'd down a houſe ſtanding not far off, which belong'd to Antiphanes and Ganetor. But as ſoon as Clymene perceiv'd the Prince, ſhe ſhut her eyes that ſhe might not ſee him, and making a ſign to him with her hand to retire, turn'd her head towards the other ſide, and ſwoon'd with grief in the arms of Belintha. This ſad accident ſo affected the Prince of Locri, that fearing his preſence might occaſion the death of Clymene, if he ſhould continue near her, he intreated Belintha to take care of her, and retir'd. In the mean time, partly out of policy, and partly out of generoſity, he commanded the body of Heſiode to be interr'd near a Temple of Nemæa, in the Countrey of Locri, which ſtood in the midſt of a Wood; to the end it might be leſs in the ſight of the people, and that the remembrance of his death might be the ſooner worn out. Thus the Oracle which had formerly admoniſht Heſiode to beware of the Temple of Nemæa, was accompliſh'd, though Heſiode forſook Peloponneſus, that he might be at greater diſtance from the Temple of Nemæa, which is ſeen there. Belintha, after the body of Heſiode was remov'd from thence, caus'd Clymene to come again to her ſelf, and put her into a Chariot, into which her ſelf and her Aunt likewiſe enter'd and commanded him that drove it, to goe to a houſe of hers, which ſtood thirty Furlongs from thence. But, upon the way, whatever Conſolations were us'd to Clymene, ſhe anſwer'd nothing but, Heſiode is dead for my ſake, and I will dye for his. And accordingly this fair Virgin, who till then, imagin'd her ſelf ſtill upon the Sea-ſhore, near the body of Heſiode (ſo troubled was her mind, obſerving at length ſhe was in a Chariot, and no longer ſaw her dear Heſiode) believ'd they were carrying her to Locri, where the Prince would continue to importune her. Upon which, making a great ſhreek, Ah! no, no, (ſaid ſhe) it ſhall never be ſaid, that I live after my dear Heſiode, and go to a place where he can be no more. And immediately, as if ſhe had had the command of her Fates, ſhe fell down in ſo great a ſwound, that they were forc'd to ſtop the Chariot. Yet their ſuccor to her was in vain, for ſhe expir'd in the Arms of her Aunt, and her Friend, who were ready to dye with grief as well as ſhe. But at length, ſeeing their tears were unprofitable, they continued on their way in the moſt ſad manner imaginable. They had ſcarce gone five hundred paces into a Wood, but Lyſicrates, without knowing any thing of what had happened, came attended with ſeveral Horſemen to ſtop the Chariot, with intention to carry away Clymene, and to put her into a Ship, which he had provided for that purpoſe. But how ſtrangely was he ſurpriz'd, when, inſtead of living Clymene, he beheld the fair Clymene dead? Come, Lyſicrates, come, (ſaid Belintha to him, who knew his deſign) come ſee the fatal conſequences of your ambition! For if you had never been ambitious, Clymene had been still alive, her Brother and Hesiode would not have been dead, nor your self culpable and exil'd; but you would have been as happy as I foresee you will be miserable, for it is not possible you should be otherwise, after having caus'd so many miseries. Ah! Belintha (cry'd Lysicrates, alighting from his Horse, and approaching to her) that which you say is too true, and I too criminal to be excus'd. But death (added this despairing Lover) shall without doubt punish me for my crimes; for since I am the cause of that of the most excellent person that ever was, I am unworthy to live. And indeed to increase my despair, (continued he) I will believe the unfortunate Clymene did not love Hesiod, but only out of revenge, and that it must be imputed to me whatsoever she has suffer'd by her affection to him. But since it is not possible for us to live together, yet at least we must reside in the same tomb, and all I have acquir'd by my ambition, shall be employ'd in that Structure. Which fatal thought coming in an instant into Lysicrates's mind, Belintha and Clemene's Aunt endeavour'd to divert him from it; but in vain: for having a Chariot in that Wood, in which he had design'd to carry away Clymene to the Sea-side, which is not far distant from it, where a ship attended for him; he caus'd the body of Clymene to be taken by his followers, notwithstanding the tears and cries of these Ladies, and himself helpt respectfully to lift it into his Chariot. After which, he caus'd it to be put into his ship, and setting sail with all speed, cross'd the Ionian Sea, which is on the West side of Peloponnesus, and landed not far from the place where the River, which passes by the City of Elis, discharges it self into the Sea; and commanding Clymene's body to be carried into a Temple of Diana, which was near the Bank of that River, he perform'd to her, all the honors of Sepulture; which being done, he gave himself wholly to bewail her death, and caus'd a stately Tomb to be built for her, in building of which, he, according to his promise, bestow'd all the riches his ambition had gain'd him, reserving only enough for his subsistence during that time; and as soon as the Tomb was finisht, the unhappy Lover shut himself up in it, and dy'd for grief, in having been the cause of so many fatal accidents; though others have believ'd ambition had as great a share in his death as Love. Thus Clymene was reveng'd after her death; but she had not the said happiness to be in the same Tomb with Hesiode, who has had a glory transcending that of all others; for the Orchomenians, having consulted an Oracle, which promis'd them much felicity, if they could get the body of Hesiode into their power, they of Locri to hinder them from it, so carefully conceal'd the place of his Sepulture from strangers, that there are few persons know it. And moreover the Prince of Locri dying of Melancholly not long after, the Locrians augmented the honors which they paid to Hesiode's memory, whose very name intimates in his own language how purely he writ, and whose glory is so celebrated throughout the whole World, that it may be justly thought, it will be so in all Ages.

Amilcar having done reading this History of Hesiode, perceiv'd the minds of the Ladies were very much affected with it, and that instead of delighting the company, he had afflicted them. In truth (said Clelia) the death of Clymene affects me very sensibly. For my part (said Valeria,) I have a greater commiseration of Hesiode, than I am able to express. I have the like for Lysicrates (added Clydamira.) I am not of your opinion, (answered Berelisa) for I never have any pitty for those that have once ceas'd to love, though that Passion revive again in their hearts; and I compassionate only Hesiode and Clymene. My commiseration goes farther than yours (said Salonina;) for I pity poor Troilus too. But mine is yet greater than that you boast of, (answer'd Plotina smiling) for I am almost dead for fear, lest that poor Dog, so faithful to his Master, after having discover'd his Murderers, be lost in the multitude of people, or died of grief, after having lost both his Master and his Mistriss. All the company laught at the pity of Plotina, and went forth to walk in several troops, except Clelia, Valerius, Plotina, Anacreon, Herminius and Amilcar, who began to assault Plotina with raillery for her pity to Hesiode's dog. No, no, (interrupted Anacreon) do not set upon her with your jests for it; perhaps her pity of that poor Dog, has a more real foundation than ours, for the death of Clymene; for to speak sincerely, , though I am both a Greek and a Poet, and am somewhere mention'd in the Prophecie of Apollo, which you have read, yet I cannot but believe, but the History you have read, is almost all of it invented. Yet it is contriv'd ingeniously enough, (added he) for methinks, 'tis not only handsomer than the truth, but withal, more probable. History mentions nothing more of Hesiode, than that he dwelt at the Town of Ascra in Bœotia, near Helicon, that the Muses inspir'd him, and that an Oracle which spoke to him, admonisht him to avoid the Temple of Nemea, which is in Peloponnesus; that he travell'd into divers places, that he obtain'd the Golden Tripod, and that he got advantage over Homer, in the judgement of Panis.

There are some also who affirm these two persons did not live at the same time: however, all that have written of Hesiode, agree that he was at Locri, and content themselves to say, in three words, that he lodg'd at the house of Antiphates and Ganetor, who had a Sister, and suspecting him to be the confident of a Lover of hers, killed him together with his slave; that the body of the slave was found at a Cape or Promontory, which was afterwards call'd by the name of Troilus, in reference to him; that the body of Hesiode, was brought by Dolphins near a Temple of Neptune, where a great sacrifice was solemnising; that Hesiode's dog occasion'd the discovery of his murderers, who were torn in pieces by the people; and that for fear the Orchomenians should get away his body, they conceal'd the place of his burial. As for his Works, he that invented this History, has fictitiously ascrib'd to him only the Sonnet, the four Verses which he relates Hesiode to have spoken, and the Hymn which he makes him Author of for Neptune's Sacrifice. Now it cannot but be acknowledged, that fiction in this occasion has greater verisimilitude, than truth it self. When the purpose is to bring about extraordinary events it is no question handsomer to introduce lover in them than than any other cauſe; which has been practis'd by the inventor of this Hiſtory; for by feigning the love of the Prince of Locri, Lyſiarates, Heſiode, and Clymene, he has made you know all theſe different perſons; and oblig'd you to love them, which were to be the moſt unfortunate. In the next place, he has given probability to that which carry'd not much with it; for there is far more likelyhood, that two ambitious and wicked Brothers, ſhould be led to kill a man, whom they look'd upon as an obſtacle to their advancement, by hindring their Siſter from being favourable to a Prince, from whom they expected the making of their fortunes, than to kill him as a confident of their Siſters Lover; for, ſetting one crime againſt another, it was better to kill the Lover than the Confident. He has likewiſe had reaſon to ſuppoſe Heſiode Author of that Hymn of Neptune; for beſides that, ſuch a kind of compoſition is ſufficiently ſuitable to his ſtrain, it was a means to conciliate the peoples affection to him, who had newly heard thoſe Verſes ſung: and it ſeems ſome ſuch extraordinary cauſe was requiſite, to induce the people to that extraordinary action; It was alſo pertinent to make his wounds bleed afreſh at the preſence of the murderers, and to repreſent Clymene ſo tranſported, as to accuſe her brothers, without thinking to do it; for otherwiſe the people would have been very inconſiderate, to tear thoſe two men in pieces, only becauſe Heſiod's dog ſet upon them. Wherefore I conceive a man that ſhould have invented that which the Hiſtory ſpeaks concerning this adventure, had done incongruouſly; but he that compos'd the Fable Amilcar has read over, has made one according to the rules of Art. In truth (ſaid Herminius) he has made good uſe of all that Hiſtory ſupply'd him with: and I am wholly diſpos'd to believe, that if it was not ſo, it is poſſible to have been ſo: ſince nothing more commends a well-invented Fable, than thoſe hiſtorical foundations which are interweav'd throughout in it, and cauſe the Fiction to be receiv'd together with the truth. But to ſpeak unfeignedly, 'tis more difficult than is believ'd, to mingle thoſe two together aright: for they muſt be ſo handſomely blended, as not to be diſcerned one from another, and that which is invented, muſt generally ſeem more likely than the true: for Chance indeed may bring ſuch things about as are incredible, but it is not lawful for a man to invent ſuch as cannot be believ'd. If all that I have heard (ſaid Plotina) be not true, I require Amilcar to reſtore me the tears which I have ſhed, or invent ſome other Hiſtory as delightful as this is melancholly, or at leaſt to deſcribe how an invented Hiſtory ought to be made, ſo as to be good: for, as for my part (added ſhe agreeably) were I to invent a Hiſtory, I think I ſhould make things much more perfect than they are. All Women ſhould be admirably fair, and all Men ſhould be as valiant as Hector, all my Heroes ſhould ſlay at leaſt a hundred men in every battel, I would build Palaces of precious ſtones, I would make Prodigies fall out every moment, and without troubling my ſelf to invent with judgement, I ſhould ſuffer my fancy to act as it pleaſed; ſo that ſeeking out only ſurpriſing events, without examining, whether they were conſiſtent to reaſon or no, I ſhould certainly make very extraordinary things; a continual Shipwracks, burning of Cities, and a thouſand other like accidents, which occaſion handſome lamentations and deſcriptions. Plotina ſpoke this with a certain ſprightly air, which made it apparent, ſhe knew ſufficiently, what ſhe ſaid, was not that which ought to be done, and that ſhe only deſign'd to draw Anacreon, Herminius, and Amilcar to ſpeak, who no doubt were able to ſpeak excellently upon this Subject. And accordingly ſhe obtain'd the end ſhe propos'd to her ſelf: for Anacreon not knowing her yet ſufficiently to be acquainted with all the ingenious ſubtilty ſhe made profeſſion of, turning towards her, and beholding her with a ſmile; Should you invent a Hiſtory after the manner you ſpeak of, amiable Plotina, (ſaid he) you would do a thing no doubt ſufficiently ſtrange; for with rare Events, wonderful Deſcriptions, heroical Actions, extraordinary Matters, and Palaces of precious Stones, you would make one of the lewdeſt Fables that can be poſſibly invented; there being without doubt nothing worſe, than to ſee things of this nature made without order and reaſon: Is there any thing imaginable more ſtrange, than when 'tis in ones power to make ſuch events fall out as he pleaſes, yet to introduce ſuch as can never poſſibly arrive? But yet (ſaid Plotina) how comes it to be ſo, and wherein is my opinion ſo abſurd? Becauſe (anſwer'd Anacreon) when you invent a Fable, your purpoſe is to be believ'd, and the true art of Fiction is handſomely to reſemble truth. For when this rule is deſerted, there is no longer any difficulty in any thing whatſoever, and there is no more proper occaſion to diſplay the wit, than to invent without judgement. For my part (ſaid Clelia) I well underſtand what Anacreon ſpeaks; for certainly things which have reſemblance with truth, and ſeem poſſible to happen, affect far more, than thoſe which cannot either be believ'd or fear'd: But if an Hiſtorian of this kind (anſwer'd Valeria) never relates things but ſuch as appear to be true, and are of eaſie belief, methinks his compoſures will be extream vulgar, and not much delightful. You are upon a tender point, Valeria (reply'd Amilcar) for in diſallowing things incredible and impoſſible, it is not intended to imploy only ſuch as are mean and common; there is a third way to be taken, which is the moſt delighful of all, and moſt reaſonable. Wonderful accidents are ſo far from being forbidden, that they are neceſſary, provided they do not happen too often, and produce handſome effects; only odd and impoſſible things are abſolutely condemned. For 'tis the occaſion of diſparaging the credit of the whole, when one thing is preſented that ſurpaſſes belief. When any Slave of mine has told me a lye but once, I afterwards ſuſpect all that he tells me; judge then if I can believe a man, who ſhould recount extraordinary adventures to me, which my reaſon cannot conſider as poſſible. So that impoſſible things, and ſuch as are low and common, muſt almoſt equally be avoided, and ſuch ways of invention follow'd, as are at once both ſtrange and natural; for without this laſt quality, no wonder can pleaſe a reaſonable perſon. I conceive, (anſwer'd Herminius) whoſoever will invent

such kind of adventures, as may both instruct and delight, he ought to consider all the World in general, as a Painter beholds his Pattern when he is at work. And as diversity or variety is the Soul of the World, he ought to take heed of making all men Heroes, all Women equally fair, the dispositions and humors of all particular persons alike and correspondent, and Love, Anger, Jealousie, Hatred, to produce always the same effects. On the contrary, he must imitate that admirable variety, which is seen in all men, according to the example of Homer. Which is not unknown to two Ladies I see here present; for there is seen so great a variety of representations in his Works, that 'tis not one of the things which makes me most admire him. Those two Lovers, who, in the beginning of their contest with one another, about a Captive Virgin, being of different tempers, act also after a different manner; and though they are both possess'd with the same passion, do not take the same course. There is seen in Paris, a representation of disorderly love, in which Virtue has no part; in Hector and Andromache, an Idea of virtuous love; in Patroclus and Achilles, one of Heroical friendship, and the better to understand this variety of Characters wherewith Homer has adorn'd his Works, it needs only to take notice in general, of Agamemnon, Nestor, Achilles, Ulysses, Ajax, Menelaus, Diomedes, Paris, Helen, Hector, Andromache, Priam, Penelope, and of so many others, even to the pleasant Characters, as that of Thersites, which is so particularly excellent, But 'tis moreover worth observation, that the persons which Homer introduces, are presently known and familiar to the Readers, because they always act according to the temper he attributes to them. Wherefore heed must be taken not to confound these different Characters: but above all things, the nature of the passions ought necessarily to be understood, and what they work in the hearts of those who are possess'd with them, after having describ'd them for such and such persons: for every one has his manner of loving according to his own humor. You have reason (answer'd Plotina) and I begin to conceive well what you say: but since any one may invent a History, why is it not lawful to invent all things, and to suppose such Countreys as are no where in the World; for it would spare much pains. 'Tis true (replyed Anacreon) but it would also diminish much of the pleasure for, if such places and persons only were us'd as were never heard of, there would be the less curiosity in the minds of the Readers to know them: and the imagination finding all things new, would be inclin'd to doubt of all; whereas on the contrary, when an Age is made choice of, which is not so remote, but that some particularities of it are known, not so near, as that all the passages of it be too well understood, which notwithstanding is so between both; that events may be introduc'd in it, which an Historian may probably have been ignorant of, or ought not to have related; there is more conveniency to make handsomer things than if all were invented. For when names of Countreys are employed, which all the World hears of, and wherewith Geography is exactly acquainted; and when great events are made use of, which are sufficiently known, the mind is wholly dispos'd to suffer it self to be seduc'd, and to receive the fiction together with the truth, provided it be handsomly interwoven, and the Writer take pains to study the Age well he makes choice of, to improve all the rarities of it, and to conform to the customs of places he treats of, not to mention Laurels in Countreys where there was never any seen, not to confound the Religions or Customs of Nations that are introduc'd; though they may with judgement be a little drawn to the usage of the present age, to the end they may be the more delightful; I am confident if this be observ'd, and they which are introduc'd in a Fable of this nature, speak well, the passions be well painted out, the adventures be natural and prudently invented, all the little matter which discover the bottom of mens hearts, be pertinently plac'd; Vice be blam'd, Virtue rewarded, and Variety dispers'd through the whole, without confusion, if the fancy be always subject to the judgement, extraordinary events be rationally grounded; if there be knowledge, without affectation, delight, ornament, and pleasantness, wherever it is necessary; if the style be neither too high nor too low, and no violence offer'd to decency and good manners; I am confident, I say, such a Work wil please all that read it, be more delightful to them than a History, and withal be more profitable. For a person who writes the History of a Prince, can blame only the vices of him whose life he writes: but he that undertakes to compose an ingenious Fable, may take occasion, if he please, to condemn all Vices, and teach all Virtues. And therefore I wish, with all my heart, Herminius and Amilcar would set about a composition of this nature. As for Amilcar (answer'd Clelia, I must dissuade him from it; for according to the humor he is of, he will never be able to resolve to blame inconstancy: but for Herminius, who makes profession of being constant, and knows all virtues, I wish he would take the pains to do it. I assure you (reply'd he) I should gladly undertake it, if I believ'd I could do it as well as I apprehend it might be done; for I am perswaded a Map of the World, and that a little embelish't, would be a very delightful thing, and withal very profitable, But to speak freely, the undertaking is more difficult than it seems, and I believe it is easier to write a handsome History, than to compose an accurate Fable, after the manner I apprehend it may be made. Yet it is requisite an Historian have great accomplishments; he must have a wit of great extent which his fancy must adorn when it is needful, both which his judgement must guide and restrain, when 'tis convenient, and his memory ought never to be unfaithful to him. He must have an universal knowledge of the World, of the interest of Princes, and the humors of Nations; policy must not be unknown to him, nor the art of War; he must understand to describe battels; and, which is most of all necessary, he must be able perfectly to represent those Wars of the Closet, which are met with in all Courts, which consist in intrigues, delusions, and negotiations, true or feign'd, and which notwithstanding are of such importance, that 'tis in them the seeds are sown of the most considerable Wars, and on which the ruine or felicity of Nations, as well as the verity of Hiſtory depends. It is requiſite alſo to be skilful, how to repreſent the different paſſions of Princes, as thoſe which govern; not to ſay too much, or too little of them, and never to write any thing, but what inſtructs or delights, and is either good or pleaſant. However when a man is provided with faithful memorials, has liv'd himſelf in the world, and has part of the qualities neceſſary to an Hiſtorian, 'tis eaſie to make a Hiſtory not wholly bad. But to compoſe an accurate Fable, adorn'd with all that can render it agreeable or profitable, I conceive it neceſſary, not only to have all that I ſaid was requiſite to an Hiſtorian, but to have a hundred knowledges more comprehenſive and particular. Such a Writer muſt be (as I may ſo ſpeak) the Creator of his Work; he muſt underſtand the art of ſetting forth Virtue, and exhibiting it as a thing not difficult to be practis'd. He muſt know the World, not only as the Author of a Hiſtory ought, but he muſt underſtand the handſome mode of the World perfectly, politeneſs of converſation, the art of ingenious raillery, and that of making innocent Satyrs; nor muſt he be ignorant of that of compoſing of Verſes, writing Letters, and making Orations. He muſt alſo know (as I may ſo ſpeak) the ſecrets of all hearts, and be ignorant of not one of all the commendable Sciences; of which occaſion may be ſometimes offer'd to ſpeak by the way. But above all things, he muſt know how to take away plainneſs and drineſs from Morality, and ſet it off in a dreſs ſo natural and ſo agreeable, that it may divert all thoſe to whom it gives inſtruction; and as Ladies break not their Looking-glaſſes which ſhow them the defects which they amend when they know; ſo they may not hate a Work wherein they oftentimes ſee things which none durſt ſpeak to them of, and which they would never ſpeak of to themſelves, Whence it is eaſie to judge, that it is much more difficult to make a Work of this nature, than to write a Hiſtory. You diſcourſe admirably well (anſwer'd Anacreon). I am of your opinion (added Amilcar): but that which ſeems ſtrange to me, is, that if it were poſſible to find one that had compos'd a Fable of this nature, yet there would alſo be found a great number of people, who would ſpeak of it but as of a meer trifle, and an unprofitable amuſement: and I know divers antient Senators here, and alſo ſeveral Roman Matrons, who would be ſo affrighted with a Love-ſtory, that they would abſolutely forbid their Children from caſting their eye upon any ſuch. That conceit, (anſwer'd Herminius) ſeems very unjuſt; for Love is not learnt in Books, nature teaches it all men; and in all places through which I have travell'd, I have found love every where: But I have found it more groſs, brutiſh, and criminal, amongſt people of no politeneſs, and ſuch as are wholly ignorant of handſome gallantry, than amongſt perſons of worth and civil education. And beſides, if it were unfit to read Books wherein Love is treated of, we muſt forbear reading of Hiſtories, in which we find examples of all crimes, and wherein oftentimes the Criminals are happy, and cauſe deſire in ſome to imitate them. One day, Hiſtory will record the abominable action of Sextus, the miſerable death of Servius Tullus, the unjuſt Loves of Tarquin and Tullia, and a thouſand other things of dangerous example; which need not be in a Fable according to the way I underſtand; for therein modeſty may always be joyn'd with love, and no criminal loves be ever related, which prove not in the end unhappy. For my part (ſaid Clelia,) I think it more important than is believ'd, to ſhew that there may be innocent loves and delightful together, for there are but too many who think this can never be. No doubt, Madam, you have reaſon (anſwer'd Herminius) wherefore thoſe good Senators, and ſevere Matrons are too blame for hindring their Children from reading a Work wherein they might find wherewith to underſtand the practice of all Virtues, and by the advantages of which they might ſpare the pains of travelling, to become perſons of worth and accompliſht; ſince there may be made ſo handſome a Map of the World, that it might be ſeen in Epitome, without going forth of their Cloſet. And as for Ladies, I conceive likewiſe that the reading of ſuch a Work as I am ſpeaking of, would rather hinder them from admitting of Gallants, than induce them to entertain them; for if they would compare the love pretended to them, with that they found deſcrib'd in a Book of this Nature, they would apprehend ſo much difference between them, that they would never ſuffer themſelves to be mov'd with it. I add moreover confidently, that ſuch a Book might not only teach all Virtues, blame all Vices, and reprove all the little defects the World is full of, but it might alſo teach to reverence the gods, by the example given in the perſons of Heroes, propos'd for a pattern; and that of whatever Nation or Religion the Reader be of, he might be profited by it, For when I behold a Roman adore the gods of his Countrey, I am not backward to improve by the example, (though I am an African) and thereby to remember I ought to worſhip thoſe of my own Countrey. Therefore I do not weigh the moroſity of ſome unreaſonable people, who blame a Work of this nature; but at the venture of undergoing their injuſtice, I wiſh I were the Author of one. For I, being contented with my own intention, ſhould comfort my ſelf againſt the ſeverity of a few perſons with the general applauſs of the World, and the peculiar knowledge I had of the profitableneſs of this kind of Work in which may be had experience without the aſſiſtance of old age, precepts without ſeverity, innocent Satyrs, judgement which coſts nothing, and the means to learn that art of the World, without which it is unpoſſible ever to be acceptable. If you make one (ſaid Plotina) I promiſe you to read it with pleaſure: For my part (added Clelia) I promiſe my admiration to Herminius. I promiſe him more than you (added Valeria) for I promiſe him to reform many defects which I have. For what concerns me (ſaid Anacreon) I engage my ſelf to ſing his glory. And for my part (anſwer'd Amilcar) I promiſe him to read it with delight, to eſteem it highly, to commend it in all places, and to do nothing which he ſhall ſay, for I never do any thing but what I ſay to my ſelf.

And

And beſides, he has ſuch an inclination to conſtant love, that I ſhould never conform to it. After this, all the company uniting again, the Muſick began, and then the Collation was ſerv'd, which was as magnificent as the harmony was melodious; after which the converſation was extreamly agreeable. But it being ſufficiently late, the company ſeparated themſelves with the ſorrow of knowing they ſhould loſe Telanus the next morning, becauſe the Figure which the Veientines were to deliver, was to arrive at Rome the day following. Clelia indeed was exempted from this diſcontent, though ſhe very highly eſteem'd Telanus; becauſe thinking of nothing but what might have ſome correſpondence with the paſſion ſhe had in her Soul, ſhe only mus'd upon the death of Heſiode, imagining what grief ſhe ſhould reſent, if during the War which was beginning between Porſenna and Rome, her dear Aronces ſhould happen to periſh in it,

CLELIA.
A New Romance.

The Fourth PART.

The Third BOOK.

THE people of Rome understanding, the figure made at Veii by Tarquin's command, was arriv'd, testified an extream joy thereupon. Nothing so easily communicating it self as superstition in the minds of the Multitude. The Consul Horatius in the absence of Publicola, caus'd the figure to be plac'd in the Temple of Jupiter, and gave permission to Telanus to return. So that having no pretext to continue long-er at Rome, he was constrain'd to depart from thence, and take leave of those illustrious persons, with whom he had pass'd some dayes so delightfully. 'Tis true, he left his heart with the aimiable Plotina, and return'd with his mind so fill'd with the excellency of his Lady, that as couragious as he was, he heartily wisht the war would soon be end-ed. He parted from Aruleat with much dearness, notwithstanding his being his Rival; but for the three other his Rivals, he bad them not adieu. His civility was greater towards Clelia, to whom he made a thousand protestations of friendship, as like-wise to Octavius, who being better recover'd, had a long conversation with him before his departure, to oblige him to serve Aronces to the utmost of his power, since he was going to be of the same Party, intreating him to be confident, that if he could find occasion of seeing him, he would promote his inte-rests faithfully with Clelius, and against Horatius. After which this generous Veientine having thanked Clelius for all the favours he had received from him, departed from Rome, where the same day there arri-v'd news which was no very acceptable. For in-telligence was brought, that Porsenna was so dili-gent in assisting Tarquin, that in a little time the troops of Veii and Tarquinia, would be united with his; and that he had resolv'd to be in person in the head of his Army. It was also inform'd that Publi-cola would return within three dayes, because hav-ing been advertiz'd by Herminius, that there was beginning of division in the Senate since his de-parture, he judged it more important to take care for the assuring of Rome, than to preserve the out-places of it. Besides his Army being too weak to undertake to sustain the first attempt of that of the King of Hetruria, when the Forces of the Veientines, and those of Tarquin should be added to it, he thought it better to let the Enemies tire and wea-ken themselves, before he offered to fight them. The vertue of Publicola being highly respected by all the Romans, the news of his return produc'd a good effect in Rome. They who had begun to di-vide themselves reunited, and had not the bold-ness but to appear zealous for their Country, before a man, who had no other interest, and who, having all the People at his devotion, might easily punish them for their delinquency. The return of Publi-cola was no doubt very acceptable to Valeria; but Mutius coming back with him, diminisht part of her joy; because he had such a kind of haughtiness in his deportment, that she had rather this impe-rious Lover would always have been at the war, than return'd to Rome. The forces being also to come back, Clidamira and Berelisa thought fit to defer their journey to Praneste, till the return of the Army: and moreover Artimidorus being at Rome, they had no great impatience to leave it. But as for this Prince, he ardently wisht Berelisa had been there alone, having scarce any opportunity of see-ing her without Clidamira; for which reason he took no delight in seeing her, and was more fre-quently with Clelia than with her; for this aimi-able Lady looking upon him as Aronces his friend, and a wise, good and discreet Prince, to whom she might communicate all the secrets of her soul, had very much affection and complacency for him. As they were one day together, a Slave of Artimidorus brought him a Letter, which oblig'd him to take leave of her, without telling her the cause of it. Tho the same night he return'd to her, to beseech her she would please to take a walk the next day with Valeria, Cesonia, and Plotina, in a Garden not far from the Sublician bridge. Clelia not easing for divertisement, desir'd to be excus'd; but Artimido-rus telling her the business was to do a good office to Valeria, and that he could not discover more of it to her, she promis'd she would be ready when Cesonia, Valeria, and Plotina should come to call her, knowing Sulspicia would not refuse to let her go with those Ladies, her dear friends. And accordingly the next morning, they whom Artemidorus had nam'd, came to her house, there being no men in the company be-sides Artemidorus and Herminius. As they were go-ing to the Garden, Clelia ask'd Valeria what service she desir'd of her? I should rather (answer'd she) desire to know what I may do for your service; for Artemidorus has told me you had need of me in rela-tion to some affair. It is to be believ'd then (reply'd Clelia) that 'tis he that has need of us: but, in refe-rence to my self I cannot but think him too blame for taking such a course, since I should serve him with joy. In my opinion (said Valeria) it must be for something which Berelisa is concern'd. Then they asked Cesonia and Plotina, if they knew what the bu-ſineſs was, which occaſioned their going to that Garden. For my part (anſwered the firſt) I know no more of it, but that Artemidorus told me you both deſir'd me to accompany you thither, and to take Plotina with me. 'Tis ſome ſatisfaction to me (ſaid Clelia) that we ſhall ſoon know what the buſineſs is with us. When theſe Ladies were arriv'd at the gate of that garden, where Artemidorus and Herminius waited for them, they lighted from their Chariot, and entered into the Garden, where they found no perſon at all; wherefore they demanded what was the deſign of their coming thither. Be not impatient (anſwered he) you ſhall know it preſently; but you ſhall not know altogether, but ſeverally, what has induc'd me to deceive you, and bring you hither; at leaſt Clelia and Valeria ſhall be together in one place, whilſt Ceſonia and Plotina ſhall be in another. If Artemidorus had not been well known to theſe four perſons, this would have occaſion'd ſtrange thoughts in them: but being aſcertained how prudent and diſcreet he was, their curioſity did not inquiet their minds at all. But (ſaid Plotina) I deſire to be ſatisfied, whether Herminins be more knowing than we are; He ſhall be ſo preſently (anſwered Artemidorus) for he ſhall know all, that ſhall be told Clelia and Valeria, tho not till after them. For my part (ſaid Herminius) I deſire never to know any thing concerning my friends, but what they are willing I ſhould. After this Artemidorus having been to give order that none ſhould be admitted into the Garden, led Ceſonius and Plotina into a walk which was on the far ſide, where they found an old man, who no ſooner beheld Plotina, but he knew her, altho it was a very long time ſince he had ſeen her. But this fair Virgin could not know him otherwiſe than by his voice, and was ſome time before ſhe could recollect her ſelf. At length calling him to mind, ſhe teſtified much joy to ſee him, and believing he was her Uncle, made him a thouſand careſſes. Alas! (ſaid ſhe to him, embracing him) where have you been for ſo long time? You ſhall know (anſwered he) when I have opportunity to tell you without any other witneſs than Ceſonia, to whom I know you have ſuch great obligations, that 'tis fit ſhe be acquainted with all your fortune. Alas! (reply'd Plotina) my fortune is very eaſie to know; for when I have ſaid I have loſt my father and my mother, while I was yet in the cradle, and alwayes liv'd with the vertuous Ægeſide your wife, till my departure from Ardea, I ſhall have ſaid almoſt all. You ſo little know your ſelf (anſwer'd this ſage old man) that you cannot well ſpeak of your ſelf, till after I have told you who you are. Artemidorus judging that his preſence was not neceſſary in this place, and knowing that it was elſewhere, left Ceſonia and Plotina with him that had ſo many important things to tell them, and returned to Clelia, Valeria, and Herminius. But to accompliſh his deſign, he intreated Herminius to ſtay with him, and deſir'd thoſe two perſons that they would pleaſe to go a ſide into a little Garden ſeparated from the great one, where there was a little knot of flowers, enclos'd with pales and myrtles. So that theſe two fair virgins ſeeing there was no great danger in doing what Artemidorus deſir'd, enter'd into it. Which they had no ſooner done, but they beheld Aronces appear, coming forth of a little Arbor at a corner of the Garden. This ſight ſurpris'd them ſtrangely, but eſpecially Clelia, who in the firſt inſtant reſented nothing but joy in ſeeing her dear Aronces. Who, as ſoon as he beheld her, ſaluted her very reſpectfully, and approacht towards her with all the tranſport that a true love can cauſe in a Lover, whoſe heart is tender and ſenſible, when he again ſees the Perſon he loves, after a long abſence. I have at length, Madam, (ſaid he to her) in ſpight of all the obſtacles that oppoſe my happineſs, at leaſt the ſatisfaction of being able to tell you all my misfortunes, and to underſtand from your mouth, what you will command me to do. Being aſſur'd Valeria knows all the ſecrets of your heart, that ſhe is generous, good and faithful, I have been willing ſhe ſhould know I am here; for tho I have the unhappineſs to have a father who is Tarquin's Protector, yet, I think, I ought not to be ſuſpected by her. You have reaſon my Lord (anſwered that diſcreet Virgin) not to be diſtruſtful of me; for I have ſo high an eſteem of your vertue, that excepting Clelia, there is no perſon in the world was more affected with your loſs than my ſelf: and indeed (added ſhe) I ſee already ſo much fright upon Clelia's countenance, for ſeeing you ſo near Rome, where you have more violent enemies than you believe, that I cannot but fear leſt you ſhould be ſeen. And therefore whilſt you are ſpeaking with Clelia, it will be convenient for me to take care that you be not perceiv'd. Clelia would have withheld her; but ſhe retir'd back to the gate, where Artemidorus and Herminins were diſcourſing together, and from whence ſhe might ſee, but not hear them. Aſſoon as ſhe was at a convenient diſtance, Clelia addreſſing to him, I confeſs to you, Aronces, (ſaid ſhe) the firſt ſentiment I had in ſeeing you, affoted me joy, but alas! my reaſon begins to deſtroy it; for my father hates you almoſt as much as he formerly lov'd you; Horatius loves me more ardently than ever; his Kinſman is the ſecond Conſul, and Publicola is not at Rome. My brother no doubt is alwayes for your intereſts; but my father has ſo ſtrong a belief it was you that wounded him in the battel, that he cannot indure you ſhould be nam'd in his preſence; and when he goes to exaggerate your wounding of his ſon with the ſame ſword he had given you heretofore, he is ſo tranſported againſt you, that my mother dares not ſo much as offer to excuſe you. I have here underſtood this unjuſt accuſation by Artemidorus (anſwered Aronces); but if it were as eaſie for me to be happy, as it will be to juſtifie my ſelf from it, I ſhould be leſs to be pityed than I am. For it was not poſſible for me to have that ſword at the battel, in which I ſerved Rome happily enough, and Octavius was wounded, ſince Tarquin caus'd me to be put in priſon at my departure out of Rome, and it was taken from me; and when I got out of priſon, there was no care taken to reſtore it to me; for I underſtood the Prince had given it to an Officer who took me. Beſides, the ſword I had in the battel when I was taken with Horatius, was broken in my hands before I was made priſoner. Thus this accuſation fals of it ſelf; and if I had known it ſooner, I ſhould have long ſince been juſtified in the opinion of Clelius and Octavius. As for my brother (anſwered ſhe) he has been generous to believe that you wounded him unawares, and to ſay, it did not belong to the ſon of Clelius to revenge an injury done to the Prince of Numidia. But, for my father, tho he may be convinc'd, you did not wound my brother, he will not reſtore you to the place you held in his heart, as long as the King of Hetruria ſhall be Tarquin's Protector, and Rome's enemy. Not but that he ſpeaks

things which seem to have some contrariety; for if you should desert the party of the King your father, and come to side with Rome, he would think the action unworthy of you; and however, when you do all that you ought, he will account you unworthy of me; and to this effect, he speaks to me as often as occasion is presented. But what then must I do (answered Aronces) can I not be the Son of the King of Hetruria? Does it depend on me to cause him to take which side pleases me; Can I be suspected to love Tarquin, to hate so many illustrious Friends as I have at Rome, and not to prefer you above all things? Is it in my power to reverse the Laws and Reason, and to cause Vertue to permit me to bear Arms against the King my Father, and not to bear them against a Rival so couragious and redoubtable as Horatius. I beseech you, Madam, (continu'd he) consider well the state of my fortune, as I am going to represent it to you, and then pronounce absolutely upon it. I know you have a great mind, a heart very noble, and a soul extreamly generous; and I will also believe that you love me as much as you can love, tho in a degree infinitely below that in which I love you; therefore I engage my self confidently to do what ever you shall appoint me. But, I beseech you, have some consideration of my glory, as I should have of yours; and if you can find no means to reconcile my love and my honour, and to make me be both innocent and happy, I conjure you command me to die; for death shall be more sweet to me, than the cruel adventure of losing you, or committing a dishonourable action would be. Alas! my Lord, (reply'd Clelia) what do you desire of an unfortunate person? Would you have her counsel you against her own interests? By no means (answered Aronces) for I have none separated from yours; but I desire you would tell me positively what you would have me to do; and especially (added he) do not treat me as the Son of the King of Hetruria; remember the unknown Aronces, and believe you can do nothing more disobliging to me, than to speak as you did but now. I desire your pardon for it (said she to him) but since you will have me tell you what I think, first tell me how you came hither; for I believ'd you still a prisoner. Aronces then obeying Clelia, told her in few words, all that had befallen him since he last saw her, tho she knew a good part of it before, he told her likewise of the visit he had receiv'd from the Queen his Mother, and the Princess of the Latines, and of the proposition the Queen had made him to feign himself amorous of that Princess, that he might know whether Clelia, who had a scrupulous mind would not take it ill that he consented to it, tho it was onely to hinder the King of Ceres's Daughter from being propounded to him in marriage. He added, that, seeing himself in so unhappy a condition, without being able to resolve what he should do, he excited so much pity, in him that guarded him in the Castle whereinto he was put, that tho he hazarded very much to satisfie him, he let him go forth one night upon his word, with an oath to return the third day, at the same hour. But how will your guards (said Clelia) not perceive that you are not in the Castle? By pretending that I am sick, (answer'd he) and that I am not willing to admit any person to see me. And the better to colour the pretence, there is a Slave lies in my bed; and another, who is privy to the business, makes shew of waiting upon me, according to his ordinary custome; and besides he that commands those that guard me, is so much at the devotion of the Queen my Mother, who, he knows, embraces all my interests, that he hazards himself less in obliging me. But in brief, generous Clelia, the main importance is to consider, what I may, and what I ought to do. If I side with Rome, I am an unnatural Son, I ruin my self in the opinions of all persons of honour, and consequently in that of Clelius; I serve my Rival, I defend his life, and fight for his party; but yet I am near you, I see you daily, and dispute the possession of your heart against the merits of my enemies. On the other side, if I serve the King my Father, I do that which vertue and honour obliges me to, and I see my self with my sword in hand against Horatius; but withal I serve Tarquin and Sextus, whom I hate in perfection, I am an enemy to Clelius and Octavius, my dearest Friends, Vertue, Rome, and to all that is dearest to me; and which is most cruel, I am absent from you, I abandon you in a manner to my Rival, and I have onely your constancy to put an obstacle to his happiness. Thus, on which side soever I consider my condition, I am alwayes the most miserable of men. There might be a third course propounded to me; but as for that, Madam, I confess to you, I cannot embrace it, and that it is not possible for me to resolve to continue in prison, without taking one side; and poorly to expect the end of the War, inclos'd within four walls, without doing any thing but against my self and you, whilst Horatius is covering himself with glory, and forcing Clelia to recompence his services. This being so, there are but two things to be examin'd; speak therefore, Madam, and pronounce absolutely what my destiny must be. If I were happy enough to see the King my Father, as equitable in his sentiments for you as the Queen my Mother, I should have other matters to propound to you; but altho a King's Son, I have no assured retreat to offer you any where, tho I where able to perswade you to follow my Fortune. And moreover you have so often told me, you can never render me happy, if Clelius consent not to it, that your vertue supports mine in this occasion. But after all, (added he, transported with the excess of his Love) Why do not we couragiously abandon our selves and the interests of Rome, and go to another end of the World, to seek a Sanctuary where we may live together? Our vertue would find us Protectors every where; and if your sentiments were like mine, we would be unhappy in no place, provided our Fortune were inseparable. I beseech you, (answer'd Clelia, discreetly) let us not amuse our selves to speak of a matter, whereof we ought not to think, and which we shall never do. Consider then the two propositions I have made you, (reply'd he) and then tell the unhappy Aronces what you please shall become of him. You know so well (answer'd Clelia) that I will never counsel you to do any thing you may be reproacht for, and which may be prejudicial to you, that you might spare me the grief of telling you my self, that you ought to follow that which reason directs you to; what that is, would be something difficult for me to tell you; and all that I can do, is to conjure you, that when you are in the War, you will remember my Father and my Brother may possibly be amongst the enemies you fight against, that you may avoid meeting them with your sword in your hand; for if by ill Fate you ſhould wound either of them two, you know I cannot without a crime retain any kindneſs longer for you. Think upon this my dear Aronces, and be generous enough to ſerve the cruel Tarquin and unjuſt Sextus with regret; but above all things (added ſhe bluſhing) when you feign love to the Princeſs of Leontines, who I am told is very aimable, defend your heart againſt her charms, and remember whilſt you are with her, there is an unfortunate perſon at Rome, who will treat Horatius ill for your ſake, and who is like to be ill treated her ſelf, becauſe ſhe will perſiſt faithful to you. Ah! Madam, (cry'd Aronces) can you think me capable of ſuch a weakneſs as this? No, (anſwer'd Clelia) but I can fear it, tho I cannot believe it. That diſtinction is very nice, (reply'd he) for people uſe not to fear except that which they can believe, and no perſon ever much apprehended impoſſible things. Do not fear therefore, Madam, that I can ever ceaſe to love you, for you ſhall be alwayes my firſt and laſt Miſtreſs; and there is onely glory alone that has any ſhare of my heart with you, tho I am perſwaded I ſhould love it much leſs than I do, If I lov'd not you. Live then with ſatisfaction in this reſpect, and ſuffer me to fear with more reaſon, that whilſt I ſhall act by conſtraint as an enemy of Rome, the love of your Countrey may deſtroy a love ſo juſt and innocent as mine in your heart, and that whilſt I am fighting againſt Horatius, as a redoubtable Rival, he do not get the advantage of me in your affection. He will ſee you every day, you will hear nothing but vowes made againſt me, all will be diſſembled that makes for my advantage, and you will hear no good ſpoken of the unhappy Aronces, but what you ſhall ſpeak to your ſelf in ſeeret. On the contrary, all the actions of the Romans ſhall be imbelliſh'd and extoll'd, and eſpecially thoſe of my Rival; ſo that by degrees it may come to paſs, that you may change your ſentiments, and I ſhall be left to die with deſpair. No, no, my dear Aronces, (anſwered Clelia) do not fear, I will be ever guilty of any inconſtancy towards you; or at leaſt do not fear I can ever be capable of loving, after I have lov'd you. But that which afflicts me, is, that I cannot make vows for your party, but ſhall be enforc'd to make ſuch as are contrary to it; and I doubt alſo whether ſtrict vertue will permit me to make any for you in particular. However, I am reſolv'd I will (added ſhe without giving him leaſure to interrupt her) and at the ſame time that I pray to the Gods Rome may gain the victory, I will beſeech them to preſerve you, and hinder you from hurting all the perſons which ought to be dear to me; and thus accommodating my innocence and my affection the beſt I can, I ſhall no doubt lead the unhappieſt life in the World. But there is remedy; for as I ſhould not forſake the intereſt of my Father for your ſake, ſo I will not oblige you to abandon thoſe of yours for mine: Beſides, as I told you, it would be no advantage to you with Clelius. Go then my dear Aronces; let us at leaſt have nothing to reproach our ſelves for; perhaps our Patience will weary our bad Fortune, and oblige the Gods to render us happy. For when I reflect that it is poſſible for you to be diſcover'd, and that if the Conſul Horatius knew you were here, you would be arreſted the next moment, my mind is extreamly inquieted. The King of Hetruria would think that you caus'd your ſelf to be arreſted, my Father perhaps, would accuſe me of having conſented to to it, and indeed you would not be very happy to be a priſoner, in a place where I ſhould no more ſee you, than if you were in the enemies Camp, where you would be prejudiced in all reſpects, where you would perhaps at laſt depend on your enemies, and whence you would not be releas'd till the end of the War. Therefore 'tis better for you to be in a place, where you may ſerve my Father, my Brother, and your Friends, if they happen to become Priſoners to your ſide, and from whence perhaps I may alſo ſomtimes receive tidings from you. You have then abſolutely determin'd what my deſtiny muſt be (reply'd Aronces). I have not, (anſwered Clelia) but being I can never deſire any thing that is unjuſt, I ſubmit my will to reaſon, and content my ſelf to beſeech you to love me for ever, and to believe, that I ſhall be ſo faithful to you, that in caſe you ſhould prove inconſtant, I ſhould never love any perſon after. Be confident, Madam (reply'd Aronces), you ſhall never have occaſion to teſtifie that kind of fidelity: but if you do not promiſe me (added he) to be as fully aſſur'd of my conſtancy as I will be of yours, I think, I ſhall not be able to return; but without conſidering the particulars of my deſtiny, I will go find out Clelius. And withal (added he) I will undeceive him of the opinion he has of my wounding Octavius. It ſhall ſuffice (anſwer'd Clelia) that the Prince Artemidorus will take care to juſtifie you without your intermedling in it your ſelf. In the mean time (added ſhe) I think it fit to confide in Herminius, whoſe probity can never be ſuſpected by thoſe to whom he is known. 'Tis my intention, (reply'd Aronces): but before I ſee him, permit me, Madam, to bid you adieu here apart, ſince my hard Fate will not ſuffer me to continue with you; for the ſentiments of an amorous heart ought not to be divided.

Tell me then, Madam, that you will love me, that you will pity me, and that as ſoon as you can I ſhall be happy: and to aſſure you yet more of my fidelity, and take away all cauſe of doubting of it, know, that as often as you pleaſe, I will come, and give you an account of my actions, though I be put to enter Rome without a diſguiſe; that as often as you pleaſe you ſhall make my arms fall out of my hands; and in a word, that you ſhall be always abſolute Miſtreſs of my deſtiny. But permit me alſo to hope that I ſhall have a ſhare in all your thoughts, and that you can never be happy, till you have render'd me ſo. I promiſe you, (anſwer'd this fair perſon): but alas! (added ſhe ſighing) I fear we ſhall be alwayes miſerable, at leaſt, I know I am not able to foreſee by what means we ſhall ever become otherwiſe. Tarquin may die, (reply'd Aronces), the intereſts of the King my Father may change, I may perhaps bend his mind, peace may be concluded, Clelius may ceaſe to be unjuſt, and Horatius may be conſtrain'd to relinquiſh that which does not belong to him: therefore it is to be hop'd, that at length, by wayes which are unknown to us, Heaven will render us happy. 'Tis requiſite indeed (ſaid Clelia) to take up a hope to our ſelves, tho upon ill grounds, to avoid deſpair: but to ſpeak ſincerely, Fear is the Miſtreſs in my heart. Yet I will hide part of it, (continu'd ſhe) and content my ſelf to conjure you to preſerve your ſelf for my ſake. And now ſuffer me to call Valeria, Artimedorus, and Herminius, that you may depart; for tho the ſight of you cauſes all the sweetness of my life, yet I shall have no quiet, till I know you are return'd into your prison, where at least your life is in safety. Alas! I beseech you, Madam, (answer'd Aronces) that I may speak onely three or four words more to you, Speak then, (reply'd she) but speedily; for when once one has but three or four words to speak, 'tis almost as good to be silent. Alas! Madam (cry'd he) you know not what Love is, if you account three or four words nothing, since 'tis true, one favourable word affords a thousand and a thousand pleasures to remember it. Therefore give me some to keep in my memory, and to comfort me during an absence whose continuance is uncertain. Tell me then too, discreet person as you are, whether you love me? Alas! (answer'd Clelia) can you doubt of what I think, and can it be neeessary to tell you that which has been prov'd to you by a thousand testimonies of dearness? If it be not absolutely necessary, (reply'd he, looking upon her with much love) yet it is perfectly delightful: tell me then positively that you love me, and that you will love me eternally, to the end I may have something to supply me with comfort in my greatest misfortunes. I tell you all that can comfort you (answered Clelia): but after this ask no more of me, for I have nothing but tears to give you. Clelia had no sooner ended these words, but she made a sign to Valeria, that she should oblige Artemidorus and Herminius to approach towards them; and accordingly having fastned the door of this little Garden, they drew altogether. Then Aronces made a thousand caresses to Herminius; for as for Artemidorus he had seen him the evening before, having first discover'd and intrusted himself to him. Yet the discourse of these persons was not long, because Clelia was in such fear, least Aronces should be discover'd, that she was not satisfi'd till he was withdrawn into the Gardener's house, where he had passed the preceding night. Nevertheless Aronces first told Artemidorus and Herminius the reasons which oblig'd him to serve the King his Father against Rome, he intreated them to disabuse Clelius of that opinion, that it was he that had wounded Octavius, he conjur'd them to serve him with their mediation to him, to speak alwayes in his favour to Clelia, and to pity him, for being of a side, on which his heart was not, and not to love him less for it. It is so ordinary (answer'd Herminius) to see brave persons ingag'd to make war for unjust causes, that there is no intelligent person, but instead of blaming, will admire that which you do; and I am confident Clelius will esteem you more for continuing fixt to the interest of the King your Father, than if the love you bear to Clelia oblig'd you to come and side with Rome. For after you alone have caus'd us to gain the Battle, which put us in power to defend our selves, it is easie to know that if honour permitted you, you would do that again for Rome which you have done against its enemies. Be therefore assur'd, that for my part, I shall promote your interests vigorously, and that it shall be no fault of mine, if justice be not rendred to your Vertue. After this, these two illustrious Friends parted, but Artemidorus continu'd with Aronces, till the beginning of night, when he was to go away. Yet this generous Lover took his leave a second time of Clelia, with more dearness and tenderness than before. Herminius would willingly have staid with Aronces, as well as Artemidorus; but it was fear'd, that might cause it to be suspected, that there was some person hidden in the Garden; wherefore he went away with Clelia and Valeria, to rejoyn with Cesonia and Plotina, whom they beheld going out at the end of a walk, with an old man whom they did not know: who likewise took leave of them in that place, and went into the little Garden where Aronces and Artemidorus were. Well (said Herminius to Cesonia and Plotina) may I know your secret as well as I do that of Clelia and Valeria's. No question but you shall know it, (answer'd Plotina) for I have so great need of the generous Sevelia, that without her I should scarce know what to do with the secret which has been reveal'd to me. In the mean time (added she) since there is no person here in whom I may confide, I shall not scruple to say, that this secret is so important to me, that it has inform'd me I am not what I alwayes took my self to be; for I believ'd I was born at Ardea, and I was not; I thought I was the Daughter of a man, who was only Friend to my late Mother, and I am quite another Person than what I imagin'd. Clelia hearing Plotina speak thus, could not contain, notwithstanding the other imployment of of her thoughts, from asking her who she was. Alas! my dear Clelia, (answer'd she) perhaps you will know but too soon; however, I would tell you at this instant, but having been made to promise not to speak of it yet, I must be contented to tell you, that I am that, which I should never have believ'd I could be; and I conjure you to promise me, that when you know who I am, you will not love me for it less. I assure you (reply'd Clelia) that the friendship I have for you being founded upon your merit, tho your birth should be less noble than I have believ'd it, I would not change the sentiment, I have for you. That which you say is very generous (said Cesonia) but 'tis not for that consideration Plotina fears you would love her less; for her birth is nobler than she believ'd; but however, I am confident she will not tell it you presently; for he that can unfold this riddle, is oblig'd to return this night to a prison, whence he came forth, to expect till a great Princess deliver him from it; and after that he will come back to Rome, to inform you really who Plotina is. Nevertheless (added Cesonia, speaking to Clelia) continue to love her dearly; for tho she sayes, she fears you should love her less, yet I must assure you that, on the contrary, you will think your self oblig'd to love her more. After this these Ladies went into their Chariot, and Herminius return'd on horseback. On the other side, night was no sooner come, but Aronces, and that old man, who so long entertain'd Cesonia and Plotina, return'd to the prison from whence they came, for this man came along with Aronces to Rome. As for Clelia being she look'd upon all secrecy as criminal, she told Sulspicia she had seen Aronces, and she told Octavius likewise, to the end to satisfie him that Aronces could not have been the Person that wounded him, and this prudent Lady so faithfully related to them all the generous sentiments of that illustrious Prince, that they admir'd his vertue, and became confirm'd in the resolution to serve him still with greater ardour. To which purpose they oblig'd Artemidorus to tell Clelius he had understood at Clusium, that when Aronces was arrested by Tarquin, his sword was taken way from him, so to evince him that Octavius receiv'd not his wound from his hand; adding that he wondred the truth was not conjectur'd, it being a general order to disarm

disarm all such as are put into prison: Whereby continued Artemidorus, it is easie for you to judge, that that sword you sometimes gave to Aronces, and which was drawn out of Octavius's body after the battle, was not in Aronces's hands when he was wounded by it; for when a prisoner escapes out of prison, it is not possible for him, to regain the sword which was taken from him. Besides that, I have been assur'd Tarquin gave that which was yours to one of his Officers. Tho Aronces were innocent of the wounding Octavius (interrupted Clelius) it should not much advantage him in my favour; for since he is the Son of Porsenna, who is Tarquin's Protector, and consequently Rome's enemy, there needs no more to make me hate him. Yet you do not hate Telanus and Manilius (answer'd Artemidorus) tho they be Veientines, and the State of Veii a declared enemy to that of Rome. Manilius and Telanus (reply'd Clelius) are two particular persons, who in their hearts do not approve the actions of those that govern their City. But Aronces is an illustrious unfortunate person (answer'd Artemidorus) who resents with much regret, Porsenna's undertaking the protection of Tarquin. Whether that be so or no (reply'd Clelius), all that I can answer is, that I consider nothing more than the interest of my Country, that there is nothing I do not think my self oblig'd to sacrifice for it, and that rather then be ingrateful to it, I had rather be so to Aronces. Tho indeed having done as much for him, as he has for me, I do not look upon my self as liable to an accusation of ingratitude, tho I should hate him as much as I have lov'd him. Artemidorus was desirous to press him further, but perceiving no effect of his mediation, but a further exasperation of his disgust, he broke off his discourse. Two daies after Publicola brought back the Army, for the reasons before mention'd; but tho the pretence of his return was an intention to spare the blood of the people, to avoid giving battle again, and to cause the enemies Army to perish before their Wals, if they should dare to march against them, yet his return caus'd a great commotion amongst the people. For the solicitousness of Publicola and the second Consul, in fortifying all the out-places of Rome, in redoubling the City guard, and commanding all the Corn which was about in the Country, to be brought in thither, and all the the moveables of private persons, who had houses in the Country, the people well understood, that they who were acquainted with the secrecy of affairs, certainly foresaw, that Rome would ere long be surrounded with a leagure. Whereupon every one taking order for his particular subsistance, it was not possible for this to be done without some trouble and confusion. All the Streets of this spatious City were seen cover'd with chariots, horses, and with terrifi'd and afflicted people. Some were driving flocks, others removing houshold-stuff, some were loaden with corn and fruits, whilst others not solicitous of their goods, only lead their Wives and children into a place of safety. There were some that gave out they had seen the forces appear, tho it was not true; others lying after them, and encreasing their untruth, related stories of the disorders those forces had committed. They nam'd the Villages which they had burn'd, and told so many circumstances of violences committed by them, that they caus'd affrightment in all that heard them. The people thronging into the City, the Gates of it were not sufficient to receive all those conveniently, who endeavour'd to retire into it; so that there was a great tumult in the waies, gates, and streets; all the Tradesmen desisted from their works, and only beheld all these several passages with extream sadness. There was also so great a disposition in them to murmur, that there was no person who did not complain. The poor said they only should suffer during the siege, and the rich were very forward to ingage in the war, because they knew well, that they should not undergo the inconveniences of it. They who inclin'd to Monarchy, said it was very incommodious to have so many Masters; Others, that all changes never brought any thing but mischief along with them; some others zealous for liberty quarrelled with these, and maintain'd it was better to devour one another for hunger, and set fire to their City, than ever to yield to Tarquin. Some said it was not the best course to expect to be besieg'd, but rather to draw all the Romans out, and go and meet the enemy; others, that they would defend their wals, their wives, their children, their houshold-gods: but did not think fit to go and give battle: and the wiser and more understanding sort of people, endeavouring to reprove the multitude for their precipitious fear, fell into fury themselves, because they could not satisfie the people. Upon which Publicola having assembled the Senate, it was resolved, the only way to bring the people into their duty was to flatter them. To which purpose several Ordinances favourable to the Commonalty were constituted; for they were dispensed with from contributing to the charge of the war; a reasonable rate was set upon such things as were necessary for subsistance; the publick magazines were open'd; they were assur'd of all things necessary, as abundantly as the rich; it was given out by persons appointed to that purpose, that the enemies were not so strong, as was believ'd; shew was made of not fearing them; and the chief of the Senate made feasts out of policy, to intimate to the people, that they did not fear the wanting of any thing. So that as it is sometimes no less easie to appease a multitude than to move them, within two dayes all the Tradesmen betook themselves to their callings as before; all the people that came out of the circumjacent villages were dispos'd of in lodgings; and the false news changing the appearance of things, the same people who lately publisht other tidings so fatal and disadvantageous to Rome, now related a hundred contrary to Tarquin and Porsenna, which tho they had no probability in them very often, yet there did not want some to believe them. In the mean time all these divers rumors hindred Clidamire and Berelisa, from finishing their journey to France, conceiving it better to remain still at Rome, tho it were besieg'd, than to put themselves upon the way, at a time wherein there was yet no establisht permission, and every one was taken for an enemy; besides that Artemidorus being at Rome, they had no great business any where else. As for Anacreon he thought himself so well there, that he could not resolve to depart from thence so soon. Themistus believing he could not pass the time of his exile more nobly than in beholding so important an action as this, which fortune presented to him, resolv'd to continue there to that end; Meregines and his other friend did the same; Artemidorus and Zenocrates were not solicitous to go away, for several reasons; and Amilcar was then so strongly engaged to Rome, that he did not think he ſhould ever leave it. Amongſt theſe illuſtrious perſons was ſtill enjoy'd part of the pleaſures of peace, notwithſtanding all the preparations for war. Yet the pretences for walking entertainments, were ſomething relating to military affairs; for whereas formerly the Ladies were wont to make a walk to hear muſick, they now went to behold the forces muſter'd in the field of Mars, or ſee the pioneers making fortifications in ſeveral places of the City. Amidſt all theſe diſturbances, Love did not ceaſe to exerciſe his dominion. Nevertheleſs, Spurius perceiv'd his affection did not ſo much proceed from the dearneſs he had for Valeria, as the hatred he bore to Herminius, Æmilius, and Martius, who underſtanding himſelf not ſo dextrous as his Rivals, in all thoſe little diligences which Love inſpires people with, whoſe genius is naturally ſprightly, took up a thought to ſurpaſs them all in greatneſs of courage, and to exployt ſuch extraordinary actions during the War, that Publicola ſhould not dare to refuſe Valeria to him, and his Rivals have no longer the boldneſs to pretend to her to his prejudice. As for Horatius, he had then more hope than ever before; Aronces was loſt in Clelius's favour, himſelf was very powerful in Rome, his Rival was in the Party of the Enemies, and he pretended his ſervices to the Republick ſhould be ſo conſiderable, as that nothing could reaſonably be refuſed at the end of the War. Octavius, as ſoon as he began to go abroad, went to viſit Hermilia; and finding her ſtill poſſeſs'd with a ſadneſs which ſomething correſponded with his preſent humour, he was pleas'd no where ſo much as in her company. At this time it was known, that the Prince of Meſſene, inſtead of going to Rome, as it was believ'd, went and ſided with the enemies party, to be oppoſite to Themiſtus, who thereby found himſelf more engaged, to paſs all the time of his exile at Rome, and ſerve that State during the War. As for Clelia, though the poſture of her fortune was very unhappy, yet ſhe reſented much conſolation in having ſeen Aronces, and perceiv'd in his eyes, ſhe had all the reaſon in the World to hope he would be conſtant, and that all the obſtacles ill fortune ſhould obſtruct their happineſs with, would not change his ſentiment. Plotina, after what ſhe had underſtood from that old man who came with Artemidorus, was affected with a ſecret joy, which would have been perfectly ſweet, if it had not been allay'd with the impatience ſhe had, becauſe ſhe could not diſcover it. But tho this ſometimes gave her occaſion to muſe, ſhe was not much the more melancholy, but took all opportunities to delight her ſelf. Amilcar being one day in her chamber, at the ſame time with Valeria, Berenice, Clidamira, and Ceſonia, there was occaſion offer'd her to exerciſe her pleaſant humour; for as it chanc'd Acriſius who talk'd too much, Sicinius who was too ſilent, and Damon who was of the ſect of Pythagoras, coming thither, Amilcar, and ſhe, diverted themſelves much to the diſadvantage of theſe three Rivals, and eſpecially of the laſt. While this company was ſpeaking of ſeveral indifferent things, Anacreon and Herminius enter'd and ſaid, they had newly learn't ſome tidings which much affected them with compaſſion. Valeria demanded what they imported? whereupon, Herminius addreſſing to her, I underſtand (ſaid he) the unfortunate Celiantus, who, as you know, deſir'd permiſſion to build a Tomb for his two Rivals, who were ſlain in the laſt Battle, is himſelf ſlain by a party of the enemies, in defending the Tomb which he caus'd to be built. So that of four Lovers, who conteſted together, there is none living but Melicrates. Since none could be happy but he, (anſwer'd Acriſius) it is as good that they are dead; for what is life good for, when that cannot be injoy'd which only is capable to render it delightful? Acriſius would have proceeded farther, if Plotina had ſuffered him to ſpeak, but the better to ſilence him, ſhe began to lament Celiantus, with much exaggeration; the other Ladies pitied him likewiſe, and Anacreon himſelf, as great a friend of joy as he was, teſtified his commiſeration of his Fate. For my part (ſaid Damon then, who alwayes ſpoke according to the ſentiments of Pythagoras) my ſoul is not ſo ſenſible of compaſſion towards thoſe who dye, as thoſe who ſuffer any pain; for according to my apprehenſions, ſuch as dye, only change their Country and condition, but do not ceaſe to be, ſo that the continual change which all ſouls undergo, makes their ſorrow unjuſt who afflict themſelves ſo much for the death of thoſe we know, if they be not abſolutely neceſſary to our felicity. For my part, (ſaid Plotina) I know not how you underſtand it; but if I were of your opinion, I ſhould not be much comforted in dying, tho I ſhould know my Soul were to paſs into the body of the moſt jolly Turtle in the World; and beſides, were what you ſay true, people would have ſome remembrance of things they had known before. But I am well aſſur'd I remember nothing; and I believe too with ſufficient certainty, that when I ſhall be dead, I ſhall no longer remember any thing which I ſpeak at preſent. Your education (anſwer'd Damon) having been amongſt ſuch perſons who were not inſtructed by the learned in the Doctrine of Pythagoras, it is no great wonder if you do not comprehend what I ſay. However, 'tis certain, there is nothing more conſentaneous to reaſon than the opinion of that Philoſopher in this point. For whereas the gods, who are Maſters of the World, change nothing in their workmanſhip, but we ſee alwaies the ſame Seas, the ſame Rivers, the ſame Mountains, that they have fram'd a certain number of Stars, which neither increaſes nor diminiſhes; It is eaſie to imagine that they have alſo created a certain number of Souls, which continually paſs from one body to another, according to their pleaſure. So that many times we bewail people, who are in a condition more happy than that which they have forſaken. But what ſerves this preſent happineſs for, (ſaid Plotina) ſince I remember a paſt felicity no longer, and I have reaſon to ſay, The things we remember no longer, are no longer ours. But, Madam, (replyed he, ſhaking his head a little) it is not be imagin'd, there is none in the World remembers what has been formerly; for I have heard ſeveral Diſciples of Pythagoras affirm, there are ſome, who remember the actions of a precedent life perfectly. But do you remember (ſaid Acriſius) what you have been? I am not ſo vain to profeſs it, (anſwer'd Damon gravely,) for this ſeldome happens, but to perſons who are of ſo exquiſite a temper, as that all the faculties of their Souls are in their utmoſt perfection, by reaſon that the Bodies which they animate, are ſo well diſpos'd, that nothing impedes or diſturbs their imagination, memory, or judgement. I muſt then ask all that are present (said Plotina) if they remember any thing. For my part (said Cesonia) I am very unlikely to remember what I was before my being what I am; for I scarce remember what I did yesterday. And I (said Anereon) am so taken up with the present, that I cannot reflect upon what is past. To speak my thoughts (said Valeria), the future takes up my mind more than any thing else, so that 'tis no wonder if I remember nothing. I remember many past things (said Berelisa), but they are only such as I have seen with my own eies. I am much like you in that (answered Clidamira), for I know many things which I shall not forget during my life, but they are not of the nature of those Damon speaks of. I confess (said Sicinius then smiling) I so little love to speak of that which befals me, that tho I should remember what I have been, before I became what I am, I think I should not declare it. For my part (said Aeriſius) if I remembered any thing I should willingly tell it. I know not (said Herminius) whether it be the fault of my constitution, or of this Doctrine, but I remember nothing at all. Whilst the Company was discoursing thus, Amilcar appear'd pensive and musing, and spoke not at all; upon which Plotina, not doubting but he was contriving some subtilty, asked him, whether he would not declare if he remember'd what he had been before his last coming into the World. Amilcar, then returning from his feigned musing, answered ambiguously, and forc'd Plotina to command him to speak what he really thought. Sincerely (said he to her) you are a cruel person, to constrain me to be of the same opinion with one of my Rivals. How? (interrupted Plotina hastily, making shew of being astonish'd) is it possible an African should be of the Sect of Pythagoras? 'Tis to no purpose to deny it, (answer'd he, with a tone something serious) I am not only charm'd with his Doctrine, but convinc'd of it too by my own experience; and if I were at Metopontium or at Crotona, I should speak more freely of these matters than at Rome, where this opinion is not follow'd, though it be not generally condemned. At least, I know the memory of Pythagoras is in veneration here, and it is not unknown, that he was the wisest Philosopher that ever wore that name, the most gentle and humane. For, to give the more weight to this discourse, (added he) it is sufficiently apparent, that he was truely perswaded of the transmigration of Souls out of some bodies into others, since this, no doubt, was the cause of forbidding the use of any sort of living Creatures for food. You have made a great secret of your opinion (reply'd Plotina, who understood he derided Damon) but to punish you for your dissimulation, tell us, in brief, whether you, who have so handsome a wit, so quick a fancy, so faithfull a memory, and a constitution so perfect, have yet any remembrance of what you were, before you came to be Amilcar. 'Tis certain (said Damon then) that truth constrains me to say, I never knew any man so fit as he, to remember what he was before his last birth; for he is of that happy temper wherein the Soul is so disintangled from the confused motions of the Senses, that she may seem to be able to unbosom her self from them, and act without them, whensoever she pleases. I beseech you my dear Rival, (answer'd Amilcar with seeming anger) let us not mock one another in so good Company, by publishing things which they will not believe. I engage my self to make you be believ'd by above half those that are present, (said Plotina pleasantly) therefore tell us whether you remember you were any thing, before you were the same Person which I see you. In the name of the gods (said Damon then speaking to Amilcar) if it has pleas'd destiny to make your birth so happy, as that you are one of the number of those, who have the preheminence to know what they have formerly been, speak it confidently, in the avertment of a truth of highest importance, which perhaps you may convince some persons of, who may afterwards propagate it to all the most illustrious in Rome. Herminius observing, Damon's zeal for Pythagoras's Doctrine, made him liable to be abus'd, for the divertisement of the Company entreated Amilcar to declare, as the rest, all that his memory inform'd him of. Valeria did the like; Berelisa, Clidamira, and Cesonia added their requests; Aeriſius importun'd him to it; Anereon desir'd him to do it, and Sicinius made a consenting sign to him, to signifie that his desires were the same with those of all the Company; after which Plotina commanding him to speak, he did it in this manner; I am going to obey you, Madam, (said he to her) but I beseech your favour, not to reveal that which I shall tell you, and withal oblige those who are present to keep fidelity to me; for 'tis no great pleasure to be shewn in the Streets for a man, to whom extraordinary things has happened. Amilcar seem'd so serious in these words, that Plotina was almost ready to believe that he spoke in earnest. But at length all the Company having promis'd not to promulgate what he should tell them, he studi'd for some time and, seeming wholly recollected in him self, spoke in these words, addressing his words to Plotina. When you shall have heard what I have to tell you, (said he) you will less wonder at the boldness I have in loving you; for I have not always been a Wit. 'Tis true my Soul has experimented a great varietie of different Fortunes, and this very Spirit, which animates me, has past through several bodies of no mutual resemblance. Moreover (added he, with a grave and imperious aspect) it must not be imagin'd that I speak without knowing what induces me to it; for tho I may seem a person fitter to compose a jovial Sonnet, than to understand the whole doctrine of Pythagoras to the bottome, yet if I embrac'd it, I would clearly give you to understand the most obscure matters, and to unfold to you the necessity that there be eternally a prefixt number of Souls in the whole Universe, animating all the Bodies in it, that afterwards there would be no place left to doubt of all the doctrine of Pythagoras. For it being constantly true, (continu'd he, after having made all the appearance of one that has a good opinion of that which he speaks, and who nevertheless studies a little what he desires to express) that the principles of things consist in numbers, that proportion and Symetry are found every where, and that the harmony which results from this exactness, is, that which maintains the World; it is easie to understand, that the number of Souls is not unequal. The order of the Universe is always equal; there is neither more nor less matter in one age than in another; a Tree puts forth leaves in the Spring, those leaves fals at Autum, and the Tree renders back to the Earth all it received from it; and if it be burnt, the ashes return to the same place with the leaves. People delight to make wa-

Rome

cun-courſes to divide Rivers, and cauſe Fountains to ſpurt forth; yet there is not one drop of water leſs in all the Univerſe, in which is made a continual tranſmutation of all bodies. Since therefore matter is alwaies equal, why ſhould any imagine Souls not to be ſo too? The Stars are alwaies in the ſame number, as Damon hath well obſerv'd; we ſee but one Moon and one Sun; and, were it not incongruous to make ſhew of learning before Ladies, I ſhould ſwear to you by the number of Four, which is the greateſt oath of Pythagoras's Diſciples, you would ſoon believe all that I do. For my part (ſaid Plotina) I am already almoſt wholly diſpos'd to believe you; but being I alwaies love Examples more than Reaſons, and the principles of things and numbers are otherwiſe beyond my underſtanding, I intreat you to imagine I believe there is a certain number of Souls which paſs ſucceſſefully into the Bodies of Men and Beaſts; for I am ready to die with deſire, to know what beaſt or Heroe you have been. Ah! Madam, (cry'd Damon, who heartily wiſht Amilcar had convinc'd her of his opinion) perſons that believe ſo eaſily, do as good as not believe at all. Sincerely (anſwer'd he) I am the moſt diſpos'd to hear Amilcar, that poſſible can be. Permit me then to ſpeak (reply'd he), for it is not more true that the number of Ten is the moſt perfect of all numbers, according to the doctrine of Pythagoras, than it is true that I die with deſire to tell you all I remember I have been. Speak then (ſaid Plotina) and do not fear being interrupted, unleſs it be to ask you ſome particularities, which I ſhall be deſirous to know. Know then (anſwer'd he, with a very ſerious tone) that the moſt ancient thing I can call to remembrance, is my having been a great Prieſt in Ægypt, a long time before the firſt of the Pyramids which are ſeen there, was built. But this I remember ſo confuſedly, that there remains nothing of it in my mind, but the knowledge of Hieroglyphicks, which, no doubt, I underſtand ſtill ſufficiently well, therefore I ſhall not detain you in ſpeaking of it, having other things of more curioſity and divertiſement to tell you. After I dy'd in a Temple, my ſoul paſs'd into the body of a young Prince, of a handſome, comely, and agreeable perſonage. But the ſtrangeſt thing is, (continu'd he very ſeriouſly) that I cannot remember, what ever endeavour I make, in what Country I liv'd; I only know, that I liv'd in a Court of great ſplendor, that I had an amorous inclination, that I lov'd all pleaſures of Converſe, and could not indure ſolitude for ſo much as a quarter of an hour. I had alſo ſo great an inclination to all kind of Society, that I remember I promis'd above half a ſcore of young Virgins to marry them, and I know not whether or no I did not marry two or three of them. Moreover I remember very well I loved flattery, and yet was not over-liberal in rewarding flatterers; that I eaſily enough forgot ſervices that were done me, that I believ'd with an equal facility all the good that was ſpoken of me, and all the evil, that was told me of others, and was no very commendable friend. As for War I know not whether I lov'd it or no, but I know I di'd at no great rate, and that never having had leiſure to think of death, nor made any reflection upon it to compoſe my mind reſolutely againſt it, I found my ſelf much perplex'd when I ſaw it at hand; and in fine, truth, entertain'd it after a very unkind manner. But afterwards I was ſtrangely aſtoniſht, after having been in ſo good company, to find my ſelf a Phœnix in Arabia, and the onely one of my kind; for without doubt, you know, Madam, there is but one Phœnix in the World. Amilcar ſpoke this ſo ſeriouſly, that none of the company had the confidence to dare to laugh; and they conſtrain'd themſelves the more willingly, to further the mockery of Damon. How (ſaid Plotina then to him) were you a Phœnix? Yes, Madam, (anſwer'd he) and if I were a conſiderable wit, I would maintain that I am one again at preſent; and that after having been a Phœnix in Arabia, I am again the Phœnix of Lovers in Rome; but becauſe I am in a ſerious diſcourſe this day, I content my ſelf to aſſure you that I was really a Phœnix, and that never any thing troubled me more. I was indeed very comely, and, when I beheld my ſelf ſometimes in a River, I took ſufficient pleaſure in the handſomneſs of my ſhape; but being I was deſtitute of love, and could not be otherwiſe, my beauty was ſufficiently unprofitable to me. If I ſhould deſire your picture (ſaid Plotina) now you are Amilcar, I think it would not be ſeemly; but I conceive there is no great danger in intreating you to give me your pourtraiture as a Phœnix. Since you command me (anſwer'd Amilcar) I will tell you that the Phœnix is as big as an Eagle, that the Feathers of his body and wings are half carnation, and half of the colour of gold; that his tail is of the moſt excellent blew that ever was ſeen, and his neck like a Rainbow, that he has a thick and large tuft upon his head of lively and well mingled colours, peircing eies, and feet reſembling ſprayes of Coral. This is, Madam, the ſhape of a Phœnix, and ſuch was I at that time: however I was extreamly melancholy, tho I thought my ſelf very handſome, and was in a delightful country; for there is a certain place in Arabia the Happy, where all Trees, Flowers and Herbs, have an odoriferous ſmell, where Incenſe is found in abundance, and where I percht my ſelf when I pleas'd upon the Cinamon Trees. Thus a thouſand agreeable odours perfuming the air, and a thouſand handſome objects offering themſelves to my eies from all parts, it may be thought I could not be otherwiſe than happy. But to ſpeak truth, it being alwaies impoſſible to be ſo without love, I was ſufficiently miſerable. For every year in the Spring, I with envy beheld Nightingales ſinging and making love. It was in vain for me to ſeek for any company; I found my ſelf alwaies alone; other birds went together ſometimes by troops, whilſt I remain'd alone with my beauty in an inforc'd ſolitude, which was inſupportable to me. But were you not happy (ſaid Plotina) in not being ſubject either to love or jealouſie, in being free from the trouble of building a neſt like other birds, in being alwaies the goodlieſt bird in the World, and conſequently not envious of others? Alas! Madam, (anſwer'd he) I accounted it better to be envious than diſcontented, as the Phœnix is. Wherefore ever ſince (added he) I have alwaies had very great compaſſion of thoſe fair women, whom jealous husbands leave in deſerts in the Country, where they ſee nothing they can love, and where ſolitude is not voluntary to them; for there is nothing ſo ungrateful, as to be conſtrain'd to be alone, when one deſires to be in company. And I can aſſure you, that when I had liv'd 160 years, which is the ordinary life of a Phœnix, I was infinitely joyful that I was oblig'd to build my funeral pile, which I did with all possible expedition, with Incense, cinnamon, and other aromatical woods; in the season the Sun is hottest. After which, putting my self upon it after a faint manner, I fell asleep through tediousness of my long solitude. During my sleep, I expir'd with weakness, the Sun fir'd the pile which I had made, and reduc'd me into ashes, to leave something, out of which my successor might arise. Moreover, I remember very distinctly, that my last thoughts, while a Phœnix, were extremely melancholy, for having spent so long a life without loving any thing; for when I call'd to mind, that I had a hundred and sixty Springs, seen all the birds of my lovely desart making love to one another, I was infinitely discontented; and therefore (continu'd he) if there be any in the company, who, to their unhappiness, have made a resolution not to love any thing, let them hasten to change it; for there is nothing more tormenting at the hour of death than the affliction of having not been able to love or be belov'd. I assure you (said Valeria) I believe it is very troublesome too, to call to mind an unsuccessful or impertinent love. However it be (said Damon, who was unwilling Amilcar should be interrupted) suffer the relation to be finisht, which has been so delightfully begun; for though Amilcar always mingles some raillery in what he speaks, yet credit ought to be given to his words, since all the company knowes 'tis his custome never to speak altogether seriously of the most serious things. You have reason (answer'd Plotina) therefore I desire Amilcar to continue his relation. After I had ceas'd being a Phœnix (said Amilcar) I chang'd my fortune and shape very much; for I became one of the most ugly men in the World, but in requital one of the most valiant; for I lov'd nothing so much as war, which I follow'd continually; not but that my heart was in some sort sensible of love, though it was a kind of souldier-like Love, which does not cause much sighing, but has something of freedome and jollity in it, but seldome any great matter of courtship; and therefore I took more pleasure in relating a handsome field wherein I had fought, a siege I had been present at, or a particular combate of my own, than in entertaining my self with the favours of my mistress. But perhaps (interrupted Plotina smiling) it was because you had not any great matter to say upon that subject; at least I know if any lov'd me after the military manner you have represented to me, it should be easie to reckon the favours I would do him. All women (answer'd Herminius) are not of your humor; for, some fancy those resolute gallants with fierce countenances, who speak with boldness, and have kill'd men, more than polite and civiler persons, who comport themselves with respect and tenderness. No doubt, Herminius has reason (replyed Amilcar) for I was not very ill treated, and my stoutness caus'd me to obtain as many favours, as my wit and courtship. 'Tis true, I did not care over much for them; and I remember one thing which makes good what I say: One day I lost a picture which I had of my mistress, as I was fighting with a man, who had set upon me at an advantage, and I was much more joyful for having taken his sword from him, than troubled for having lost the picture. Indeed when a fancy takes a man to pass for one of greater courage than others, I assure you he is sufficiently employ'd; for he is possess'd with envy, jealousie, and ambition all at a time; danger is sought with eagerness (though to speak sincerely, 'tis never delightful;) he always desires to go beyond the rest, and is altogether uncapable of quiet. Then, 'tis sufficiently troublesome to be sometimes wounded, and sometimes a prisoner; for the Kings and Princes, for whose service you hazard or lose your lives, take little care of you. However, since 'tis the mode, it ought to be follow'd and I follow'd it so well, that I was but twenty nine years old when I was slain. 'Tis true, I had serv'd in fourteen companies with sufficient honour to be content with life, were it not that it is always sufficiently difficult to resolve to die. But afterwards (added he, not giving leisure to any to interrupt him) my adventure was strange enough; for after having shewn much bravery, the gods to punish me for being guilty of too much vanity in that respect, were pleas'd the same soul which in another body had been so stout and hardy, should animate that of one of the most pusillanimous men in the world. At first I was not very sorry for it; for I confess to you, I was a little weary with the tumultuous life which I had led, and those former impressions not being yet wholly blotted out, I imagined that choosing a kind of calm life I might spend my daies with sufficient sweetness. But, alas! I was deceiv'd, for as soon as it was perceiv'd I was one of no courage, I was expos'd to a hundred thousand troublesome occasions, and I assure you the people of the world who suffer most, are they who have the unhappiness to be cowards. For I dare maintain, it is a thousand times more pain to be void of valour, than to be too couragious; for a man who is valiant resolves upon death without fear at the beginning of the fight; whereas a poor wretch who is not, fears it in places where it is not to be met with. For my part, whilst I was a coward, I fear'd both my friends and my enemies; when I was forced to go to the war, and shame engaged me to be present in any encounter, the torment I suffer'd was above imagination. Example did not animate me, the noise of arrows elsthing together made my heart quake; I was always prepar'd for a retreat, and always observ'd to be last at the battle, and the formost in the flight. I went whither I was unwilling to go, I did not go where I desir'd to be; I was possess'd with fear and shame: and amidst all this, with a sottish pride, which caused me to do things of which I repented a moment after. But that which afflicted me most, was, that though at my return from the war, I spoke as if I had been couragious, yet I knew it was understood well enough that I was not. Therefore I say once again, there is nothing more painful than to want courage; and a brave person that ingages in a hundred thousand dangers, suffers much less than a man who continually fear things which are not to be fear'd. Now therefore (said Damon) can what Amilcar saies be doubted of? for could he invent an adventure of this nature, were it not truth that forces him to speak? Damon pronounc'd these words after a manner which surpriz'd all the company; indeed he was a person not absolutely without wit; but when a man is once capable to give himself up to believe a difficult & extraordinary thing, he maintains it more obstinately than if it were easie to be believ'd, and is so prepossess'd with it, that he is easily perswaded of any thing that may serve to authorize it. Thus the poor Damon, not perceiving that his Rival made sport with him, conjur'd him that he would proceed. Cer-

nius and Valeria did the ſame; Anacreon, Herminius, Ariſius, and Sicinius, preſs'd him to it; ſo that reſuming his diſcourſe, I aſſure you, (ſaid he) that Life, which they ſay is a thing very precious, is notwithſtanding more painful then 'tis thought to be. For tho I remember every thing that I have been, yet I do not remember I was ever perfectly happy. Nevertheleſſe, I was not altogether miſerable after having been ſo fearful; for I was deſtin'd to become a Swan; I had alſo the good hap to be in one of the goodlieſt Lakes that ever I beheld, and to feed very frequently from the faireſt hands in the world; for the place I was in, belong'd to a very beautiful perſon who lov'd me extremely. But at length it behov'd me to ſing in order to my death; on which occaſion I found, that, tho they ſay the ſinging of Swans is very agreeable, it is ſo troubleſome to the ſingers, that I was extreamly willing to change my ſhape. I repented me ſoon after that wiſh; for, the gods, to puniſh me for being diſſatisfied with my condition, when I was one of the faireſt Swans that ever was in the world, made me a bad Poet. This was a ſtate of great miſery to me; not but that I accounted all that I compos'd, very good, and admir'd my ſelf for it; but alwaies ſome adventure hapned, which made me know I was my own ſole admirer. I bethought my ſelf one day unhappily, to go ſhew ſome Verſes I had made in a great Company, without declaring my ſelf to be the Author, hoping thereby to be commended the more. But I repented my ſelfe of it extreamely; for there was no perſon but judg'd them bad, and made a mockery of them. But that which afflicted me yet more, was, that I defended them in ſuch a manner, as gave thoſe who derided them, to underſtand that I made them; upon which, beginning to moderate what they had ſaid, they wholly caſt me into deſpair. Not but that I believ'd they judg'd badly of my Verſes; but this did not hinder me from being poſſeſs'd with infinite indignation. I lookt upon the Age I liv'd in as ignorant, that people did not judge but according to their capricious humour or favour, that I deſerv'd better than they who were commended above me; and at length I dy'd in the error I had liv'd in, that is, I alwaies believ'd my Verſes were good, tho I remember well at this day, they were extream bad. But for that I had alwaies devour'd my ſelf, the decree of fate was, that I ſhould become a Pelican, which notwithſtanding, is a Bird ſufficiently rare, and of which kind, there are not many more than of that of the Phœnix: but at laſt dying to give life to my little Pelicans, which were very ſprightly, my Soul was ſent to Sparta, to animate the body of a young Lacedemonian, who was the moſt dexterous Thief that ever liv'd. There I rob'd ſo cunningly, that one day a young and fair perſon, confeſt to me, I had ſtolne her heart above ſix moneths before ſhe perciv'd it. How? Amilcar, (cry'd Plotina, who only took an occaſion to laugh) you put me in great fear, and I ſhould be circumvented, if you ſhould have taken my heart without my knowing any thing of it. As for that point, (anſwer'd Damon coldly) 'tis apparent, Amilcar is pleas'd to add an agreeable Fiction to Truth, tho he would do better to ſpeak a little more ſeriouſly of a matter of ſuch importance I will do what you deſire, (reply'd Amilcar, without being mov'd) and tell you that after this I became a jealous Husband; then, a jealous Miſtreſſe; ſhortly after, a jealous Lover, a jealous Wife, a jealous Friend, jealous without cauſe and reaſon; and, in brief, experienc'd jealouſie in ſo many manners, that I may ſay, I was for ſeveral Ages extremely miſerable. But that which is remarkable, (continu'd Amilcar) is, that I never was an old man, and therefore I am deſirous, out of curioſity only to become ſo once. I believe it, (anſwer'd Plotina ſmiling) but not to let ſlip the occaſion of contenting my curioſity, ſince you have made tryal of jealouſy of all ſorts that can be, tell us a little, whether a jealous Wife be tormented more than a jealous Husband? No doubt ſhe is, (anſwer'd Amilcar) for the paſſions of Women when they love being more violent, it is eaſie to judge, that their jealouſie is more tormenting to them than that of Men; beſides, having not ſo much liberty to act in order to clearing their ſuſpicions, nor ſo much power to be reveng'd, they muſt needs ſuffer far more. For my part, (ſaid Anacreon) I would ask of you whether the jealouſie of a Husband be more troubleſome than that of a Lover? That of a Husband (anſwer'd Anacreon) is more troubleſome for the Wife, than that of a Lover is for his Miſtreſſe: but as for him that ſuffers, I aſſure you, that according to the experience I have made of it, it is more incommodious to be a jealous Husband, than to be a jealous Lover. For my part, (ſaid Herminius) I conceive, that inſtead of inquiring of Amilcar, thoſe different degrees of jealouſie, it were better he told us what jealouſie is; for after having try'd it ſo much, methinks he ſhould better underſtand it than we do. Herminius has reaſon, (ſaid Damon) for by ſo many ſeveral effects as Amilcar has ſeen of jealouſie, he may have diſcover'd it's true cauſe and nature. I aſſure you, (anſwer'd he) jealouſie is a thing harder to be known than is believ'd; and when I conſider all my ſeveral jealouſies, I find my ſelf ſufficiently perplex'd, to tell you what I conceive of that paſſion. Yet 'tis certainly a very powerful one, and more powerful than Love; ſince it ſometimes extinguiſhes it. But that which is conſtantly true, is, that as a ſtone does more or leſſe miſchief proportionably to the ſtrength or weakneſſe of the arme that flings it; ſo jealouſie is greater or leſſe, according to the meaſure of Love, from whence it ariſes. But yet I deſire to know, (ſaid Anacreon) whether jealouſie ariſes from the greatneſſe of Love, or from the diſtruſt one has of himſelf, or of the perſon lov'd? Why one cannot love vehemently without being a little jealous? and why it is neceſſary that the greateſt puniſhment of life, ſhould be inſeparably conjoyn'd with the greateſt pleaſure in the World? The reaſon is, (anſwer'd Amilcar) becauſe Love is nothing but a deſire, deſires are ſcarce ever without fear, and fear in Love not without jealouſie. For as of neceſſity Love muſt precede jealouſie, ſo of neceſſity likwiſe jealouſie, muſt be preceded by fear. For, were it not fear'd a woman might prove unfaithful, no perſon would ever be jealous; if it were not fear'd a Rival might be lov'd, none would be poſſeſs'd with jealouſie; ſo that it may be ſaid, if there were no fear, there would be no jealouſie; if nothing were fear'd, there would be no deſires; and if no deſires, no Love. But becauſe people deſire, therefore they love; becauſe they love, they fear; and becauſe they fear, they are jealous: So that to determine the original of jealouſie, it muſt be held to be the daughter of deſire and fear, and becauſe one cannot love without desire and fear, it is almost an impossibility to love long without jealousie. Your discourse is extreamly rational, (answer'd Damon), but yet it would be better to proceed, to inform us; what you have been in latter times. Of a jealous Husband, (said Amilcar) I became a Tyger in Lybia, a Shepherd in Arcadia, a Carver at Corinth, a Peacock in Sicily, a Painter at Athens, a Musician in Lydia, and an Owle at Prœneste. But for that the relation of my adventures while an Owle, would not afford you much Pleasure, I shall content my selfe, to tell you only what I was before I was Amilcar. I beseech you tell us that presently, (said Plotina). I was Servius Tullus, (answer'd he, with a strange confidence). How? (said Plotina, with a fain'd astonishment) were you a King of Rome? Yes (answer'd he) and therefore it was I told you, in the beginning of my discourse, you would no longer wonder at my boldnesse in loving you, after you knew all that I have been; and this is the reason also that I hate Tarquin so much, and have lign'd my selfe to the service of Rome. For they who have any remembrance left of their several changes, have also some inclinations, in their present condition, correspondent to what they have been; and therefore you ought not wonder that I love Rome, altho I am an African. No, (reply'd Plotina maliciously); for Rome is sufficiently lovely of her selfe, to attract your affection: but I wonder very much at your so exact remembrance of so many things, and at my own remembring nothing at all. For, as for my part, I declare to you, I do not remember I was ever any other than Plotina. But perhaps (answer'd Amilcar smiling) it is, because you have not consider'd on it; for certainly it is not without the strength of deep reflection, that I have been able to recount to you all I have done. Amilcar spoke this with a certain air, beholding Plotina, which suddenly signifi'd, to Damon, that this Rival had made pastime of his opinions, and fain'd these stories to divert the Companie. For my part, (said Acrisius then, who sought occasion onely to speak) I will endeavour to recite all the changes Amilcar remembers of himselfe. Do not give your selfe the trouble, (answer'd Damon rising up) for I am assur'd that tho it be true that Amilcar remembers what he has been, when I am gone, he will say, his intention was only to make pastime, and divert you with pleasant mockerie; but whatever he sayes, it is certain, the opinion of Pythagoras is that alone, which can be follow'd with reason. Damon spake this with something a sharp tone of his voice, which signifi'd, that he at length perceiv'd Amilcar only to deride his belief. Plotina therefore was offering to say something to to pacify him, but he went away, and would not continue longer. 'Tis true, he afforded great pleasure to the Company, and especially to Plotina, who had an extream desire to laugh in liberty at Amilcar's confidence, in relating all those odd changes. For my part, (said she) I cannot understand how a man otherwise indu'd with reason, can be capable to believe things so extravagant. I am not of your mind, (said Anacreon) for I never wonder'd at any thing, and lesse at these kind of things than others; because there is never any prepossession of mind so strong, as that which has some appearance of Religion and Piety. For the morality of Phythagoras, having pleas'd Damon, because it was full of humanity and sweetnesse, he afterwards submitted his mind, to believe all that has been taught by a Man, whose Virtue charm'd him. For as we more easily believe what our Friends tell us, than what we learn from our Enemies, or people who are indifferent to us; so it often times falls out in the reading of Books. Men take an affection to the opinions of some persons, in certain matters; and when their affection is so setled, they are afterwards capable to believe all that he saies, upon his word, and in the mean time, thinks they are perswaded to do so by their own reason. But in brief (interrupted Plotina) should the best of my Friends tell me, 'Tis further from the top of the Capitol to the bank of Tyber, than from the bank of Tyber to the top of the Capitol, I should not believe him; because my reason would inform me otherwise. As often as any one goes about to tell things contrary to a truth known to all the World: (reply'd Anacreon), you will not be perswaded to believe them; but when a person for whom you have a very great esteem, endeavours to perswade you to follow his opinion blindly, no question, it must be some thing of that kind, which no person can ever know perfectly, unlesse the gods reveal it to him, and which cannot be judg'd of but by conjectures; the testimonies are so frequently dubious, that they sometimes occasion great errors in the world. Which being so, it is not to be wonder'd, if a person who by his own reason cannot penetrate into the truth, gives credit to a man whom he otherwise infinitely esteems, and believes him to have discover'd what he is unable to do, blindly embracing his sentiments upon a false conceit of being induc'd to do so by a thousand reasons. Therefore they are to be excus'd, who are not of our sentiments; for the belief we have of things supernatural, does not depend absolutely of our selves. If I were an Æthiopian, I should not believe that which I now do; if Amilcar were a Roman, he would have other sentiments; if Herminius were a Greek, he would have opinions which now he has not, altho the Greeks and Romans agree in several matters. Wherefore, I think, I have reason to say, 'tis injustice to accuse those of folly, who endeavour to defend the opinions of their Forefathers, and their Country; and that their unhappinesse is justly to be pityed, in being educated with a prejudic'd reason, which hinders them from discerning the truth; and it is charity to pray the gods to enlighten them. Let us therefore pity the poor Damon, (answer'd Plotina) for he his really worthy of pity for believing Amilcar was a Phœnix. After this, the Subject of the conversation being chang'd, they discours'd of a thousand delightfull matters, till Artemidorus coming thither, inform'd the Company, intelligence was brought that the Siege of Rome was resolv'd upon by Porsenna and Tarquin, and that in a few dayes they must look to see the enemie's Army about the walls. This news chang'd the discourse and oblig'd this noble company to retire. Three dayes after, there was a magnificent Ceremony in Rome; for, the Chief Vestal being dead suddenly, she that was to succeed her, and to whom she had voluntarily a little time before resign'd all authority, was put in possession of it, by the Chief of that Order, in presence of the Senate, and all the people. The deceased Vestal being Sister to Clelius. Clidamira and Berelisa, thought fit to go and comfort Sulpitia and Clelia; but Valeria withheld them, telling them, that when a Vestal dies, after having satisfi'd all the engagements engagements she was oblig'd to, it would be an injury in her Relations, to be afflicted for her death, there being nothing so glorious, as to have pass'd her life in keeping the sacred Fire, without having ever committed the least fault. And moreover (added Valeria) those two persons are at present sufficiently employ'd in conjecturing what the great Vestal intended to say at her death; for finding her self not well, she gave charge to one to desire Clelius to take care of Plotina, and to tell him she was the Daughter—— She would have said something more, but Death intercepted her speech: so that none can devise what to think of this adventure. In the mean time, great rejoycing was made at Rome by the People, when they vnderstood, she that was going to be chief of the Vestals, was worthy of the honour she was to possess. Since we are Strangers here (answer'd Berelisa) I shall be glad you would please to make me know that person before I see the ceremony, which is to be solemniz'd this day; for according to the sentiments I have at present, if it were permitted to become a Vestal at the age I am of, and a Stranger might be one, I should gladly embrace that retirement. But since it is not I must be contented to be one of the friends of the Chief Vestal. And indeed Berelisa, whose jealousie daily encreas'd, being weary of residing all her life with Clidamira, had a desire to obtain the friendship of the grand Vestal, to the end that she might make use of her power in Rome, in case she should stand in need of it: wherefore pressing Valeria to describe her to her, and Clidamira not opposing her curiosity, Valeria satisfied her in the following words.

The prudent Octavia (for so is the Chief Vestal call'd) is so worthy of the rank she is going to possesse, that since the first Original of that Order, there never was any whose birth was more illustrious, and vertue more glorious. For she is of a descent so noble, that none is more, whether you consider her Fathers Family or that of her Mother, whose beauty was so admirable, that they who have seen, affirm the splendor of Lucretia's was inferior to hers. She had also this extraordinary advantage, that time had respect to her beauty; for tho she was not young when she di'd, yet she then went beyond all other fair ones. She had likewise the glory, not onely to die with all her charms, but also to behold Death with so great Constancy, that she seem'd to triumph over it, tho she was constrain'd to yield to it; such admirable courage did she testifie in that fatal encounter. But to return to the vertuous Octavia. You must know she was shut up in the Cloyster of the Vestals, when she was but seven years old, and being of a race to which beauty seems necessarily appendant, she was then the fairest Child in the World, and is yet at this day so fair, so lovely, and of so good and charming an aspect, that it is easie to conceive the truth of what I say. Octavia is tall, has much modesty in her countenance, and goodness in her looks, a thousand charms in her mouth, spirit and sweetness in her eyes, and sometimes cheerfulness too, tho she has the most prudent aspect in the World, and is really one of the wisest persons upon the face of the Earth. Octavia has a clear complexion, a round visage, little dimples in her cheeks and chin, blew eyes admirably handsome, and a certain air of freedome, goodness, and modesty, which is perfectly pleasing. Yet that modesty of hers has something of greatness in it and does not detract from a certain noble aspect, which is peculiar to those of her Family. She has a young Sister, who has been brought up with her, and tenderly loves her, who is one of the fairest persons in the World; whose beauty has all that can aspire respect; for she is tall and of a handsome shape, her hair is of a light ash-colour, her complexion is the fairest that ever was beheld, she blushes after the most charming manner that ever any person did, she has extream lovely eyes, of a kind of blew, which renders them so sweet, that never was there more agreeable looks than hers. Yet the casts of her eyes are negligent, but so full of Love, that they inspire it to all such as are capable of it. Another wonder of the fair Cerintha is, that her whole Countenance is so graceful, her mouth so handsomly shap'd, her lips of so pure a carnation, and her smiles so charming, that nothing can possibly be fanci'd of greater perfection. Moreover her neck is so comely, that 'tis hard to know to what part to give the preheminence; but with so many perfections, which might excite her to pride, Cerintha is modest; she makes no account of her beauty, she passionately loves glory, and begins to see the World with as much prudence, as if she had had the leisure to know it. It may be said her vertue surpasses her beauty, and that she will get as much esteem by her wisdome, as she will excite love by the charms she is Mistress of. But to return to Octavia, tho she has been shut up amongst the Vestal Virgins in her tendereſt infancy, and be now of an age, in which it cannot be said she has had leasure to have much experience, yet she has a wit of excellent capacity, a Soul confirm'd in vertue by a thousand reflections upon the condition she has chosen, which she admirably acquits her self of. For tho Octavia be naturally sufficiently debonaire, yet she has been alwaies one of the most exact persons in the World to do her duty; and since the first being of Vestals, there never was any so careful and so punctual in observing all things which her profession requires. Whilst she was in the age of obedience, she obeyed with submission; when she came to command, she commanded with an authority that makes her be fear'd, and nevertheless makes her be belov'd too, even by those that fear her. She vigorously maintains the priviledges of the Vestals, and gently remits her severity in favour of her Companions upon several small inconsiderable occasions, when nothing is concern'd but her own interest. Order is admirably observ'd in that Society, the Temple is well serv'd, modesty is eminent in all her deportment; there is constancy and sweetness, justice and mildness in her mind. Moreover Octavia speaks excellently well of all things, without affecting a certain capacity which reasonable persons cannot endure; and when any occasion is presented for her to speak to the other Vestals, to exhort them to their duties, she do's it with so much eloquence, that they as much admire her wit as they love her person. 'Tis also very considerable, that tho Octavia is a very fit person for the World, yet she continues most strictly confin'd within the bounds of her profession, and which is yet more strange, all her sentiments are heroical; she considers matters very scrupulously, she speaks and writes exactly, and, which renders her infinitely lovely, understands all the dearness of true friendship, and prudently

chooſes ſuch as ſhe makes happy with her own. She has alſo the good fortune that the other Veſtals are worthy to be with her, eſpecially three, who are all extreamly amiable; but there is one amongſt the reſt, who has a great intereſt in her heart, and that deſervedly: for ſhe is a very rare perſon, of a graceful and lovely aſpect; her birth is very noble, her heart is generous and tender, ſhe is infinitely ingenious, her humour is ſweet and complacent, and with all this ſhe has the true aſpect of a ſincere honeſt perſon, and a tender, and a conſtant friendſhip for the admirable Octavia, who cannot be commended after all the manners ſhe deſerves, becauſe ſhe will not ſuffer her ſelf to be commended with exaggeration. Yet it muſt be ſaid further to her honour, that ſhe loves glory paſſionately, that nothing affects her ſo ſenſibly, and when any thinks to commend her before the other Veſtals, they ſay half of the rare qualities ſhe poſſeſſes, and the charms which render her ſo admirable are not known. Do me then the favour which I infinitely deſire (reply'd Bereliſa) to bring me into the affection of the grand Veſtal; you are ſo accuſtom'd (anſwer'd Clidamira tauntingly) to make your ſelf belov'd by whom you pleaſe, that, if you have the deſire, you need only ſeek out an occaſion to make your ſelf known. You ſeem to ſpeak obligingly (reply'd Bereliſa) but yet I aſſure you, I underſtand you as I ought.

After this Valeria having told them it was time to go to the Temple, if they intended to ſee the Ceremony, theſe fair Strangers accompani'd her thither. Where being well plac'd they ſaw Valeria had not flatter'd the grand Veſtal, and that ſhe was fairer than ſhe had deſcrib'd her. She perform'd this Ceremony with ſo much Majeſty and ſo good a grace, that ſhe charm'd all thoſe that beheld her. Bereliſa in particular looking upon her as a perſon from whom ſhe expected to be protected, was ingag'd to love her from that very moment. Clelia having loſt her Predeceſſor was conſidering to gain her affection, to the end ſhe might make uſe of her authority if ſhe ſhould need it; for the Veſtals have a great intereſt in Rome. Plotina alſo hoping to know more fully by Octavia what her deceas'd Predeceſſor had ſpoken concerning her at her death, was ſolicitous of getting a place in her affection: Thus theſe ſeveral perſons for different reaſons purpos'd to acquire the friendſhip of the grand Veſtal, who at the end of the Ceremony continued alone ſtanding by the holy Fire, to ſhew an example to all the other Veſtals. The next day a rumour was ſpread abroad that the enemies Army was upon their march with all ſpeed. This news indeed was true; for the King of Hetruria, underſtanding the preparations that were making for the defence of Rome, thought fit to give no leiſure to fortifie it more; and therefore haſtened his deſign. And beſides Tarquin himſelf preſt him him ſo aſſiduouſly when he was arriv'd at Cluſium, that he gave him no reſt. 'Tis true Galerita and the Princeſs of the Leontines did all they could to protract matters in length; but being unwilling to become ſuſpected, they dar'd not employ all their credit to that end. So that they could not much retard the execution of that grand deſign; but for that they deſir'd at leaſt Aronces might be free, they perform'd their promiſe made to that illuſtrious Priſoner, and perſwaded Porſenna it was fit he ſhould be brought out of priſon on condition to ſerve in the Army intended for the ſiege of Rome; and told him, during that time, they would incline him to embrace the propounded marriage of the Princeſs of Cere, who was reported to be a great beauty. Galerita having promis'd in the name of Aronces, more than Aronces would have promis'd himſelf, Porſenna ſent order to him who commanded in the Iſland of Saules to bring Aronces forthwith for Cluſium. But when he receiv'd this order, the Prince was not yet return'd from that ſecret voyage, which he made to Rome, accompani'd with the old man who inform'd Plotina of ſo many things; ſo that this man was in a ſtrange perplexity. At firſt he told him that brought it, the Prince was ſick and not to be ſeen, and that a little time ought to be waited for his recovery, to carry him to Cluſium. But tho he ſet a good face on the buſineſs he was in extream trouble, Which nevertheleſs did not torment him long; for towards midnight Aronces according to his promiſe return'd into the Priſon, to go forth again the next morning. For as ſoon as it was day, it was told him that brought the Order from Porſenna, that the Prince having ſlept well that night, was ſomething better and would obey the King of Hetruria, and that he might go and aſſure Porſenna of as much. He was alſo introduc'd to Aronces, who ſpoke to him very reſpectfully of the King his father: but at length when this meſſenger of the K. Porſenna was gone, Aronces prepar'd himſelf to depart, and promis'd that Kinſman of Plotina, that he would in that time procure his deliverance out of priſon, not doubting to obtain it by his intereſt in Galerita. But when he conſider'd upon the way, that he was going to Cluſium, only in order to go and beſiege Rome, and that it behov'd him to live with Tarquin and Sextus, he was in extream diſpair. As for the Prince Titus, he was his friend, and he hop'd ſome conſolation from his preſence; but when he imagin'd the war was ready to begin, that he could not think of ſeeing Clelia ſo long as it laſted, nor reaſonably hope to be happy, he ſuffer'd more than can be expreſs'd; and if a ſentiment of glory had not ſupported his vertue, he had taken ſome extream reſolution, and could not have reſolv'd to go ſerve Princes whom he deſpis'd and hated, againſt people whom he lov'd and eſteem'd. But when he conſider'd, that Horatius would defend Rome, he felt a ſecret deſire in his heart to be enemy to it, notwithſtanding all his reluctancy. With theſe thoughts Aronces arriv'd at Cluſium; as ſoon as he was there, the Queen his Mother viſited him to inſtruct him in the manner it was fit for him to ſpeak to the King his Father, whom he ſaw the firſt time in priyate. Aronces being the goodlieſt Prince in the world, Porſenna could not behold him without having his heart mollifi'd, & Aronces was ſo abſolutely Maſter of it in this occaſion, that Porſenna was highly pleas'd with him. Indeed Galerita had prevail'd with the King of Hetruria not to ſay any thing to Aronces concerning his Love; but that which was moſt troubleſome to Aronces was, that Tarquin and Sextus being then at Cluſium, he could not avoid ſeing them the ſame day. 'Tis true, it was in the preſence of Porſenna, and ſo the matter was diſpacht a little more eaſily. And beſides, Tarquin being a ſubtle Prince, and one that had a great faculty of diſſimulation, and Sextus being of a jovial eaſie nature, and capable to forget all things paſt, in a moment; they both receiv'd Aronces as if they had always lov'd him, & as the ſon of a King from whom alone they could expect their reeſtabliſhment at Rome. As for Aronces, it was eaſie to perceive that the reſpect he would render to the

King

King his Father, oblig'd him to receive the civilities of Tarquin and Sextus; he had also the generosity to express some tokens of the difference he made between the virtuous Titus and them, for he deported himself after another manner towards him in the sight of all the Court. After this Aronces to follow the counsel of Galerita in all things, went to visit the Princess of the Leontines, whom he honor'd infinitely, for out of the design he had, not to be persecuted with the marriage of the daughter of the King of Ceres, he resolv'd to give Porsenna occasion to imagine that the Princess of the Leontines might cause him to forget Clelia. Not but that this kind of Artifice was displeasing to him; but having advertis'd Clelia of it, he resolv'd upon it, with the thought that at least he might often be at liberty to complain of his unhappiness, with a most generous Princess. When he went to wait upon her, he found a Lady there one of the most vertuous in the world, and who was extreamly belov'd by her, as well as by Galerita. Her name was Melintha; for her descent being from Greece, her name came also to be of that Country. And being very powerful in this Court by the great number of Friends she had in it; the Princess of the Leontines was desirous Aronces should contract a friendship with her. And accordingly finding her at first gentle, sweet, ingenious, and compassionate, he desir'd to have some place in her affection, and intreated of her so obligingly, that she promis'd it him with joy; for she saw his unhappiness was as great as his vertue, and she was very willing to be one of his friends, especially because she had power to serve him. Upon the return of Aronces all the Court was fill'd with joy, all the young Persons of quality presented themselves to him, the people made a publick rejoycing, and there was no one fair Person, who did not hope to dispossess Clelia of his heart. Yet it was a very rash design, and prov'd very ill to those who attempted it; for Aronces tho civil and complacent, could take no pleasure but in the company of the Princess of the Leontines, with whom he talk'd in freedom, or with Titus, who loving Rome as well as he, pitied him with much dearness, and did not act like a Son of Tarquin, but as a real and faithful friend. In the mean time, as the friendship of Princes, especially when they are young, is easily misconstrued for Love, in a few daies it was reported in the Court of the King of Hetruria that Aronces was become amorous of the Princess of the Leontines, tho he did not profess Courtship to her; besides that, Galerita being desirous Porsenna should believe so, to the end the Prince her Son might be more ingratiated with him, contributed very much to make the rumor credited, notwithstanding Aronces's reluctancy, hoping this would hinder the King from urging his marriage with the daughter of the King of Ceres, which was only design'd to dis-engage his heart from the love of Clelia. And moreover Aronces was so frequently with the Princess of the Leontines, that it was imagin'd that the occasion of it could be no other but Love. Yet he entertain'd her only with discourse of his Passion for Clelia, and the excellencies of that admirable Lady. But as the Courts of Princes are never so splendid nor populous, as when a war is to begin, that of the King of Hetruria was at this time magnificent, and extreamly numerous. Tarquin, Sextus and the Prince his brother was there; an old Lover of the Princess of the Leontines was there also, not so much to serve Porsenna as to importune that generous Lady. The Prince of Messene arriv'd there, who was sufficiently surpriz'd when he understood the sister of Artemidorus was there; for it was reported that when she was in Sicily she was amongst the veil'd Virgins. Nevertheless, the case being otherwise, he render'd all the civility he ought her, tho he was Rival to the Prince her brother. Besides all these Princes, all the people of quality of Tarquin and Veii came to Clusium; Telanus amongst others repair'd thither, and acquitted himself punctually of what he had promis'd Clelia and Octavius: for he offer'd himself to Aronces as one wholly at his devotion in all occasions whatsoever. Artemidorus and Zenocrates being at Rome, the Princess of the Leontines was very desirous these combustions might be pacifi'd. She wisht her self able to contribute to this great design, tho she saw no great likelihood in it; but she conceiv'd, if the War could be deferr'd for one year, she might possibly be then in a condition to hinder it; Tarquin was old, and several accidents might fall out to change the face of affairs: She imparted her thoughts to Galerita, who finding she had reason in her opinion, endeavour'd to bring it to pass, that some secret Negotiation might be undertaken. Yet she did not acquaint Aronces with her design, imagining that any thing, which might draw matters out in length would not seem advantageous to him, because Love causes prejudice in the minds of those that are possest with it. And accordingly these two Princesses acted with so much address, that Porsenna consented to the attemping to find out some expedient for the accommoding of affairs, to the end the War he intended to make upon Rome, might appear more just, if an equitable proposition were refus'd. Tarquin was extreamly backward to consent to this delay, but Porsenna having promis'd him, that this Treaty should last but fifteen daies, he resolv'd upon it, on condition the business might be carried privately, that so in case it should not succeed it might not be reproacht to him, to have ask'd a peace of Rome. Galerita improving this occasion, propounded to request the Princess of the Leontines, who was of a condition fit to intermeddle in such affairs, and had as great a capacity as was necessary for the like transactions, that she would go to Rome, accompani'd with two men of quality. This propolition pleas'd Porsenna, because believing his Son enamour'd on this Princess, he thought she would preserve her conquest, and out of the desire of coming to be Queen of Hetruria, do nothing that might be advantageous to Clelia. The difficulty was, to propound something which might have some probability of succeeding; but several dextrous persons undertaking this affair, it was resolv'd it should be demanded the form of Government should continue Monarchical, that the Title of King should remain to Tarquin, and, that to satisfie the Romans, he should continue a year longer out of Rome, and so should Sextus too, provided the Prince Titus, who was not hated, should be admitted to dwell there. Tarquin did not oppose this proposition; not that it pleas'd him, but because he conceiv'd Rome would never accept it. When Aronces understood the business, he was extreamly afflicted at it, but considering it well, he thought it would be advantageous to him, for the Princess of the Leontines to see Clelia. This design was soon put in execution. To which purpose Telanus was chosen to go to Rome, to demand safe conduct for the Princess Princeſs of the Leontines. In the mean time Aronces mov'd Galerita to procure the deliverance of Plotina's Kinſman, who was priſoner in the Iſland of Saules; ſhe promis'd to do it, and deſir'd ſome time to oblige Porſenna to ſet him at liberty. Aronces writ to Clelia by Telanus, and Telanus acquitting himſelf readily of his Commiſſion, brought back all the aſſurances that were deſir'd for the Princeſs of the Leontines, who knowing the credit Artemidorus and Zenocrates had at Rome, would not have fear'd to have gone thither without any other aſſurance than that ſhe might have expected from their intereſt. But at length having receiv'd inſtructions from Porſenna, and the moſt paſſionate expreſſions imaginable to Clelia from Aronces, who likewiſe gave Telanus a ſecond Letter for that fair Lady, the Princeſs put her ſelf upon the way to Rome. In the mean while, Publicola was not ſorry for this delay, becauſe it afforded him time to fortifie the City, and provide for its ſafety. The Princeſs of the Leontines had in her company, beſides Telanus, two men of good years. And whil'ſt this Negotiation was ſecretly treating at Rome, the Princeſs was receiv'd there onely as a Stranger come thither only out of curioſity. But Publicola and ſeveral others knowing what relation ſhe had to Artemidorus, that her heart ſided with Rome, and ſhe was troubled at Porſenna's protecting of Tarquin, treated her in private with all imaginable honours. As for Clelia, ſhe was very joyful for her arrival, out of a thought to get ſome place in her friendſhip, and to engage her to be more favourable to her intereſts. Plotina was alſo very glad to underſtand by Telanus, that he who was to inform her what ſhe was, was to be ſet at liberty. Horatius being ignorant of the great intimacy ſhe had with Aronces, render'd her all the honour which was due to her quality; but as for Themiſtus, Meleagenes, Herminius, Amilcar, Octavius, Merigenes, Anacreon, Æmilius, and ſeveral others, they waited upon her every day. Clidamira and Bereliſa likewiſe viſited her conſtantly; and, the former deſiring to obtain her favour, propos'd ſeveral things to her, relating to the concluſion of the peace, and her return to Leontium. Valeria, and Plotina were very diligent in waiting upon her. Sulpicia, Sivelia, and the Aunt of Brutus, who were the principal Ladies of Rome, went frequently to ſee her, and Clelia took occaſion to do the like as often as ſhe could. Artemidorus was very ſerviceable in rendring this ſociety more free, for he told his ſiſter ſo many things in commendation of Clelia, that nothing could be added more; and aſſur'd Clelia ſo fully of the good intentions of that Princeſs, that when they ſaw one another they were preſently perſwaded of their mutual friendſhip. The Princeſs of the Leontines found Clelia ſo fair, ſo lovely, and ſo charming, that ſhe could not but commend Aronces for his conſtancy; and Clelia lookt upon the Princeſs of the Leontines as a perſon ſo Amiable, and capable to induce to infidelity, that ſhe fear'd it might be dangerous for her intereſts, that Aronces ſhould ſee her too often; and this thought made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion in her heart, that ſhe could not contain from teſtifying ſomething of it to her one day, as they were diſcourſing together with very much dearneſs. I confeſs to (you ſaid the Princeſs of the Leontines then to her) I am ſo great a Lover of conſtancy, that I have hitherto ſerv'd Aronces to the utmoſt of my power, onely becauſe I ſaw he was faithful to you. But after having ſeen you, I ſhall ſerve him with greater ardour, becauſe, having much friendſhip for him, I ſhould be glad to aſſiſt him in the preſervation of a good which is of infinite value. For, is there any thing ſo precious (added ſhe) as the affection of a perſon endu'd with beauty, wit, vertue, goodneſs, and fidelity? I beſeech you, Madam, (anſwer'd Clelia) do not extol me ſo much, and ſuffer me to take my turn of commending you, and to tell you, I find you have ſo many charms, that I fear much, leſt Aronces become unfaithful. For ſincerely I confeſs to you I know not how he can reſiſt you, and I find you ſo far above me, that I cannot but look upon you with as much fear as pleaſure. Your diſcourſe has too much of Complement (repli'd the Princeſs of the Leontines) and is ſo ill grounded) that it would be a piece of vanity to anſwer it ſeriouſly. And moreover, (added ſhe, ſmiling) you know your ſelf better than you ſpeak; but tho it were not ſo, and your modeſty conceal'd from you part of your charms, yet you are well enough acquainted with the heart of Aronces, not to apprehend it impoſſible for him to be inconſtant. Alas! Madam, (anſwer'd Clelia) I do not conceive there can ever be any aſſurance of not being liable to loſe a thing, the poſſeſſion of which is ſweet. I agree with you in that, (repli'd the Princeſs) that it may be fear'd, but I dare ſay you cannot without injuſtice apprehend it poſſible for Aronces to ceaſe to love you. Give me therefore your friendſhip without ſcruple, I conjure you, and believe, that Prince has the moſt tender and faithful affection for you, that ever any perſon had, and that I am diſpos'd to love you with the moſt ſincere and conſtant friendſhip that ever was. If it be ſo, Madam, (anſwer'd Clelia) I am perfectly glorious; for I look upon you as a perſon ſo lovely, that it will be an infinite contentment to me, to think I am belov'd by one that cannot be ſeen without being lov'd. This converſation would have continu'd longer, if word had not been brought to the Princeſs of the Leontines, that Publicola deſir'd to ſpeak with her. Clelia judging it was a viſit concerning affairs rather than of civility, offer'd to depart; but the Princeſs intreated her to go into a great Cloſet, which was in her Chamber, with a Lady of quality that came with her, whoſe name was Amicles, and who was a perſon of very much wit. A moment after, Valeria, Plotina, Herminius, and Telanus, came thither; ſo that there was a converſation not meanly delightful amongſt theſe ſix perſons. But that 'tis a civil cuſtome to diſcourſe with Strangers about ſuch things as they know beſt, not onely for that reaſon, but alſo to underſtand ſomething unheard of before, all theſe Ladies addreſs'd their diſcourſe to Amicles, either concerning the Princeſs of the Leontines, or the Court of the King of Hetruria. Valeria, alſo ſo well underſtood that ſhe did a pleaſure to Clelia, by making a curious inquiry of all that paſt at Cluſium, that ſhe ask't a hundred things of the amiable Amicles, which otherwiſe ſhe would not have ſpoken of. I beſeech you (ſaid ſhe to her, after ſeveral things, which directly concern'd the Princeſs of the Leontines) tell us, what Ladies Aronces has moſt frequently viſited ſince his coming out of priſon, and whether it be true, that there are abundance of amiable women at Cluſium. There are ſo many beauties there, (anſwer'd Amicles) that handſomeneſs is there ſcarce accounted of. Yet that is not much the cuſtome (repli'd Plotina); for amongſt young perſons Vertue is far leſs extol'd than Beauty. 'Tis true, (anſwer'd Amiclea) but it muſt be ſpoken, in the praiſe of our Court, that a Woman who is no more than barely fair, draws ſome gazers, but does not acquire much eſteem. Beauty, no doubt, is lookt upon there; but, above all, agreeableneſs, wit, excellent deportment, and a kind of ſecret charm, not conſiſtent with ſtupidity, are principally ſought after. But I beſeech you, (ſaid Valeria) anſwer what I deſired of you, and tell me who thoſe perſons are Aronces viſits moſt. I aſſure you, (anſwer'd Amiclea) tho that Prince be very civil, and enforces himſelf to be ſo, as much as he can; yet it is well enough ſeen, that his heart is at Rome, that he takes not much notice of what he ſees. Nevertheleſs, there are two perſons which he viſits very frequently, and who are his principal Friends. The Princeſs of the Leontines is certainly one, (ſaid Clelia). 'Tis true, (anwſer'd Amiclea); and the ſecond, is a Lady of quality, who has a very great intereſt in his eſteem, and is ſo highly conſider'd at Court, that there is none more admir'd. Clelia being then very deſirous to know a little more exactly who this friend of Aronces was, made a ſign to Valeria, who underſtanding what ſhe meant, requeſted Amiclea, that ſhe would pleaſe to tell her what excellent qualities the Lady had, of whom ſhe ſpake. You ask more things at once than you imagine, (anſwer'd Telanus) for Melintha is a Lady of ſo great worth, that there are few her equals. I beſeech you then, (ſaid Plotina ſmiling) make me acquainted with her forthwith, in the beſt manner you can. That is, in a word, (added Valeria) all the Company are deſirous you would pleaſe to make a faithful deſcription of that Friend of Aronces, that we may know, whether or no we ought to fear he loves her more than us. I aſſure you (anſwer'd Telanus) if the lovely Amiclea draw her pourtrait exactly, you will find ſhe cannot be lov'd too much, and all the Company will be perſwaded ſhe ought to be Aronces's Friend. For my part, (ſaid Herminius) methinks I love her already, I fancy her ſo rarely accompliſht. Speak then I conjure you, (ſaid Clelia) and omit nothing, which may ſerve to make us perfectly know this Friend of Aronces. Since you deſire it, (anſwer'd Amiclea) I ſhall tell you that Melintha is a Lady of ſo rare a Vertue, that ſhe deſerves to be propos'd for an example to all others; there is ſomething in her heart ſo noble, ſo great, ſo good, ſo tender, and ſo heroical, that it may be ſaid the gods have atcheiv'd their maſter-piece, in making her. For there is nothing more difficult to find, than a Woman who poſſeſſes all the riches together, which go to the making up of a Man of honour, and which accompliſh an excellent Woman. The ſame temper which gives a great heart and high generoſity, is not alwaies well accommodated for modeſty: that which cauſes to love exact Juſtice, does not very often conſiſt with that ſweet and ſociable complacence, which is ſo neceſſary for Ladies who converſe in the World. That which gives conſtancy in important affairs, does not give mildneſs in leſs matters, that which makes capable of great actions, does not ſtoop to certain trifles which are nevertheleſs a piece of decency almoſt neceſſary to women in ſome occaſions. Now Melintha having really in her breaſt all the vertues of an honourable Man, and all thoſe of an excellent Woman, deſerves all the commendations that can be given ſeverally to both ſexes. As for her perſon, tho ſhe be infinitely amiable, of a handſome ſtature, and ſlender, has hair very bright, eyes full of ſpirit and ſweetneſs, a ſprightly, modeſt, and agreeable countenance, a certain languor full of charms, a peculiar kind of ſweetneſs and tenderneſs in the tone of her voice, which affects the hearts of thoſe to whom ſhe ſpeaks, and ſings after the moſt paſſionate manner in the World; yet I may ſay, all this ought not to be mention'd, and that Melintha's vertue, wit, deportment, generoſity, and prudence, ought to be oppos'd to all the other commendations ſhe deſerves. 'Tis not without cauſe that I am impatient to ſpeak of that ſweet, inſinuating, agreeable, and ſolid wit, which renders her capable of pleaſing all ſorts of perſons, and which by its extent, capacity, and addreſs, deſerves to be intereſted in affairs of higheſt importance, which ſhe is able to diſpatch with prudence equal to the ſecreſie and probity of which ſhe makes profeſſion. Never was there a perſon more faithful, more ſincere, or more generous than ſhe. And that which is admirable in this illuſtrious Woman, is, that, together with that ſweet and complacent air ſhe has, and a delicate conſtitution, ſhe notwithſtanding has all imaginable greatneſs of heart, and is continually as active, as if the ſtrength of her body equall'd that of her mind, eſpecially when ſhe finds occaſion to do a civilty to any of her Friends, or only to ſome unfortunate perſon, of whoſe merit ſhe is inform'd. She neglects even her own affairs for thoſe of others; ſhe is incapable of ever failing of her word; ſhe expreſſes humanity towards all miſerable perſons, her heart is the tendereſt in the World, ſhe loves all that ſhe ought to do, and knows how to love, both with choice and conſtancy. She affects ingenious things, and underſtands them; as Muſick, Poetry, Peinture, and the like; and tho ſhe is of a temper ſomething inclin'd to Melancholy, yet ſhe inſpires a pleaſing joy into thoſe who converſe with her, and tho ſhe ſeems not to intend it, ſuddenly wins the hearts of ſuch as have the happineſs to approach her. But not to ſuffer the tenderneſs her heart is capable of to be idle, and to afford her innocent objects worthy of it, the gods have given her an illuſtrious Husband, illuſtrious Brothers, illuſtrious Friends, and lovely Children. But, to her unhappineſs, the valiant Beliſantus was ſlain in the Wars, when fortune was ready to reward him for an infinite number of glorious actions, which gain'd him an immortal renown, and render'd him worthy of the love of the vertuous Melintha. In that illuſtrious Husband ſhe found all that could be deſir'd in a Man of honour: He was of a very Noble race as well as ſhe; he had wit and courage; he was good and generous; he loved glory more than all things, and Melintha as much as glory. This generous Lady, hapned to be ſhut up in a beſieged City, which her illuſtrious Husband defended with excellent valour and reſolution, he endeavour'd to oblige her to go away out of it with her children; but ſhe would never deſert him, and, as long as the Siege laſted, afforded very great ſuccour unto him. For during the few hours he took to reſt in, ſhe made it her care, that the orders of her dear Beliſantus might be exactly obſerv'd, and gave ſome her ſelf, with as much judgement as a great Captain could have done

Being very well aſcertain'd of her illuſtrious Husband's conduct, ſhe never offer'd to oppoſe his courage. So that after Beliſantus had defended the place beyond all appearance of poſſibility, he could not reſolve to capitulate, but prefer'd a glorious Death above a Treaty, which notwithſtanding could not have been otherwiſe than very honourable. Nevertheleſs, a ſentiment of dearneſs for Melintha, obliging him to deſire her conſent, he propounded to her not to yield at all; and ſince the City was to be abandoned to the enemies, to make a Sally forth with all the people he had left, and attempt by his valour to make his way with ſword in hand, and beat the Enemies at the ſame time he yielded up the place. The wiſe Melintha well underſtood all the danger of this reſolution, but perceiving the averſion of Belliſantus to ſurrender, ſhe couragiouſly conſented to what he deſir'd, and accordingly he diſpos'd all things for that deſign. The Chariots of Melintha and her Children were made ready, and to ſhew the tranquillity of his mind in the ſight of greateſt dangers, he took care to cauſe ſeveral things to be put into them, which ſerv'd only for his pleaſure. After which, being oblig'd to call a Council of War, the Officers ſo urgently repreſented to him the reaſons which ſhould oblige him to render himſelf without ſcruple, that at length he made a very glorious Capitulation: and thus the generous Beliſantus marcht out of the place, the gaining of which was leſs glorious to them that took it, than to him that deliver'd it up, after he had deſtroy'd a great Army before it, and defended it two months, tho it was thought unable to hold out two dayes, and had no other ſtrength but the courage of him that defended it. But to let you further ſee, that the heart of Melintha was as tender as reſolute, amongſt ſo many generous actions as ſhe did, during that Siege, I muſt at laſt relate one to you. Her children being in a Houſe which was not far diſtant from the Walls of the City, it happened one day that the Enemies ſuddenly bethought themſelves to place Engines upon a Tower, which they had erected on that ſide. So that a great ſtorm of ſtones was ſeen to be diſcharg'd in that place. which by the violence wherewith they were caſt, overthrew all they fell upon, and ſlew ſuch as were ſtruck by them; Melintha was at that time at the houſe of one of her friends, on the other ſide of a large place, where that houſe ſtood, and ſeeing the fatal ſtorm and horrible havock made by the Engines, both upon the houſe in which her Children were, and in the place which it behov'd her to croſs to go to it, did not deliberate a moment, but being impell'd by the true tenderneſs of a generous mother, ran couragiouſly through the hail of Stones to fetch her children out of ſo dangerous a place, and that with ſo much ardour and haſte, that ſhe ſcarce made any reflection upon ſo great a danger, till ſhe had eſcap'd it; having at that inſtant nothing elſe in her mind but to ſave the life of her Children, and preſerve them for her dear Beliſantus, whoſe love ſhe will be eternally ſenſible of. Which indeed ſhe has in ſome manner repair'd, by chooſing for a very lovely Daughter of hers an illuſtrious Husband, whoſe rare valour and activity reſembles that of the greateſt Heroes, and who by an hundred gallant actions has made it apparent how great a Lover he is of Glory. Beſides, Melintha having two Sons very goodly perſonages, and whoſe inclinations have appear'd extreamly noble from their infancy, it is to be hop'd they will prove worthy to be Sons of their illuſtrious Father. Melintha moreover has four Brothers, each of which in their way deſerve, a thouſand praiſes; ſhe has alſo Friends, whoſe vertue is ſo great, that tho Fortune has been very liberal to them, yet they injoy much leſs than they deſerve; and perhaps ſome other occaſion will be offer'd, wherein I may preſent you with a fuller deſcription of all the perſons I have mention'd. I beſeech you (ſaid Plotina agreeably) ſince you have the colours and pencils in your hand be pleas'd to draw the pourtraits at leaſt of Melintha's virtuous Brothers. For my part (ſaid Clelia) I deſire onely to know one of her Friends. You ask too much for one day, (anſwer'd Amiclea); for Melintha has a Friend whom I cannot tell you of without recounting the Hiſtory of all Hetruria, becauſe the rare vertues of him I ſpeak of are, at this day, one of the ſtrongeſt props of his Country. therefore I will expect ſome other occaſion, to let you know that incomparable Man, whoſe vertue is above envy, and whoſe moderation makes his vertue more eminent; and I will only tell you that Melintha is a Lady, who ſerves her Friends without intereſt, without vanity, and with all imaginable zeal. She conceals her ſelf ſometimes to do good offices; and I know a perſon whom ſhe oblig'd after the nobleſt manner in the World, who durſt not ſpeak of the obligation he has to her, for fear of diſpleaſing her, tho he is extreamly deſirous to teſtifie his acknowledgement of her generoſity, by publiſhing it. In brief, Melintha is one of thoſe Women, who are ſo rarely found, that no Age or Country reckons above two or three whoſe accompliſhments equal hers. After this that you have ſpoken (ſaid Herminius) I am her friend for all my life. For my part (ſaid Valeria) I ſhall not repine if Aronces has more friendſhip for her than for me. And I (ſaid Plotina) ſhould account my ſelf extream happy, if I could have an intereſt in her Love. You have reaſon (ſaid Clelia) ſince nothing is more deſirable, than to have a friend of ſuch worth; for 'tis not only an advantage to be lov'd by ſuch, but the friendſhip of a perſon of great vertue reflects to the honour of thoſe who poſſeſs it; you are a friend to almoſt all her friends, and after a manner enjoy her glory as your own, tho you merit not ſo much as ſhe, and be far inferiour to Melintha. Clelia would have proceeded further, if the Princeſs of the Leontines had not return'd to her; but for that, as ſhe enter'd into the Cloſet, ſhe heard the name of Melintha, ſhe could not refrain from demanding what the diſcourſe was concerning the moſt vertuous Woman in the World. And underſtanding Amiclea had newly finiſht her Character, ſhe confirm'd all that was ſaid of her with a thouſand praiſes. This Princeſs being a very graceful Speaker, afforded much pleaſure to the Company; but ſhe diſcontented them at length, when ſhe told them her ſtay would be ſhorter at Rome than ſhe imagin'd, and that matters were not in a poſture to hope for an accommodement. After which ſhe continu'd there only four dayes; during which, Zenocrates durſt not viſit her conſtantly, becauſe Clidamira might have been thereby induc'd to do ſome injury to that Princeſs, Which occaſion'd this inconſtant Profeſſor, who ſeem'd then very ſad and penſive, to be ſuſpected of concealing a great Paſſion under his inconſtancy.

Du-

During the four dayes the Princeſs of the Leontines ſtay'd at Rome, ſhe us'd all endeavours ſhe could to bring matters to an accommodation, but withal was ſolicitous to do ſome office for Aronces with Clelia and Sulſpicia; which ſhe perform'd after ſo handſome a manner, that it could not have render'd her ſuſpected to Porſenna, had he known what ſhe ſpoke concerning the Prince his Son. But at length the fruit of this negotiation being only apparent in the admiration of the rare accompliſhments of the Princeſs of the Leontines, ſhe return'd without being able to obtain any thing on the behalf of Tarquin, but ſhe went away with the eſteem of all ſuch as had ſeen her. At her departure from Rome, Clelia told her all that a perſon indu'd with Wit, Love and Modeſty could ſay, to oblige her to perſwade Aronces continually, that he ought to be faithful to her: and the Princeſs of the Leontines on her part, expreſs'd to her all that a faithful friend of Aronces might to have ſaid, to exhort her to conſtancy; after which they took leave: Clelia deliver'd a Letter to Telanus, who brought her one; Artemidorus had a ſecret converſation with the Princeſs his Siſter, concerning their intereſts, which were not known to any but to Clidamira, Bereliſa, and Zenocrates. Telanus bid Plotina farewel with much earneſs, and they parted ſo well, as to excite ſome jealouſie in the breaſt of Amilcar. After the departure of the Princeſs of the Leontines, preparations for War were expedited in good earneſt; for it was judg'd, that as ſoon as ſhe ſhould be return'd, Porſenna would cauſe his Army to advance towards Rome. And indeed ſhe was no ſooner at Cluſium, and had given an account of her Journey, but Tarquin fell earneſtly to ſolicite Porſenna, and gave him no reſt, who looking upon it as a great piece of glory to re-eſtabliſh a diſpoſſeſt King, omitted nothing, that might conduce to the good ſucceſs of the War. Now did Aronces ſee himſelf brought into a condition, which of all things in the World he moſt fear'd, namely to be with his ſword in hand againſt ſo many perſons who were dear to him: but he had however the conſolation to underſtand a thouſand things that pleas'd him from the mouth of the Princeſs of the Leontines. For ſhe extolled Clelia with ſuch exaggeration, and aſſur'd him ſo confidently of his being lov'd by her, that he lov'd more than ever: At leaſt, Madam, (ſaid he to her) I have not made an ill choice of the perſon to whom I have given my ſelf, ſince you judge her worthy of your eſteem; but do not you believe (added he) that if the King ſaw her, he would excuſe my paſſion, and that I cannot be blam'd, but by thoſe who have forgotten that themſelves lov'd heretofore, or ſuch as are ſo inſenſible, as never to be capable of loving any thing? Then he ſpoke to her as concerning Horatius, and askt her, if ſhe had ſeen him with Clelia; and tho he were not himſelf jealous, yet he could not but give ſeveral tokens of being ſo. But in brief, how amorous ſoever he were, it behov'd him to act like an enemy to Rome: Glory no doubt upheld his reaſon in this occaſion; but the intereſt of his Love was added to it, to perſwade him at length, that ſince it behov'd him to appear an enemy of Rome, it ought to be after a manner which might render him redoubtable, and make him worthy the conſideration of either party. So he went to a Council of War, which was call'd before the marching of the Army, wherein it was reſolv'd to make only a ſhew, as if they intended to beleaguer Rome, to ſee if it were poſſible to ſurpriſe it, and if they who affected Monarchy, were in a capacity to make an inſurrection; but in caſe this did not ſucceed, as in probability it would not, it was determin'd to beſiege that great City effectively, to ſeize of all the avenues, to make ſure of Tyber both above and below Rome, and to bring to paſs, that the great number of inhabitants that fill'd it, might ſerve to deſtroy inſtead of defending it, by cauſing a greater facility of taking it by famine. The buſineſs being thus reſolv'd on, care was taken for a ſpeedy march; but for that Porſenna judg'd there was no great likelihood of taking Rome by violence, and that for that reaſon the ſiege would probably be long, he was pleas'd the Queen his wife and the whole Court ſhould follow him, and go to a very ſtately Caſtle, not far diſtant from the place where his Camp was to be, but a few miles diſtant from the Tomb of the three Rivals, where the unfortunate Caliantus was ſlain, and which part of Porſenna's Army had already ſeiz'd on. To which purpoſe Galerita, the Princeſs of the Leontines, the vertuous Melintha, and ſeveral Ladies of eminent quality of Cluſium, prepar'd to follow the Army, which was gone before. Then it was that an equal deſire was ſeen in either party of gaining Victory. One contriving to aſſault Rome, and the other to defend it; ſacrifices were offered to implore contrary ſucceſſes; either of them believ'd they had juſtice on their ſide, and right to demand the Protection of the gods; but in the midſt of ſo many oppoſite vowes, Clelia and Aronces no doubt wiſht alwaies the ſame thing. Porſenna approaching near Rome, divided his Army into three bodies, out of a deſign to aſſault the City in three ſeveral places. The quarter on the ſide of Janicul. was that where Porſenna and Aronces were on; the ſecond which was oppoſite to Tiber, was the entrenchment of Tarquin; and that on the ſide towards Tarquinia was taken up by Sextus. At the firſt appearing of the forces, there were ſeveral little skirmiſhes between thoſe whom Publicola ſent to deſcry the enemies, and thoſe who went to take up the places wherein to encamp. But there paſſed nothing very conſiderable in them; for Publicola having a deſign to ſuffer the enemies Army to weaken themſelves before he attempted any thing, contented himſelf with knowing the true manner of their entrenchment, and keeping himſelf upon his guard. On the other ſide, Porſenna deſiring to put the Romans out of fear, that ſo he might upon occaſion more eaſily ſurprize them, made ſhew, as if his only intent was to ſtarve the City. He ſet a guard upon that River, both above and below Rome, he ſeiz'd upon all the avenues, he caus'd Forts to be rais'd at ſeveral diſtances, to make good the paſſes more eaſily; for Rome was not a City fitting to be compaſs'd about with a Trench, as Tarquin had done at Ardea. In the mean time Aronces, to whom the care of cauſing thoſe little Forts to be rais'd, was committed by Porſenna, ſuffer'd extream grief in beholding Rome as an enemy, and wiſht that at leaſt his Rival would come forth to interrupt the works he was cauſing to be made: that he might have occaſion to ſee him with his ſword in his hand. But for that the Romans had laid a contrary deſign, his deſire could not then be ſatisfied. After Porſenna's Army was encamp'd without any conſiderable occurrences in making their approaches towards Rome, Ga-

Leriza the Princeſs of the Leontines, Melintha, and ſeveral other honorable Ladies, arriv'd at the Caſtle which was prepar'd for them; whither, being at no great diſtance from the camp, Porſenna, attended with many perſons of quality, went to to receive them. The Queen of Hetruria had lately receiv'd two young Ladies for her attendants, of infinite beauty, who, whilſt Porſenna was entertaining Galerita, and the Princeſſe of the Leontines, under a great porch which belong'd to the Caſtle, paſs'd over a little narrow bridge, which went from the Caſtle into the garden, and lay croſſe the large ditches full of water. All the other Ladies continu'd in the porch, with ſeveral Officers that attended on the King, except two men, very handſome perſonages, who leaning over the portal where that bridge was, beheld thoſe two fair Virgins, and ſpoke ſomething to them. But that little bridge breaking on a ſudden, the two fair perſons fell into the water, and were indanger'd to be drown'd. As they fell, they parted ſeveral wayes, one towards the right hand, and the other towards the left; ſo that there was a conſiderable diſtance between them. They were no ſooner fallen, but thoſe two men who ſpoke to them, caſt themſelves into the water; but inſtead of ſeparating themſelves to ſuccour them both, they leapt in on the ſame ſide, and thought only of ſaving one whom they held up by the robe, and ſo ſwimming drew her to land; for the ditches were very deep. The other lookt for nothing but to be drowned, and had been ſo indeed, if the great noiſe had not excited the curioſity of ſeveral people to come and ſee what caus'd it. Upon which, divers perſons perceiving this fair one ready to periſh, the Captain of Porſenna's guards leapt in with all ſpeed, and ſaved her life. This accident troubled the whole Court, for theſe two virgins were generally very well eſteem'd of. There alſo hapned a diſpute upon it, between two famous Soothſayers, who were then with the Queen of Hetruria; for one of them affirm'd, the broken bridge was a bad omen; and the other on the contrary maintain'd, that the bridges being broken upon the arrival of the King, was a very happy preſage, and that for his part, he was perſwaded if Rome were attaqued by force, the enterpriſe would ſucceed. But whilſt theſe two Soothſayers were in this conteſt, the the two fair virgins were carried half dead into the ſame chamber, where care was taken for their recovery. The ſame evening the King return'd to the camp; but the next morning Aronces went to ſee the Queen his Mother, and the Princeſs of the Leontines. In the mean time the accident befallen the two fair virgins, was all the diſcourſe of the Princeſſes and the Camp; every one wonder'd at the ill fortune of her who was ready to periſh, and the happineſſe of the other, who had two men to ſuccour her, while her companion had none at all, though ſhe were as fair and lovely as ſhe. Tho Aronces had no purpoſe to ſtay long at the Caſtle, yet he could not refuſe to accompany the Princeſſe of the Leontines to the chamber of thoſe two fair virgins, who were ſtill indiſpos'd by their adventure of the preceding day. As they were going thither, they found the two men in a gallery, who had ſuccour'd the ſame perſon, and left the other in danger of periſhing. Whereupon the Princeſs of the Leontines not being able to refrain from teſtifying to them her aſtoniſhment, I beſeech you, ſaid ſhe to them, tell me why you did not ſeparate your ſelves to ſuccour both thoſe fair virgins, ſince they did not both fall on the ſame ſide. Was it becauſe you both love her whom you ſuccour'd, or hated her whom you left to periſh? Or rather was it becauſe you were lov'd by the one and hated by the other? Your queſtion Madam (anſwer'd he whoſe name was Æmylius) is more difficult to be reſolv'd than you imagine. For my part (anſwer'd the other who was call'd Theanor) I ſhould be more troubled to reſolve it, than my companion; but which is the worſt of all (added he) I dare not enter into the chamber of her whoſe life I endeavour'd to ſave, becauſe ſhe whom I abandon'd is there too. And I alſo (ſaid Æmylius) ſhould willingly go and deſire pardon of her whom I left to periſh, but for that I fear to find her whom I have ſerv'd alwaies unjuſt; I cannot reſolve to do it. That which you ſay ſeems ſo intricate (reply'd Aronces) that I am perſwaded nothing but love can be the occaſion of this perplexity. You have reaſon, my Lord (anſwer'd Theanor) and were we free both from hatred and love, we ſhould be more happy than we are, and ſpeak more intelligibly. But becauſe we are poſſeſsd with both theſe paſſions, we deſire to be excus'd from making our ſelves further underſtood. The Princeſs of the Leontines perceiving theſe two Lovers had no intention to tell her more of the matter, left them, and went into the chamber of the two fair ſick perſons, hoping to draw a little more light from them, of what ſhe deſir'd to know. One of them was in bed, and the other ſtood by, undreſt; for ſhe who had been longeſt without ſuccour, was more indiſpos'd than her companion. There was at that time in their chamber, onely Porſenna's Captain of the guard, who had followed Aronces, and ſav'd the life of the fair Terentia, who was in bed, and ſeem'd to be more ſad than ſick. She who ſtood by, and whoſe name was Aureliſa, to teſtifie the greater reſpect, went to meet the Princeſſe of the Leontines, and Aronces; but tho ſhe had reaſon to be cheerful enough for having eſcap'd ſo great a danger, yet there appear'd ſome diſcontent in her eyes. Upon which the Princeſſe obſerving Terentia's ſadneſſe, and Aureliſa's diſcontent, demanded of them the cauſe; For (ſaid ſhe obligingly) my intention in coming was to rejoice with you; and, yet to judge of your thoughts by your looks, it ſeems the Prince and I ought to be afflicted, if we intend to partake of your ſentiments. For my part (anſwer'd Terentia ſaintly) I do not look upon life as ſo great a Good, as to deſerve much joy for not having loſt it: however, I am very much oblig'd to Cereontus, whom you ſee there, for having preſerv'd me, ſince his intention was to do me a very good office, to which he was not ſo much oblig'd as the other, who left me to periſh. As for what concerns me (anſwer'd Aureliſa) it ſeemes I have been more happy than Terentia; but in reality, I am not of that opinion; for it is ſometimes more unacceptable to be too much oblig'd, than too little. I aſſure you (reply'd the Princeſſe then, looking upon Aronces) I do not much better underſtand what Terentia and Aureliſa ſay, than what Æmilius and Theanor ſaid to us, as we came hither. How? (ſaid Terentia bluſhing) are Theanor and Æmilius here? Yes (anſwer'd Aronces) they are here, but tho they were deſirous to follow me, yet they dar'd not enter into your chamber. No doubt, (added the Princeſſe of the Leontines) becauſe they dare not ſee you, after having left you in danger of periſhing. In truth (reply'd Aureliſa, changing colour as well as Terentia) I conceive ceive they knew not what they did when they leapt into the water to save my life, and I am not certain but that they might take me for Terentia. As for me (said Cereontus then respectfully, as he was going away) my intention cannot be doubtful, and I very well understood I desir'd to succour you; but, least you should believe I look for praises for it, I shall retire. The more you speak, the lesse I understand, (answer'd the Princesse of the Leontines) yet it would by very fitting (said Amiclea who accompanied the Princesse) that you knew the truth of this adventure, for fear some inconvenience happen upon it. You so well understand all the secrets of Aureliſa's, and my heart (answer'd Terentia), that it will be ealse for you to satisfie the Princess; but, to speak truth, it were better to conceal our weakness than publish it: upon equitable consideration, I think there is no person amongst us but has their fault. Terentia spoke this with an air that augmented the Princess's curiosity, who understanding in effect, that there might be some occasion of quarrel between Theanor, Æmilius, and Cereontus told these two fair persons, she would not go forth of their chamber, till she knew exactly, all that was to be known of their adventures. I beseech you, Madam, (said Aureliſa then) do not give your self the trouble of hearing a hundred unprofitable trifles, which are glorious to no persons, and will but make you lose time which you might better employ. No, no, (said Amiclea then) the Princess can do nothing more delightful to her self, than to hinder such worthy persons as those that sav'd your lives, from quarrelling, as I foresee they will do, if care be not taken to observe them, and supprets part of their resentment. Terentia and Aureliſa understanding in effect, that a quarrel might easily arise between those three men, consented to the desire of the Princess and Amiclea, who having two hours still to spend in that place, was not unwilling to employ them in hindering amorous persons from destroying one another; for he had heard it confusedly spoken, that Æmilius and Theanor lov'd Terentia and Aureliſa. Wherefore urging these two fair Ladies to consent that he should know their history, they did so, on condition that only the Princess of the Leontines and himself should know it, and that they two might not be present at the relation, which they could not hear without extreme confusion. But who then shall tell us your adventures (said the Princess)? Amiclea answered Terentia, who knowes them as well as our selves, and who is so sincere, and so faithful, that I do not conceive she is suspected by Aureliſa, more than she is by me. You have reason (answer'd that fair Ladie) and I should more doubt my own memory, if I were to relate my adventure my self, than I do the sincerity of Amiclea. I am very glad you both know me (reply'd she); but withal, you ought to be assur'd that I will do nothing to render my self unworthy of the good opinion you have of me, and onely relate the pure and naked truth. After this, the Princesse of the Leontines went to her own Chamber, whil'st the Queen of Hetruria was in hers with the generous Melintha. As soon as the Princesse was there, she commanded, No person should be suffer'd to enter, and then oblig'd Amiclea to relate all that had befallen her two amiable friends; in obedience to which command she began her story in these terms:

The HISTORY of AURELISA and TERENTIA.

I will not detain you, Madam, with telling you Aureliſa and Terentia are descended from very noble families, since you know it already; or that Theanor, Æmylius and Cereontus are persons of quality; for 'tis a thing you are not ignorant of. I shall omit to tell you that these five persons are indued with great merits, because you know them sufficiently to be so; nevertheless, for that the Prince that hears me has not time to observe the humour of Aureliſa and Terentia, you must permit me to tell him that tho Terentia be brown and Aureliſa fair, one has black eyes, and the other blew, one be tall of stature and the other low, yet there is more difference in inclinations than in the out-side of their persons. Yet they have both very much wit; yea, they had for some time a considerable kindness for one another; but this has not hinder'd but that they have opposite sentiments, and in brief, can never agree in any thing whatsoever, not even in such matters as are of least concernment. If they be onely to walk together, one of them will go in the shade, and the other sayes she do's not fear the Sun, and much affects those great open quarters in Gardens which leave the sight free, and where the air is not confin'd. If one will have her Curtains drawn before her windows, the other maintains on the contrary that the clear day is advantageous to such as have a good complexion. In brief, they never had the same friends of either Sex in the very time they lov'd one another, and I may say I am the only exception to this general rule; 'Tis true, since 'tis a happiness I have to be oftentimes a friend to persons who have no resemblance, and whose interests are many times contrary, this ought not to be wonder'd at. But which is strange, these two persons, whose opinions are so different have yet so much reason that they never had any publick fallings out, and they have so well conceal'd their differences that I am almost the onely person that have had any knowledge of them. In the next place, Madam, you must know, that these two persons having both almost in the same time lost their Fathers and Mothers, they were plac'd under the Guardianship of a man of quality, call'd Tolumnius, whose wife was Aureliſa's Aunt. As for Terentia she was Cousin to Tolumnius, who had two Nephews, not Brothers, to whom he intended to marry these two Virgins who have sufficient fortunes. In order to which, he educated them under his wife, whose name was Elinyſſa, tho he conceal'd his determination; however, he so expresly commanded Æmylius and Theanor, (who obey'd him as if he had been their Father) to insinuate themselves into the affection of these two persons, that they began to make Courtship to them, more out of obedience than choice, and consequently without Love towards them, or jealousie between themselves; for they had other things which affected their hearts. On the other side Aureliſa and Terentia having been advertis'd by one of their relations, that they were to prepare themselves to marry Æmylius and Theanor one day, lookt upon them as two men who in time might come to be their husbands. But as they could never love the same things, so they made different desires; for Terentia wish'd she might be lov'd by Æmylius, and

Aureliſa

Aureliſa that ſhe might be ſo by Theanor. Nevertheleſs, theſe wiſhes were conceal'd from all the World, and they never ſpoke of them but when they were alone. Nor did they then think that they ſpoke very ſeriouſly. For my part (ſaid Aureliſa one day) I ſhall never reſolve to become wife to Æmilius: not but that I ſee he is a perſon of much honour, but he is not ſuch as I would have a Lover or a Huſband: but the caſe is otherwiſe in relation to Theanor. As for my particular (added Terentia) I cannot think of marrying Theanor, tho he be a perſon of worth; but for Æmilius, I could eaſily reſolve to do it. What? (ſaid Aureliſa) would you be the wife of ſuch an inconſtant perſon as Æmylius, who has had a hundred Miſtreſſes in his life. I would not marry him inconſtant, (anſwer'd Terentia) but I ſhould like well enough to cure him of his inconſtancy, and ſhould not be loth to marry him when I had render'd him faithful. But can you your ſelf (added Terentia) reſolve to love and to marry Theanor, who you know loves a certain woman ever ſince he came to the uſe of reaſon, who makes a profeſſion of being the moſt conſtant perſon in the World, and yet when he has marri'd you, will not ceaſe to love his former Miſtreſs? No, no, Terentia, (repli'd Aureliſa) I do not underſtand it ſo; but, to ſpeak freely, I ſhould take as much pleaſure to render Theanor unfaithful to her that he loves, as you would have, in rendring Æmilius conſtant. Our two wiſhes are very different (anſwer'd Terentia) for I deſire to remove a defect from Emylius, and you would confer one on Theanor. In truth (repli'd Aureliſa) I think we do not yet very well know what we would have; but the beſt I ſee for us, is, that in all probabilities we ſhall never deſire the ſame things, and ſo having different pretenſions, we ſhall alwaies live in peace, tho our inclinations be contrary. However from that day Aureliſa and Terentia found ariſing in their hearts a kind of particular eſteem for thoſe two men, which had ſcarce any other apparent cauſe than the deſire of contradicting one another. For, becauſe Aureliſa eſteem'd Emylius leſs than Theanor, therefore Terentia lov'd Theanor leſs than Æmilius; and for the ſame reaſon, Aureliſa knowing Terentia preferr'd Æmilius before Theanor, ſhe gave the preheminence to Theanor to the prejudice of Æmilius. Nevertheleſs, they ſo well conceal'd their ſentiments, that they were taken notice of by no perſon whatſoever. But whil'ſt they conteſted thus, Æmilius and Theanor who were friends, and mutually communicated moſt part of their ſentiments, beheld theſe two Virgins as moſt men do thoſe whom they think they ought to marry, that is with an affection without ardour, and little better than ordinary civility; nor did they ſo much as inquire how their Uncle intended their marriages ſhould be made; for Æmilius having at that time three or four Miſtreſſes, and Theanor one who abſolutely took up his heart, they onely conſider'd that they whom they were to marry would be rich, without troubling themſelves further, except that they told their Miſtreſſes, A wiſe man ought to marry only for his familie's ſake, and to love onely for his own. They endeavour'd alſo to perſwade them, that a marriage was not a real infidelity; and they were happy enough to be believ'd; for the inconſtant Æmilius lov'd none but Goſſips, and the conſtant Theanor loving a woman which could not be his, he perſwaded her the more eaſily to what he deſir'd. Things being in this poſture, I contracted an intimate friendſhip with theſe two young Beauties, and I hapned one day to be at Elinyſſa's houſe with whom they dwelt, when Theanor and Æmilius came thither with two Ladies of no diſcommendable beauty. So that this converſation being wholly compos'd of young perſons (for Elinyſſa was gone out of it about ſome affairs) it ſuddenly became very agreeable and gallant. This hapned ſo much the more eaſily, for that one of the Ladies who came with Theanor and Æmilius, and whoſe name was Cleoncia, being much addicted to make ſport with her beſt friends, and to do it ſometimes a little too preſſingly; cunningly brought it in, to ſpeak of unfaithful and conſtant Love, intending to give ſome light gird to thoſe that were with her. She ask'd the other Ladies what they would do if they were neceſſitated to chuſe a husband of two men, whereof one had a hundred Miſtreſſes, and the other but one, whom he loved ardently. For my part, ſaid one of the Ladies, I would have neither of both; for certainly 'tis no great pleaſure to be wife to one of thoſe profeſs'd Weather-Cocks, who becauſe they converſe with none but Goſſips, ſlight their Wives, and every day do a hundred things very diſpleaſing to be ſeen; and 'tis yet leſs to be Wife of a Man who every moment is ready to ſacrifice all his family to the perſon whom he loves, whoſe thoughts are wholly taken up with her, who never ſtirs from her, who is weary of all other places, who is prodigal in what concerns his love, and covetous in all other reſpects, and who will not have any thing that he do's, ſeen; or when it is obſerv'd, will not allow it to be complain'd of. And which is ſtrange, both that husband who lends out his heart to whomſoever will have it, and he that gives his intirely to one perſon, do nevertheleſs require their Wives ſhould keep a more exact fidelity to them, than any others. But ſince I may be miſtaken (added ſhe) I would know Aureliſa's opinion upon this caſe. Terentia then look upon Aureliſa, calling to mind what they had talk't of together ſome daies before; whereupon, (perceiving it was believed, ſhe was going to declare her true ſentiments, and conſequently to determine, that ſhe lik'd a Husband better that had one conſtant Love, than one that had many) on a ſudden to have the pleaſure of deceiving her friend, ſhe diſguis'd her ſentiments, and took the contrary ſide, with intention to anticipate all that ſhe deſir'd to ſay. For my part, (ſaid ſhe, ſmiling) I ſee no ground there is to doubt; for 'tis better, no queſtion, to be Wife of an unconſtant Husband, provided he carry his buſineſs diſcreetly, than to be a Wife to a conſtant Lover, who perplexes his Wife with continual capriciocs. For inconſtant Lovers, are almoſt generally of a good humour, whereas, on the contrary, Lovers ſcrupulouſly faithful, are for the moſt part ſullen natur'd. Terentia obſerving Aureliſa's ſubtlety, could not reſtrain her ſelf from contradicting her, tho in reality ſhe contradicted her ſelf. There is ſome wit in what you ſay, (ſaid Terentia) but yet it is certain, that it were incomparably better, to be the Wife of a man who has a great paſſion, than of one of thoſe that are inconſtant to a thouſand Loves, of whom every day a hundred ſtories are told, which divert the whole Court, and perplex his Wife in all companies, ſince ſhe can

ſcarce go into any place without finding ſome Miſtreſs of her Husband's with whom ſhe is at a loſs how to comport her ſelf: but it is not ſo with a Husband that has but one Love; for provided you keep but ſome meaſure of civility to his Miſtreſs, if he be ingenuous he will thank you for it, and if he does not love you, yet at leaſt he will eſteem you. While theſe two Virgins maintain'd the ſide they undertook, which is ſufficient weakneſs, becauſe it did not agree with their real ſentiments, Theanor and Æmilius, to whom this converſation was unpleaſing, by reaſon of their being concern'd in it, believ'd that theſe two fair perſons thought what they ſpoke; and thereupon Theanor was incens'd againſt Aureliſa, and Æmilius againſt Terentia. And either of them deſiring to make good their ſide, produc'd all the reaſons for it they could invent. For my part, (ſaid Æmilius) I ſee not how the thing can be doubted; for I conceive nothing is more troubleſome to a Wife, than one of thoſe Husbands with a great paſſion, & nothing more convenient than one that is a Gallant. For he is ſcarce ever at home, ſome Feaſt alwaies takes him up; and, as he is unwilling to be conſtrain'd, ſo he gives the ſame liberty which he deſires to take. On the contrary, a Husband of the other ſort, is inſupportable; for out of croſs intention, that he may have ſomething to blame in the deportment of his Wife, to the end that may excuſe his own, he has continually his Spies to obſerve her. But however, (interrupted Theanor) the Husband you repreſent ſo, loves ſome perſon, and ſo his Wife has ſome ground to hope, if he can ceaſe to love his Miſtreſs, her ſelf may at length get into his affection. But what can be hop'd from an inconſtant perſon, who is never capable of loving any thing? If he do not love his Miſtreſſes (ſaid Æmilius) why ſhould his Wife take it ill? But if the Husband who has a conſtant Love, (anſwer'd Theanor) does not ceaſe to uſe his Wife civilly, what reaſon has ſhe to complain? ſince you do not believe it neceſſary to her happineſs, that ſhe be lov'd. For my part, (ſaid Aureliſa, contrary to her own ſentiments again, becauſe ſhe had begun ſo) I am againſt Theanor: And I (added Terentia) againſt Æmilius. In my apprehenſion, (ſaid I then) you are not againſt any body; for to ſpeak ſincerely, you do not well know what you would do, if both of you had Husbands, which did not love you. It is not material for what reaſon you are not lov'd; ſince in what manner ſoever the matter is, it is alwaies troubleſome. However, whether you be lov'd or hated, you ought for Virtue's and your own ſake, to be as faithful to a Husband that does not love you, as to one that does; for it is not fitting ever to revenge your ſelves to his prejudice; nor to offend by example. No doubt Terentia and Aureliſa thought the ſame thing that I ſpoke; for they are both very diſcreet; but they were in a manner not to agree to it, to the end they might have occaſion to conteſt. Nevertheleſs, ſeemlineſs reſtrain'd them, and ſo the converſation ended; after which, Theanor went away with a ſecret indignation againſt Aureliſa, and Æmilius againſt Terentia, tho in truth Æmilius was oblig'd to love Terentia, and Theanor Aureliſa. When they were return'd home, (for they lodg'd together) they fell to ſpeak concerning theſe two Ladies, and reſolved between themſelves, that if their Uncle ſhould oblige them to marry them, Theanor ſhould marry Terentia, and Æmilius Aureliſa. In the mean time, theſe two fair Virgins being retir'd, Terentia ask'd Aureliſa why ſhe would not ſpeak her mind really? 'Twas to hinder you from ſpeaking yours, (anſwer'd ſhe, ſmiling) for I conceiv'd you would not be of my opinion. But by obliging me not to ſpeak what I thought, (reply'd Terentia) you did not ſpeak your own thoughts. 'Tis true, (ſaid ſhe) but do not you know, that ſometimes the miſchief you do others, compenſates us for part of that we do our ſelves? You may judge, Madam, by what I ſay, in what condition things then ſtood. But how weak ſoever this beginning of averſion was which Æmilius had againſt Terentia, and Theanor againſt Aureliſa; and how ſlight ſoever an inclination Terentia had for Æmilius, and Aureliſa for Theanor, theſe firſt impreſſions were the true cauſe of all that have befallen them ſince. For Theanor after having had ſo long and conſtant affection in his Soul, was inſenſibly cur'd of that Love by another, and had a great dearneſs for Terentia, alwaies remembring the ſentiments he had obſerv'd in her mind, at the time of that conteſt, at which I was preſent. About the ſame time too, Æmilius being weary of the turmoil, occaſion'd by the neceſſity of entertaining ſeveral gallantries together, accuſtom'd himſelf to take more pleaſure than uſually in the company of Aureliſa; and thus theſe two friends by degrees became very amorous of the two fair Virgins. But by a ſtrange croſsneſs of Fate, the firſt inclination of theſe two perſons continuing, and being not alwaies able to reſtrain themſelves from bearing envy one towards another, Terentia could not endure Theanor, and wiſht ſo ardently Æmilius would love her in ſtead of him, that ſhe ſeem'd to love him already. Aureliſa on the other ſide, accounting Æmilius inſupportable, deſir'd Theanor would please himſelf leſs with the company of Terentia, and more with hers. Not but that theſe four perſons were every day together; but it is often ſeen, that tho perſons be in the ſame place, their hearts are far diſtant from thoſe in whoſe preſence they are. However they all conceal'd their ſentiments, and not knowing preciſeely in what manner he on whom they depended, would diſpoſe of them, they expected till he declar'd his mind, every one of them deſiring in their hearts, his pleaſure might not check their reſpective inclinations. But it was in a ſhort time perceiv'd, that ſome change hapned in the minds of Æmilius and Theanor; for the ancient Miſtreſs of this latter, being poſſeſs'd with extreme jealouſie, utter'd ſeveral expreſſions, which intimated that Theanor could not but have an other Love. All the Miſtreſſes of Æmilius did the like, and within a very few daies it was generally talkt of, that Theanor was became unfaithful, and Æmilius conſtant. It was alſo added, that the cauſe of the conſtancy of one, and of the infidelity of the other, muſt needs be in Elyniſſa's houſe; but however, it could not be conjectur'd, whether it were Aureliſa that Æmilius lov'd, or whether it were Terentia that had cur'd Theanor of his firſt paſſion: for theſe two Lovers not knowing the intention of their Uncle, durſt not declare themſelvs, and liv'd in partial civility towards theſe two Ladies, for whom they had notwithſtanding very different ſentiments, and by whom likewiſe they were lookt upon after a very different manner. I being then their intimate friend, inform'd them of the rumour that was reported concerning the conſtancy of Æmilius, and the unfaithfulneſs of Theanor, and ask't them for whoſe whose sake Theanor was become unfaithful, and Æmilius constant. For it is not doubted, (added I) but 'tis for the sake of you two, that these Lovers have chang'd inclinations. For my part, (answer'd Terentia suddenly, and blushing) I know not whether Theanor loves me, but I know well Æmilius does not. I am very well assur'd, (said Aureliſa,) Theanor is not faithful for my sake; and as for Æmilius, I care so little for knowing wherefore he ceas'd to be inconstant, that I have not at all taken notice of it. Yet I wonder, (added Terentia) you have not observ'd, that he takes more pleasure in speaking to you, than to me. I assure you I have taken notice of it, (answer'd she); but I have observ'd upon divers occasions, that Theanor uses all his address to avoid discourse with me, and seeks to place himself near you, as often as he can, without doing me incivility. If it be (so repli'd Terentia coldly,) I have reason to complain and pity my self, and I wish Æmilius be more happy than he. If he have any such intention towards me as you speak of, (answer'd Aureliſa) he will not be more happy than his friend nor I than you. In truth (said I to them then) I see not, however the business be, how either of you can be unhappy; for Theanor and Æmilius are both such deserving persons, that you cannot make a bad choice of either of them. They were going to answer, but these two Lovers enter'd, who, to confirm what they had spoken of, handsomely sought to place themselves according to their inclinations. Æmilius approacht near to Aureliſa, and Theanor to Terentia, At which both of them blusht; which the Lovers observing, interpreted to their own advantage (as persons, in their condition, use to take all occasions of flattering themselves) tho in truth it was to their prejudice. For Terentia blusht out of spight, to see that Æmilius prefer'd Aureliſa before her self, and Aureliſa out of anger, to observe that Theanor neglected her in respect of her friend. However, being both intelligent, they suppressed their sentiments, and the conversation was nevertheless sufficiently agreeable at the beginning. For comming to speak of gallantry, the question was put, whether that love were greater that could not contain from declaring her self, or that which was conceal'd out of respect. Terentia being in a great fear lest Theanor should tell her he lov'd her, and more, lest Æmilius should declare his mind to Aureliſa, made haste to answer that there was no cause of doubt, and that there was more love in not telling that one loves, when respect alone causes the Lover's silence, than in going to tell it with precipitancy. Aureliſa now found her self a little perplext; for she lov'd not to be of Terentia's opinion, and was as unwilling to take upon her to maintain, that it was fit to declare one's love, for fear of encouraging Æmilius to tell her something that might not please her. Therefore she chose rather to say nothing of her self, but asked me, What I thought of the case? For my part who had no interest in it, I spoke sincerely what I thought of the matter, and indeavour'd to maintain, that a Lover who could restrain himself from declaring that he lov'd, had a less passion than he who in spight of the respect he bore to his Mistress, and in spight of his own reason, was enforc'd to profess that he was in love. Æmilius was of my opinion, and Theanor intending his silence should be a declaration of his love to Terentia, maintain'd the contrary, and was of her opinion: So that this dispute lasted for a good time. For my part, (said I) I confess to you, I fear people who are not able to contain from saying they love, have nothing in their hearts which torments them very much; and there is no surer token of a luke warm affection, than the long silence of a Lover. For, is not complaint an infallible sign of great sorrowes? little diseases are easily past over in silence, but the wisest complain of such as are great, and all the Philosophy of the most insensible persons, can scarce ever keep from crying out when they suffer very much. So that as, no doubt, it cannot be prov'd that silence is a sign of great pain in the body, no more can it be made out to be an evidence of great grief of mind. But, do you make no difference (said Theanor) between a great love and a great pain? No, (answer'd I); for, besides that I am perswaded there is no love without inquietude, which is a kind of pain, I am so also, that a Lover who has not declar'd his passion, has so vehement a desire to tell it, that he suffers one of the greatest torments in the world. You have reason, Amiclea (said Æmilius to me) and I can answer you, that for certain it is the greatest misery that can be imagin'd. 'Tis no doubt a great trouble (repli'd Theanor) but for that reason it is a great sign of love; for is there any thing more obliging to a Lady, than to make her know, that the fear of displeasing her, and the respect you have for her, obliges you to be silent, and to suffer without complaining? and besides (added he) to speak equitably, was a Lover ever believ'd upon his word? and if he does no more than say, I love you, would any Lady in the world believe him? And if so, the best way or course to prove one's love, is by a thousand cares, and a thousand services, sighs, glances, and a thousand other wayes more effectual than words, without offending a fair person, who will not have the respect due to her, lost. Believe me (said I then to Theanor) the sighes, glances, cares and services you speak of, may be compar'd to metal, (of which not long since money has been made at Rome) whose value is redoubled by the Prince's stamp. For all that is done for a fair person before a man discovers himself to be a Lover, is lookt upon but as testimonies of esteem and friendship at most, and, till after such declarations, she does not look upon the services render'd to her, as testimonies of love. What you say, is, no doubt, very well spoken (said I to him) but it must be added, that when people are forbidden to speak, 'tis taken for no great offence if they break that prohibition, in case they be esteem'd, and they knew how to do it handsomely. But, Amiclea (answer'd Terentia) I think you have lost your reason, in accusing women of such a defect as this; For, I conceive, a deserving person can never be more oblig'd than when she sees her displeasure is dreaded, and that she is fear'd and respected. 'Tis true (repli'd I) but if a Lover do not profess himself to be such, how will he ever be lov'd? I know not whether he will be lov'd or no (answer'd Terentia) but I know well, that a Lover who should tell me rudely that he lov'd me, should be hated. When Amiclea (repli'd Æmilius) maintains it fit for a lover to declare his passion, she does not mean he should do it after an unhandsome manner. As I was going to answer, the Lady which Theanor had lov'd so long, arriv'd with two others; her name was Meneſile, and it is not to be doubted, but she is a very confident person, and passionate. This visit very much much surpriz'd the company; for she did not use to visit Elymisa. But jealousie exciting a desire in her to see what pass'd in this cabal, she caus'd her self to be introduc'd by one of Tolumnius's friends. Nevertheless Theanor the better to make known his love to Terentia, continu'd with her, tho he did not speak to her apart, for should he have done it, she would not have given him occasion. When Aureliſa beheld this Lady enter, she well understood that a sentiment of jealousie induc'd her to make this visit; so that perceiving she still lov'd Theanor, this redoubled the inclination she had for him, as well as the envy she bore to Terentia; for she was extremely sorry that she was not the person to whom he prov'd unfaithful. A quarter of an hour after, three of Æmilius's ancient Mistresses arriv'd; but he saluted them so coldly, and lookt upon them so little, that it could scarce be thought he had ever seen them before. Whereupon Terentia observing that this unfaithful person was become constant, was extreamly perplexed it was not for her sake that he despis'd all his former Mistresses. And so she became as melancholick as Aureliſa. However, civility obliging them to entertain those that came to visit them, they fell to discourse of several things; after which the conversation being chang'd on a sudden, they inveighed very much against men in general. It was affirm'd that they were very frequently unjust, vindicative, inconstant, insensible, and given to detraction. Theanor and Æmilius then maintain'd the cause of their own sex, defended themselves the best they could. But at length, I know not how it came to pass, but one of the new-come Ladies, who did not love Menesile, askt me if I believ'd that a woman whom a man ceas'd to love, ought to be more offended than another, who could not gain the affection of a man she lov'd. This proposition made Menesile, Terentia, and Aureliſa blush, which nevertheless was obserr'd only by my self. Menesile recollecting her self in a moment, had confidence enough to make good her own cause. 'Tis so easie to answer to what you demand (said she) that tho many persons be present here, who have more wit than my self, I think I shall have enough to convince you, that 'tis greater shame not to be able to makes one's self be lov'd, than to be abandon'd. For the shame reflects upon the desertor, and not on her that is forsaken. I know not whose the shame is (repli'd I) but I believe the anger is on her side that is relinquisht, if she persists to love. I believe (said Menesile) the cause of the anger is for having been deceiv'd; but however, a person that cannot make her self be lov'd, is not only angry, but ashamed of her own weakness: and whereas a woman that has been lov'd, and is so no longer, is possessed onely with despight, hatred, and contempt of her Renegade; she that loves without being lov'd, comes at length, when she has any heart, to hate and despise her self; which, no doubt is the cruellest thing in the world. While Menesile was speaking thus, Terentia, Aureliſa, and Theanor, were extremely perplext, being inforc'd to hear an unpleasing discourse, without answering to it. I observing their trouble (answer'd Menesile) and desiring to make a third party, In truth (said I to her) whether a woman loves without being lov'd, or whether her Lover forsakes her, she is worthy of pity if she be vertuous; for as for such as are not, they ought never to be pitied. But I would know further (said she who made this proposition) who suffers most of the two. She that loves most (answer'd Terentia). That is likely (repli'd a Lady of the company) to be the forsaken Lady; for I cannot understand that he that is not lov'd, can love very ardently. For my part (said another) I do not conceive a woman can love, if her affection be not answer'd when she gives some Testimony of it; but I do not believe it impossible but a vertuous person may have a secret and hidden inclination which may lead her to love rather one man than another; tho without testifying any thing of it. If it be so (answer'd Menesile) I believe really she that is forsaken suffers more than she that is not lov'd; but if she believes that her eyes have betray'd the secret of her heart, and that he that she loves understands her affection without answering to it, I conceive she undergoes the torment of a shame of greater pain to her, than the blackest infidelity can cause. For in this case the remedy is at hand by scorning him from whom the injury is receiv'd. Whil'st Menesile was speaking thus, Æmilius talk't low to Aureliſa, who at that instant lik t rather to hear him, than to be oblig'd to answer Menesile. You are very melancholick to day, Madam, (said he to her) altho I do not complain of your silence; for it being a kind of consent, I presume you agree that Amilcar had reason to say: There is greater love in not being able to contain from discovering that passion, than in being silent out of respect; and therefore to avoid giving you leisure to change your sentiments, it is best for me to tell you in the most respectful manner possible, that of the most inconstant of all men you will make the most faithful Lover in the World, provided you will please to fasten the Knots which tye me to your service. I beseech you, Æmilius, (answer'd Aureliſa much astonish'd) do not force me to speak more rudely to you than I would: you know I have respect for Tolumnius, and that I should be extream sorry to displease him. However if you accustome your self to speak to me as you do, it shall be hard but I will find out wayes to deliver me from your importunity. Aureliſa spoke this with a certain severe aspect, which sensibly afflicted Æmilius; but in stead of being repell'd by it, he became more amorous; for he was one of those to whom the difficulties of things encreases the desire of possessing them. Wherefore he spoke again to Aureliſa to the same purpose, but so respectfully, that she had no pretext to be offended with him. On the other side Theanor observing all Menesile's discourse was only to despight him, design'd to take advantage of her anger: so that when all the company was gone, he continu'd last, and approaching to Terentia who was musing by a window, If you remember, Madam (said he to her with a low voice) all that you have heard spoken indirectly against me, remember also at the same time, that I have suffer'd it for your sake; and that if I had not an infinite respect for you, I should tell you, that did I not love you, I should not be unfaithful. I assure you (answer'd she) I will alwaies remember the quality you give your self, to the end I may not be endanger'd to love you more than I do; for in brief a man that can forsake one woman for another when he is lov'd by her, may prove unfaithful to all that shall put confidence in him. After this, going aside to Aureliſa, Theanor was constrain'd to go away without saying more to her. The rest of the evening Terentia and Aureliſa were sufficiently melancholick, they undrest themselves almost without speaking to one another, tho they lay in the same Chamber, and it was not till the next morning that they ſpoke any thing. When, after they were dreſt, according to their cuſtome, they went into a little Cloſet not far from their Chamber, expecting the hour to go to the Temple. As ſoon as they were there, Aureliſa (who naturally was more debonair than Terentia) ask't her with a ſomething forc'd ſmile, whence it came to paſs ſhe was ſo penſive that day; For (ſaid ſhe) they ought not to be melancholick who have gain'd a victory. You ought then to be more frolick than you are (anſwer'd Terentia) for you have triumph'd more gloriouſly than I. If you will change your victory (reply'd Aureliſa) I am content. I aſſure you, it ſhall not be my fault (anſwer'd Terentia): not that I abſolutely agree to what I perceive you think; but I anſwer to your words rather than to the truth of the buſineſs you ſet upon me for. But I ſhall alwaies draw this advantage from what you have ſaid, that I ſee Æmilius has mention'd his love to you, and I did not convince him yeſterday. I acknowledge it (repli'd Aureliſa, knowing it would afflict Terentia): but now confeſs to me whether Theanor did not make you know he loves you; and that as I have made a faithful Lover of an unconſtant one, you have made a man unfaithful who was reputed the moſt conſtant in the World. Your ſincerity requiring the like from me (anſwer'd Terentia) I confeſs to you, Theanor made me underſtand he loves me. Ah! Terentia (ſaid Aureliſa) why have you not made Æmilius your Lover? Ah! Aureliſa (ſay'd Terentia) wherefore have you not gain'd the heart of Theanor, which I know not what to do with? The miſery is (added ſhe) that I perceive 'tis Tolumnius's abſolute pleaſure we ſhould marry his Nephews; and that, according as your heart and mine are diſpos'd, we ſhall be alwaies unhappy. For I tell you again, I ſhall never be able to live with Æmilius, tho he is a perſon of merit. I ſay the ſame of Theanor (anſwer'd Terentia). After this, the like unhappineſs uniting the hearts of theſe two Virgins, they promis'd much friendſhip and fidelity one to another. But, in order to ſeek ſome remedy to their hard fortunes, Terentia promis'd Aureliſa alwaies to treat Theanor ill, and never to marry him, what command ſoever Tolumnius ſhould lay upon her to that purpoſe, whom ſhe obeyed as her own father. And Aureliſa likewiſe promis'd on her part, never to ſpeak any thing favourable to Æmilius, nor marry him, whatever command ſhould be lay'd upon her to it; they promis'd alſo to relate ſincerely all that thoſe two Lovers ſhould ſay to them. But alaſs! (ſaid Terentia) all our providence will perhaps be unprofitable to hinder us from being unhappy; for it is in our power not to marry thoſe we do not love, but if it ſhould be propounded to us to marry thoſe we do not hate, perhaps we ſhall not be able to refuſe them, tho they do not love us; and 'tis poſſible Theanor and Æmilius will have the weakneſs to obey Tolumnius out of a regard to their intereſt. However, I confeſs to you, I ſhould think my ſelf as unhappy to marry a man who ſhould not love me, and I ſhould affect, as to marry one whom I had no affection for, and lov'd me. You have reaſon (anſwer'd Aureliſa). But ſince hope is not to be diſclaim'd to the laſt, we ought to hope that being united as we are at preſent, it may fall out that we may change our deſtiny; Æmilius may come to love you, and Theanor not to hate me. After this they made a thouſand careſſes to one another, and expreſs'd a thouſand blandiſhments. At the end of this converſation they went to the Temple, where their two Lovers were, who confirm'd by their looks what they had ſpoken the day before. At their return from the Temple, they were told, one of her Friends, deſired they would go in the evening into the Gardens of the Palace, whither, as you know, Madam, the whole Court reſorts very frequently in fair weather. Accordingly they went thither with a Kinſwoman of theirs, imagining their Friend would take the pleaſure to walk with them; but they found it was to hear muſick-entertainment which Theanor and Æmilius had prepar'd for them, and that ſhe in whoſe name they were requeſted to come, knew nothing of this gallantry; which, inſtead of exciting joy in them for whom it was intended, afforded them but regret and diſcontent. Some daies after, theſe Lovers gave a magnificent Collation to the ſame perſons, in that delightful Grove which is call'd the Grove of the Spring, becauſe the verdure appears there ſooner than any other where, and all the World reſorts to walk there in that ſeaſon: and to make their love more taken notice of, one evening they gave a Ball under a magnificent Tent in the middle of that Meadow, which is call'd the Meadow of Flora, becauſe indeed it is alwaies cover'd over with flowers. Terentia and Aureliſa were at a deſperate loſs with theſe contrivances of their two Lovers to pleaſe them; but yet it behov'd to be preſent at all their entertainments for fear of diſpleaſing Tolumnius and Elinyſſa. Not long after, they were joyful to underſtand that Tolumnius had reſolv'd to go and ſpend ſome time in the Countrey at a very fair houſe of his near Cluſium. They underſtood alſo that I was to be of the company, and accordingly I departed two daies after with them upon which occaſion, as friendſhip is more ſpeedily contracted during a little journey into the Countrey than in the City, they were pleas'd to make me privy to the ſtate they were in, leſt Tolumnius ſhould determine to marry them after a manner contrary to their own inclinations; and, in brief, they told me all the principal ſecrets they had in their breaſts. I confeſs to you they caus'd me to pity them, and finding an occaſion to intermeddle with love innocently, I promis'd to do all I could to change the hearts of their two Lovers, who were both my familiar friends. During our Countrey-journey, there was nothing but continual feaſting; but theſe two Virgins deſiring me not to deſert them at all, that ſo their Lovers might not have the liberty to ſpeak to them apart, I did it indeed ſo handſomely, without Æmilius and Theanor's ever ſuſpecting my deſign to hinder them from diſcourſing to them, that they could not ſay any thing to them concerning their paſſion. I did not content my ſelf with doing this office to theſe two Virgins, I ſpoke ſeverally to both their Lovers, in order to perſwade them into ſentiments contrary to their own. For ſpeaking to Æmilius I extol'd Terentia with exaggeration, and did the like for Aureliſa ſpeaking to Theanor. But, to ſpeak truth, I did not obſerve they commended them with the ſame ardour. On the contrary when I ſpoke of Aureliſa to Theanor he ſpoke to me of Terentia; and as ſoon as I nam'd Terentia to Æmilius, he mention'd Aureliſa to me. In the mean time theſe two Lovers were ſo ſolicitous to get get themselves lov'd, that they did not perceive they were lov'd by those whom they did not affect. 'Tis true, Terentia and Aureliſa being both diſcreet and vertuous, they conceal'd their ſentiments the beſt they could, and did not ceaſe to ſeem pleaſant, to be ſociable, and ſhew an equal civility to thoſe for whom they had very differing ſentiments. That which render'd them the more unhappy, was, that tho Theanor were in love with Terentia, yet he did not ceaſe to live much in favour with Aureliſa; and tho Æmylius lov'd Aureliſa, yet he was much complacential towards Terentia. Now it falling out that theſe two Lovers had Affairs at Court, they made but little journeys on a day. They made very urgent requeſts to Aureliſa and Terentia that they would permit them to write to them, but they would not grant it. Yet I, who lov'd news well when I was in the Countrey, deſir'd one of my friends who was one of theirs too, to ſend me not only what he knew at Cluſium, but likewiſe all intelligence he ſhould receive from any other place, for he was one that had correſpondence throughout all Italy. Not that I car'd much what paſs'd in places where I knew no perſon, but Tolumnius loving to know all that was acted all the World over, I was willing to divert him during my reſiding at his houſe. And accordingly, that Friend of mine ſeveral times ſent me very ample relations of all that paſs'd at Court, with the extracts of Letters which he receiv'd from Rome, Veii, Tarentum, Cuma, Volaterra, Panormus, Capua, and divers other places. So that this affording divertiſement to Tolumnius, and the news of the World giving ſufficient pleaſure to Terentia, Aureliſa, and my ſelf, we awaited with much impatience the day that we were to receive Letters. One night we went to walk, expecting their arrival, and thinking to have them a moment ſooner. And as we were between two Meadows border'd about with Willows, we ſaw him arrive who was wont to bring my Packets, and who now deliver'd me ſeveral. Amongſt the reſt, I beheld one which I did not know, ſo that the deſire of knowing who writ it, caus'd me to open it firſt; which done, I found it was a relation divided into diſtinct Articles like thoſe I was wont to receive, tho I did not know the Character of it. Terentia and Aureliſa obſerving my aſtoniſhment, approch't toward me; and all three of us ſitting down at the foot of a Tree, I began to read the relation which was in effect the ſame I am going to repeat to you; for I know I ſhall not alter the ſenſe; however, I may ſomething change the words.

Of the Court.

Perſons envious, diſcontented, and ungratefull are always to be found here; they to whom any thing is given, believe they deſerve more; they to whom nothing is given, think that rob'd from them which is given to others; in the mean time all the World is oftentimes in a hurly burly without knowing wherefore. There are found there ambitious perſons without merit, flatterers ill rewarded, falſe friends reſembling true, an out ſide of goodneſſe which charms new-comers, and yet do's not deceive them who have experience; in brief, impoſture and fraud is ſeen every where, and handſome deportment without honeſty. As for love, there is little can be call'd ſo; altho ſometimes certain frivolous loves are to be ſeen there, which are fit only for young idle perſons that know not what to do, and many times too know not what to ſay. Loves of intereſts are ſeen there likewiſe, which inſpire onely unworthy actions, and there is ſcarce ever any ſincere love to be found unleſſe it be in the breaſts of Theanor and Æmylius, whoſe hearts they ſay are in the Countrey, tho their perſons are ſeen every day at the Queen's Palace, where thy appear ſo melancholy that all the Ladies complain of them.

Of CLUSIUM.

All the envious Fair ones rejoice here, for the abſence of the two faireſt perſons in the World; yet they do not draw much advantage by it: for all worthy perſons are ſo afflicted with it, that all their converſations are turn'd into ſadneſſe. There are ſome who affirm two of their Loves are in danger to die of ſorrow if they do not ſpeedily return, tho it be not the cuſtom to die for the abſence of a rigorous Miſtreſſe; Otherwiſe, Cluſium is as it is wont to be, that is, the powerful oppreſſe the weak, every one ſeeks that which pleaſes him, thoſe which govern are repin'd at, projects and deſigns are contriv'd to no end, little true vertue is to be found there, but much hypocriſie, diſorderly magnificence, exceſſive avarice, injuſtice, irregularity and confuſion.

Of the Gardens of the Palace.

All the Ladies who were wont to pull down their Veils, when they fear'd leſt their beauty ſhould be conſtrain'd to yield to that of Terentia and Aureliſa, walk with open countenances during their abſence; but for that the image of thoſe two fair perſons remains in the hearts of all thoſe who have judicious eyes in relations to beauty, they have never the more admirers, and the remembrance of thoſe who are no more ſeen there, ſtill prejudices the glory of thoſe that are.

On the Grove of the Spring.

Tho all the Trees be here as green as uſual, yet there is much leſſe company than was wont; not but that there are ſtill a hundred thouſand Birds which make the moſt delightfull melody that can be heard; but the reaſon, no doubt, is, for that the crowd of honorable perſons who came to walk here the laſt year, came not ſo much to hear the Nightingals ſing as to behold the two faireſt perſons of the Earth, who were ſeen there almoſt every day. Now, inſtead of them, two melancholick Lovers are ſeen very frequently there, who came to ſigh in the moſt ſolitary places of the Grove. Sometimes they looſe themſelves in it, their grief ſo poſſeſſes them; and there are ſome alſo who aſſure they have made very amorous Verſes which have been found carv'd upon the Trees, by which it appears that one of them loves a handſom fair woman, and the other a beautiful brown. However, this Wood appears ſo ſolitary, that there is cauſe to believe there will be no more reſorting to it, if thoſe two fair ones who are abſent do not ſpeedily return.

On the Ball, upon the evening of Juno's Feſtivall.

All ſorts of people are ſeen here; ſome dance well, others ill, and many others do not dance at all. There are ſeen alſo ſeveral Ladies who ought not to dance more, becauſe 'tis too long agoe ſince they begun to dance. There are young people too, who begin to ſee the World by the Ball, and are ſo out of countenance, that they cannot dance according to the right cadence. Here are alſo knots and factions, tho the deſign oftentimes is onely to dance ill. But, what is moſt reſented, is, that the faireſt ornament of the Aſſemblies at Cluſium is no longer ſeen here, namely Terentia and Aureliſa. And 'tis for the ſame reaſon, that Theanor and Æmilius are not ſeen here, who like better to be in ſolitude by themſelves than to be ſeen at the Ball, where they cannot ſee the only perſons that can pleaſe them.

On the Medow of Flora.

All the World is much amaz'd, not to ſee any longer here that abundance of Flowers which were wont to be ſeen every year. Indeed, they ſay the Weſt-winds, which ſerve to maintain the freſhneſſe of Flowers, have follow'd thoſe two fair ones that love them, and that this is the cauſe the Medow has almoſt no Flowers this year. They ſpeak of ſending to requeſt them to return; but very many beauties oppoſe it, becauſe they like better the Medow ſhould be without Flowers, than to ſee the admirable complexion of Aureliſa and Terentia outſhine the luſtre of their own.

On the Temple of Venus.

A great ſacrifice is preparing here for two unfortunate Lovers, who cannot be lov'd by their Miſtreſſes, tho they have the moſt ardent and faithful paſſion in their breaſts that ever was. There are ſome believe, that if they do not reſolve to reward their fidelity, the Goddeſſe they adore will revenge their deaths after a ſtrange manner; for 'tis the cuſtom of this Goddeſſe, when ſhe is offended with Ladies rebellions againſt the Laws of her ſon, to take away their beauty immaturely, or cauſe them to love without being lov'd. Therefore 'tis to be wiſh'd, thoſe two fair perſons would reward their Lovers for being ſo faithful. If they do ſo, they ſhall be happy in the higheſt degree, nothing being more ſweet than to love and be lov'd, nor nothing ſo miſerable as not to love at all.

Well, (ſaid I to Aureliſa and Terentia, after I had done reading this news) What think you of that which you have heard? Me thinks, (anſwer'd Terentia) to my great diſcontent, Æmilius has a great wit. How? (reply'd Aureliſa roughly) do not you know 'tis Theanor that made this gallantry? For my part, (ſaid I to them) if you ask me what I think, I ſhall tell you I believe it belongs to them both in common, that they have joyn'd their braines together, that they have both contriv'd the deſign, and afterwards caus'd it to be written by an unknown hand. No, no, (anſwer'd Terentia) 'tis not Theanor that writ theſe news; no queſtion he has much wit, but it does not lye this way, and 'tis only Æmilius that could invent this folly. On the contrary (reply'd Aureliſa) it looks ſo like Theanor's, that I cannot be miſtaken. However it be, (ſaid I to them) if the Author of this Gallantry be doubtful, the cauſe of it is not ſo too, and you may eaſily judge that it was made for your ſakes. Alas! (anſwer'd Terentia) what am I the better, if this contrivance be ingenious and handſome, if Love inſpir'd Æmilius with it only to divert Aureliſa? Good gods, (reply'd that fair Virgin) what advantage is it to me, that Theanor had a hand in this agreeable folly, ſince you were the only occaſion of it? 'Tis very ſtrange, (ſaid I to them) that by theſe news it cannot be known, whether Theanor intended it to Terentia or Æmilius to Aureliſa. Alas! (anſwer'd Terentia) the matter is not dubious; for after what they have told us, they conceive we eaſily make the application of what they write. However, all their wit is very ill beſtow'd in the manner they employ it. But wherefore (ſaid I) do not you both ſtrive to conform your minds to your fortunes, and to love them that love you? Ah! my dear Amicles, (cry'd Terentia) how happy are you in being ignorant of the power of a vehement inclination! and how cruell (added Aureliſa) in thinking we do not do all we are able, to love thoſe that love us! At leaſt, I know I have omitted nothing to effect it, nor neglected any endeavours to love Æmilius, and hate Theanor. I have done more than you, (anſwer'd Terentia) for I have attempted to bring my ſelfe to that paſſe, as to be only indifferent for both, and I could never effect it, and notwithſtanding all my endeavours, I have ſtill an inclination for Æmilius and averſion for Theanor. However, out of reſpect both to Vertue and Seemlineſſe, both the one and the other ought to be equally conceal'd, for fear of offending Tolumnius; and that which renders me more miſerable, is, that I believe, if Æmilius knew I did not hate him, and you did, it is poſſible he would love me. I have believ'd as you do, (reply'd Terentia) that if Æmilius were not ignorant of your averſion againſt him, and the inclination I have to love him, in all probability he would love me; but at preſent I believe it leſſe than I did. Therefore that which pleaſes me moſt in this Gallantry of Theanor and Æmilius, is, that theſe two Lovers however ſuſpect nothing of our weakneſſe towards them, and ſo I may ſee them without bluſhing; for if they had had any ſuch ſuſpition, they would not have ſaid in this laſt Article of news, that when Venus is offended, ſhe puniſhes the fair ones, that have diſobey'd her, by cauſing them to love without being lov'd. In truth, (anſwer'd Aureliſa) our deſtiny is ſufficiently intricate; for according to all probability we are likely to be very unhappy. After this, ſhe took the pleaſant news that was written to me, and read it over from the beginning ſilently, whilſt Terentia was in a deep muſing, and I ſtood by obſerving them both. After Aureliſa had read the pacquet, Terentia took her turn to read it too; and tho it was ſent on purpoſe to divert them, yet it made them both very ſad. Nevertheleſſe, they had ſome conſolation the next day; for Tolumnius ſpeaking to me in private, told me he had a purpoſe to marry Terentia and Aureliſa to his Nephews, and therefore deſir'd me to know of theſe two Ladies what their inclination was, it being more juſt (as he ſaid) to know the true ſentiments of thoſe which ought to obey, than of thoſe who are to command. Wherefore (taking this occaſion to do a ſervice to my friends, tho it were againſt the inclination of my two of the other Sexe) I told him it was not neceſſary for me to ſpeak to Terentia or Aureliſa, and that ſince I underſtood them better than they did themſelves, I could aſſure him Terentia would never be happy, if ſhe marry'd Theanor, but that ſhe might be ſo with Æmilius; on the other ſide, that Aureliſa would be miſerable with Æmilius, and very well ſatisfi'd with Theanor. If it be ſo, (reply'd Tolumnius) it will be eaſie for me to content them; for Theanor and Æmilius will not dare to diſobey me; and beſides, (added he) I believe their hearts are free enough at preſent, not to make any reſiſtance to my commands. Moreover, both Terentia and Aureliſa are ſo well educated, that it will be no difficulty for them to comply with my pleaſure. I thought to tell him then that he was miſtaken, miſtaken, but I was afraid to ſpeak too much; and therefore I left the matter in this condition, and went to find my Friends. Terentia preſently bluſh't at what I had ſaid, but Aureliſa thank'd me for it; for I ſee not (ſaid ſhe) how any inconvenience can follow upon this adventure; for if Theanor and Æmilius readily obey, it will be a ſign the paſſion they have for us, will not be ſtrong enough to hinder us from hoping to be lov'd by them; and if they abſolutely refuſe to obey, indignation will cure us, and perhaps lead us to admit of the affection of them that love us, For my part, (ſaid Terentia) I hope nothing, and I fear all; but when all is done, the caſe having no remedy, muſt be reſolv'd upon. The ſame evening theſe two Lovers deſiring to know how their news was taken, arriv'd, and made ſhew as if they knew nothing of it. But I being deſirous to oblige them, commended that Gallantry before them; I ſhewd them it, and I brought them at length to confeſſe in ſecret, that they had contriv'd it together, as I had imagin'd. After all the Company was retir'd, Tolumnius did not fail to cauſe them to be call'd, that he might tell them what he had reſolv'd upon. You know (ſaid he to them) what command I lay'd upon you, to accuſtome to viſit Terentia and Aureliſa, and that 'tis my pleaſure you ſhould marry them; but ſince it is hard for a Man to be contented with the deportment of his Wife, if he be not lov'd by her, I have obſerv'd and caus'd the inclinations of the two perſons I deſign for you carefully to be noted by a perſon of their familiarity. So that it ſhall be your own fault if you be not happy; for in brief, I know Terentia has for you (ſaid he, looking upon Æmilius) all the inclination a vertuous Virgin can have for a Man whom ſhe looks upon as he that is to be her huſband: and I know alſo (added he, ſpeaking to Theanor) that Aureliſa has a dearneſſe for you, which ought to oblige you to prefer her readily before Terentia. Is it poſſible, my Lord (anſwer'd they both at once) that you ſhould be well inform'd of that which you ſpeak? Doubt not of it, (reply'd he) and conform your ſelves to my will; for tho you ſhould have no great affection for theſe two Ladies, ye muſt think of nought but to marry them. They are fair, young, prudent, and rich; and that's ſufficient. If you do not love them before you marry them, you will love them after; as well as it often-times falls out, that they who love their Wives before, come ſhortly after not to love them at all. Marriage and Love are two things, which are not frequently long together; and therefore determine only to obey me, for all my eſtate is for them who obey me, and not for others. As for what concerns me, (reply'd Theanor) no reſpect of intereſt ſhall ever cauſe me to do any thing. And for my part, (added Æmilius) nothing can ever induce me to marry Terentia. But, in brief, (added he) ſince it equally concerns Theanor and my ſelfe, to let you know the truth, we ardently love Terentia and Aureliſa. But, my Lord, 'tis becauſe we love them that we cannot marry them in the manner you propound to us; for Theanor loves Terentia, and I love Aureliſa. But ſince Aureliſa loves Theanor, (reply'd Tolumnius) and you are lov'd by Terentia, it concernes you to enforce your ſentiments; for it is much more dangerous for a man to marry a Wife by whom he is hated, than it is for him to marry one whom he loves not, if he be lov'd by her, eſpecially when ſhe is fair and wiſe. However it be, (ſaid he to them) I will not lay any conſtraint upon the two young Ladies, whoſe Parents at their death left them under my Guardianſhip. But ſince you depend on me, and have a thouſand obligations to me, and ſince I can ruine you when I pleaſe, you ought to yield to my will: do ſo if you be wiſe; for aſſuredly you ſhall repent your ſelves if you do otherwiſe. Tolumnius ſpoke this with an aſpect of choler, which hindred Theanor and Æmilius from anſwering him; beſides, having made them a ſign to retire, they were conſtrain'd to go forth of his chamber to their own, but with ſo much affliction, that they ſpent the night without ſleeping: for Tolumnius having told them he knew the inclinations of Terentia and Aureliſa, they imagin'd it was an artifice of thoſe two Ladies who hated them, to put an obſtacle to their deſign. The next morning they were ſo ſad, that never was a day paſs'd after a more melancholy manner than that; for Tolumnius was poſſeſs'd both with grief and indignation; the two Lovers were alike in deſpair; and Terentia and Aureliſa were both equally afflicted and aſham'd. Not long after Tolumnius told me, it very much troubled him, to find that Theanor and Æmilius had diſpos'd of their hearts otherwiſe than they ought, but he intreated me to ſay nothing of it to Terentia and Aureliſa, and aſſur'd me he knew well how to make himſelf be obey'd. Yet this news did not rejoyce theſe two fair Ladies, from whom I thought I ought not to conceal it; for when they came to conſider, that if Tolumnius perſecuted Theanor and Æmilius, they might be hated by thoſe whom they lov'd, their minds were in a ſtrange perplexity. On the other ſide, the two Lovers, who were intimate friends, were in an unconceivable trouble; for if they reſolv'd to obey, they ſhould marry Women whom they did not love, either of them remaining amorous of one another's Wives. You may eaſily conceive that this gave them no ſmall affliction. Indeed in this condition they knew not what to ſay, either to her that they lov'd, or to her that they did not affect. Wherefore they choſe rather to return to Cluſium, than to continue in a place ſo unpleaſing to them. Their departure offended Tolumnius, and ſenſibly afflicted Terentia and Aureliſa. Sometimes they had ſentiments of hatred, ſometimes thoughts of love, and ſcarce ever any other than apprehenſions of deſpaire. For my part, I did all I could to appeaſe Tolumnius, and to comfort the two afflicted Ladies; but at length the time was come to return to the City, where all theſe perſons were in a new perplexity. Before Tolumnius had ſpoken to the two Lovers, they did not perceive that themſelves were very much hated or lov'd; but after he had told them they were not lov'd at all, and yet that they were not hated, they wonder'd they had no ſooner underſtood the truth. When Theanor beheld Terentia, he obſerv'd in her eyes a forc'd civility, which caus'd him almoſt to dye with grief, and when he look'd upon Aureliſa, he ſaw in hers ſomething ſo ſweet and modeſt, which intimated ſo much obligement, that he wonder'd he had not before perceiv'd it. Æmilius on his part, when he look't upon Aureliſa, perceiv'd ſuch a kind of fierceneſſe in her eyes, that he could not ſee her without diſcontent; but he obſerv'd obliging languor in thoſe of Terentia, tho he avoided her looks as much as he could, that it made him think himſelfe ſtill more unhappy. Having taken notice of theſe different ſenti-

ments, the two Lovers became more miſerable; for before they comforted one another, but after that time they had ſeverall fallings out, and accus'd one another unjuſtly, for the cauſes of their unhappineſſe. But yet from time to time, the equality of their ill fortune reunited them, and they conteſted again as often, and were poſſeſs'd with jealouſie, altho they had no cauſe for it. For ſometimes Theanor accus'd Æmilius of not being diſpleas'd for being too much lov'd by Terentia, and preſently after Æmilius reproacht to Theanor, that he was glad for being lov'd by Aureliſa. In the mean time they were poſſeſs'd with ſo violent a paſſion, that they could not reſolve ever to obey Tolumnius. Who being an imperious man, was extremely diſguſted with them, inſomuch, that he ſaid publickly, he would give all his eſtate to Terentia and Aureliſa, and marry them to others. And no queſtion it was eaſy to find perſons that would marry two fair, young, rich, and vertuous Ladies; in order to which he propos'd to match Terentia and Aureliſa to two men of quality, who were amorous of them. But theſe two Ladies requeſted him with very much generoſity, not to take away his eſtate from his nephews, and refuſed to marry the perſons he propounded to them, telling him, that if the buſineſſe were once accompliſht, they that ſhould marry them, would not require what he gave them, and that for their parts it was not poſſible for them to reſolve to ſee two ſuch deſerving perſons as Theanor and Æmilius, unhappy, for their ſakes. However, 'tis certain Love had a ſhare in their generoſity, and it was not in their power to marry two men whom they did not love. Tolumnius eſteeming them the more for this deportment, hated his nephews more, who on the other ſide were deſperate at ſo generous actions, becauſe they found it did not prejudice their love: for their paſſion increaſed from day to day, and they were ſo unhappy, that I could not but commiſerate them. Mean while, they to whom Tolumnius pretended to marry theſe two fair virgins, looking upon Theanor and Æmilius, as the obſtacles of their happineſſe, did not ſee them but with trouble and indignation; and Æmilius and Theanor on the other ſide, conſidering them as perſons that intended to make advantage of their unhappineſſe, ſought occaſion to quarrel with them, which they ſoon found, and fought. Theanor encountred him that was to marry Terentia, and Æmilius was matcht with him that was to have Aureliſa to his wife. The firſt of them mortally wounded his enemy, and Æmilius diſarm'd his. Indeed their victory coſt them dear; for they were both very much wounded. This combat further increaſed the anger of Tolumnius, and caus'd much grief to Terentia and Aureliſa: for the latter was afflicted to ſee Theanor ardently lov'd by Terentia, and the former was ſo, to obſerve how much Æmilius was enamor'd on Aureliſa; but theſe two Ladies were much more troubled when they underſtood their two Lovers were in danger of dying. For, being poſſeſſed with great diſcontent, their wounds became ſufficienlty dangerous, and it was believ'd they would dy, tho their ſtrength was ſtill very vigorous. However, Tolumnius would not ſee them, but Elinyſſa viſited them without her husband's knowledge. During their weakneſſe, Terentia and Aureliſa omitted no obliging care towards them both, without diſtinction. The two lovers requeſted Elinyſſa, ſhe would pleaſe to let them ſee their fair Miſtreſſes before they dy'd. Who being good and compaſſionate, promis'd them they ſhould, and entreated me to perſwade my friends; whom with no great difficulty I brought to conſent to it, not knowing but in this condition the two Lovers would reſolve to render juſtice to their affection. They requeſted me that I would be one in this ſad converſation; and Tolumnius being then at his houſe in the Country, Elinyſſa lead us to the lodgings of theſe unhappy Lovers, either of which deſir'd to ſpeak one after another to their Miſtreſſes. After the firſt civilities, I betook my ſelf to diſcourſe with Elinyſſa, whilſt Theanor was ſpeaking to Aureliſa, and Æmylius to Terentia. I deſire your pardon, Madam, (ſaid Æmilius to her, by whom he was lov'd) for the trouble I give you; but I find my ſelf ſo unhappy, and ſo criminal, that I have not been able to refuſe my ſelfe the conſolation of juſtifying, or at leaſt excuſing my ſelf to you. For, in brief, Madam, when I firſt began to viſit you, I obſerv'd my friend lov'd you; and I have alwaies found him ſo deſerving a perſon, that I could not doubt but that he was lov'd again. Wherefore ſuffering my heart to be ſurpriz'd by the charms of Aureliſa, I was not in a condition to diſpoſe of my ſelf, when I underſtood you had an averſion againſt Theanor, tho he had a great paſſion for you. However, you have not ceas'd to be good and generous; and, to perfect your being ſo, (added he), pardon me a crime which I cannot yet hinder my ſelf from committing, and ſave the life of an illuſtrious friend, to render juſtice to the affection Theanor bears you. For, in brief, amiable Terentia, I do not love Aureliſa more ardently than Theanor does you. I wiſh to the gods (anſwer'd ſhe ſighing) I could love Theanor, I ſhould be more happy than I am; but however, I can aſſure you I pity you both, and am much afflicted I cannot contribute to the felicity of either. Alas! Madam, (reply'd he) for my part I ſeek nothing but to dy a little leſſe criminal in your eſteem, and a little leſſe hated by the charming Aureliſa. I underſtand you well (anſwer'd Terentia bluſhing) and I will make you ſee that it is not my fault that you are not happy. At theſe words this fair virgin aroſe up, and told Aureliſa, Æmilius deſir'd to ſpeak with her. Upon which Theanor, who had an extreme deſire to ſpeak with Terentia, told her with much civility, he conjur'd her to go and revive his friend, by giving him ſome ſmall hope. Aureliſa not daring to refuſe, becauſe Elinyſſa was preſent, went accordingly to ſpeak with Æmilius whom ſhe affected not, after having had a converſation with Theanor, almoſt like that which he had had with Terentia. When ſhe approacht to him, Well, Madam, (ſaid he to her) ſhall the unfortunate Æmilius be hated when he is a dying? and ſhall he not have at leaſt the conſolation to think that you will pity him, and that if Theanor dyes as well as he, all your tears ſhall not be ſpent upon that ungrateful perſon, who loves you leſſe than another Lady, very amiable indeed, but yet much leſſe than you? Terentia (anſwer'd Aureliſa) is more amiable than I, and you are ſo oblig'd to her, that you are as unjuſt in not loving her, as I am unjuſt in not loving you: But, in brief, we are not governors of our own deſtiny. However, believe that I pity you, and if I could render you happy, I would do it with joy. You may at leaſt let me dy with ſome conſolation (reply'd Æmilius) by permitting me to believe that you would not hate me, but only becauſe you love Theanor; and that, if you lov'd him not, you would perhaps look upon me more favourably. After this, Madam, I shall desire nothing more of you. Whilst Æmilius was speaking thus to Aureliſa, Theanor us'd all the sweetest and most affecting expressions to Terentia, that the most tender love could inspire him with; but this Ladie's mind being disturb'd, for having found nothing but generosity in Theanor's heart towards her, answer'd him so negligently, that this afflicted Lover was ready to die at that very instant, and lost his speech through the excess of his grief. But tho Terentia was extreamly perplex'd to understand how ardent Æmilius's affection was for Aureliſa, yet she left Theanor very hastily, and came to help Elinyſſa and me to succour him; insomuch that not being able to suppress his complaint, O gods (cry'd he lifting up his eies to heaven) with how many torments, would I have deserv'd Æmilius's death? In speaking which, this furious Lover offer'd to pluck off all that was laid upon a wound he had receiv'd in the left arm; whereupon Aureliſa leaving him by whom she was lov'd, to go to succour him whom she lov'd, tho he did not affect her, restrain'd his hand; and, making use of the power her friend had over him to withhold him. In the name of Terentia (said she to him) taking him by the hand, restrain part of your grief, and believe (added she, transported by an excess of tenderness, which the danger she saw him in, excited in her heart) that it shall not be my fault if Terentia do not render you happy. Yes, Theanor (continu'd this afflicted beauty) since you cannot live for me, and cannot live without her, I will become the Confident of your passion, and serve you with her, tho it be to act against my self. Alass! Madam, (said she to her) 'tis enough that I die with grief, without causing me to die with confusion. Leave an ungrateful person, leave me to die, and succour the unfortunate Æmilius, who adores you, and dies only for your sake. As we were in this perplexity, word was brought to Elinyſſa, that Tolumnius was fallen sick at his house in the Country, and sent for her to come to him. So that it was requisite to depart, which nevertheless we did not do till after Æmilius was recover'd from his swoon, and those that attended on them were call'd for. But in fine, Madam, (to shorten my relation as much as I can) these two Lovers were cur'd in spight of themselves, and Tolumnius dy'd in the Country; but at his death he gave all his estate to Terentia and Aureliſa, and requested Elinyſſa to do the like at hers, if Theanor did not marry Aureliſa, and Æmilius, Terentia. These two generous Ladies after the death of Tolumnius, would not accept what he had given them, Terentia resolving to confer her part on Æmilius, and Aureliſa hers on Theanor. But they being as generous as their Mistresses, refus'd this high munificence. Theanor told Aureliſa, it was sufficient he could not give her his heart, without taking away from her an estate which belong'd to her, and Æmilius said the same to Terentia; insomuch, that Elinyſſa has been constrain'd to take care of the estate of Tolumnius, till these four persons resolve what they will have her to do with it. The relations of Aureliſa and Terentia after the death of Tolumnius desir'd to take away these two Ladies from Elinyſſa, and place them about the Queen, where they have been ever since, with sentiments of equal affection, without being able to succeed in changing their hearts; tho, during four months, Theanor, Æmilius, Terentia and Aureliſa, have done all they could to overcome themselvs. In the mean time Terentia has not omitted to do any good offices for Æmilius, nor Aureliſa for Theanor, either with the King or Queen; so that, with the consent of these two Lovers, I may say there is no person in the world to whom they have so much obligation, as to these two Virgins, whom they can never love. 'Tis true, Theanor has more obligation to Aureliſa, than Æmilius to Terentia, because she has really done all she could, to perswade this fair Virgin to marry him. And therefore 'tis a sentiment of gratitude, which caus'd that Lover to act, as all the Court has seen, when they were in danger of being drown'd. For you must know, Madam, that yesterday whilst the King was speaking to the Queen and you, Terentia and Aureliſa passing out of the porch to the bridge which lies over the ditch to go into the garden, Theanor and Æmilius, who attended on the King, were leaning against the gate to speak to them; and, as (persons that love never speak but what has relation to their passion, when they can) these two Lovers were rejoicing that the Queen being near the Camp, they could at least have the consolation of seeing them sometimes during the War. Theanor offer'd to speak some obliging words to Terentia, who rejected him uncourteously to speak to Æmilius who was on her side, tho his heart was Aureliſa's. So that this unhappy Lover, not being able to discourse with her he lov'd, was oblig'd to speak to her that lov'd him. For my part (said Theanor) all the joy I have in the Queen's being near the Camp, is, that if I die at the siege (as I wish, since I can never be happy) Aureliſa will hear of my death one day sooner, and have the contentment, to see her self delivered from an ungrateful person. However, (answer'd Aureliſa) then I have cause to reproach you, that 'tis not my fault that you are not happy even at the loss of my own felicity. As she ended these words, the bridge broke, Aureliſa fell on the side where Theanor was, to whom she had spoken so obligingly, and Terentia fell on the side of Æmilius. I having since discours'd with those two Lovers, am inform'd what they thought in that occasion, in which their passions and their reasons had a contest of a moment's duration, which caus'd them to act after a very different manner; for Theanor finding himself on the side where Aureliſa was fallen into the water, his first thought was to succour her: for having his mind then fill'd with what she had spoken so obligingly to him, the affection he had for her, the thousand offices he had render'd her, and the thousand rigours of Terentia, which excited indignation in him, gratitude carried him at that instant above his love: Insomuch, that out of generosity he leapt into the water, and went to succour Aureliſa, by whom he was lov'd, and whom he did not love. At the same time, Æmilius, tho he saw all imaginable dearness in Terentia's eies for him, and had a thousand obligations to her, no sooner beheld Aureliſa in the water, than forgetting all he ow'd to Terentia, and all the rigours of Aureliſa, he did not deliberate between his gratitude and his love, but cast himself into the water as well as Theanor, to succour Aureliſa, whilst the poor Terentia was ready to perish in the sight of one Lover whom she lov'd, and another who lov'd her. But to her good hap Cerontus, who was always believ'd incapable of love, was found to have a conceal'd passion for that Lady, which he discover'd very opportunely to save her life: for, as you know, Madam, if he had not leapt into the water to rescue her, she had without question been drown'd. Thus, Madam, you understand the adventure of Terentia and Aureliſa, but that which is rare, is, that Terentia, who found no lover to succour her, has at present two, who pretend notwithstanding to dispute her affection; for Cereontus affirms, Theanor has no longer any right to Terentia; and Theanor maintains, that the excessive gratitude he had for Aureliſa, is a pure effect of the innocent love he has for Terentia. But as for this fair Virgin, I assure you, she is to be pitied. Who ever saw (said she to me last night) a misfortune equal to mine? for is there any thing more cruel, than to see one's self deserted in a great danger, by a man that is lov'd more than all the rest of the world? and withal by another, that has sworn to me so long, that he loves me a thousand times above all the rest of the earth? As for Aureliſa, she is much more happy than I; they whom she hates, and they that hate her, save her life; but as for those whom I love, and those by whom I am lov'd, they equally abandon me; and for my last unhappiness, the insensible Cereontus comes to rescue me from death, to the end to make me better feel all the rigour of my misfortune, and to prepare also a new persecution for me. But, Amicles, (said she to me again) I will equally hate both him that I lov'd, and him that lov'd me; and since ingratitude has not hindred Aureliſa from being succour'd by Æmilius, I will be ingrateful to Cereontus too, and, instead of giving him thanks for having sav'd my life, I will accuse him of part of the miseries which I suffer. Yea, I will hate him too (continued she) for my weakness is the true cause of my misfortune; and, according to my present sentiments, I find nothing in the World but what is worthy to be hated and scorn'd. On the other side he us'd such expressions, that he could not but be piti'd. Aureliſa too complain'd she was more oblig'd than she desir'd to be. And Æmilius looks upon himself as more unhappy than before, since the services he renders do not make him lov'd the more: and Cereontus also is in a strange fear, lest Terentia prove unjust towards him. Wherefore, Madam, it lies in your prudence, and that of the Prince, to hinder such brave persons as these from quarrelling, and to seek some remedy to the unhappinesses of two Virgins so amiable as Terentia and Aureliſa.

Amicles having finisht her relation, found it was not unprofitable; for Aronces promis'd to take a particular care of those three Lovers; and the Princess of the Leamines, of the two amiable persons who caus'd the unhappiness of the rest by their own. After which they went to the Chamber of the Queen of Hetruria, and Amicles return'd to that of the two afflicted Virgins, with whom she found Theanor and Æmilius, who after having deliberated a long time were at length enter'd into their Chamber; tho Terentia was unwilling to see either of them. Theanor was upon his knees before Terentia who lay upon her bed, and Æmilius stood near Aureliſa who sate leaning upon a Table. Whereupon Amicles approaching to Aureliſa, without Terentia's observing it, Theanor was not at all interrupted. You see, Madam, (said he to her) an unhappy person who confesses his Crime. No, no, (answer'd Terentia with a Tone sufficiently fierce): do not go about to excuse your self; you had reason to go, and succour a person by whom you are lov'd; and to abandon one that does not love you. But as for Æmilius, if you had reason, he is a Criminal; for he succour'd a person by whom he could never be lov'd, and deserted one that would have given her own life to save his. Æmilius hearing himself nam'd, drew near to her, and Aureliſa and Amicles did the same, upon which there began so pathetical a conversation between these four persons, whose interests together were so hard to be disintangled, that scarce ever was the like seen. Theanor appear'd very much afflicted, Aureliſa extreamly perplex'd, Æmilius absolutely inrag'd, to see himself no more lov'd than before his succouring Aureliſa; and Terentia so incens'd both against Theanor and Æmilius that she could not endure the sight of them. Go, (said she to them) go, unjust persons as you are, and leave me at least the liberty to bemoan my self in quiet for my unhappiness, in being lov'd by a man of such gratitude, that rather than be ungrateful to another he suffer'd the person he lov'd to perish; and for a second unhappiness in loving one so ungrateful, that he had rather save her life by whom he is hated, than hers from whom he has receiv'd a thousand courtesies. But, Madam, (repli'd Æmilius) if I am ungrateful towards you, are not you so towards Theanor, and is not Aureliſa the same towards me? In truth (answer'd this fair Lady) I know not whether we be ungrateful, but I know well we are extream unhappy. However it be (said Terentia) I have this advantage of my infelicity, that I owe nothing any longer to Theanor, and have so great cause not to love Æmilius more, that if indignation do not induce me to mistake, I am ready to hope I shall renounce my passion. As she ended these words, one came and inform'd Theanor and Æmilius that Aronces was returning to the Camp; which summons constrain'd them to go away without time to speak four words, or hear one that pleas'd them. Aronces being more sensible of the misfortunes which are caus'd by love than of any others, when he was upon the way, did not cease to speak to Theanor and Æmilius; he piti'd and comforted them, and pitti'd himself too tho without comfort, not having so much hope as to see a possibility of ever becoming happy. At his arrival at the Camp, he found a Council of War ready to be assembled, so that it behov'd him to make truce with Love, and bestow at least part of his mind upon the cares of the army and the siege. Now the Tuscans being a superstitious people, the accident of the broken Bridge, and the interpretations of the soothsayers upon it, gave occasion to several rumours among the Souldiers, some affirming that if Rome were attaqued by force it would be taken; others on the contrary maintaining, that if the course were attempted, it would not succeed. Nevertheless, the first opinion being more generally prevalent than the other, Porsenna and Tarquin conceiv'd this belief would probably excite the Souldiers to act with greater courage. Whereupon understanding by some Spies, that it was believ'd at Rome that they had no design to storm it by force, they took up a resolution to endeavour to surprise it. Tarquin being perfectly acquainted with the strength and weakness of the City, and instructed concerning the Fortifications made there since his absence, advis'd to make the principal onset on the side that appear'd appear'd most inaccessible (tho indeed it was not so) because it would be the least guarded. That for this purpose it was requisite to seize upon Janiculum, and become Masters of the Sublician Bridge, which would afterwards be easily kept, because the Hill that was to be seiz'd on too would command it: That in the mean time no care ought to be omitted in order to such things as were necessary for the happy success of the Siege, in case this design should not take effect. Accordingly Porsenna sent order for the Boats which he had provided, to come away, not only with intent to stop up the Tiber with them both above and below Rome, but also to make two Bridges with them, which might be serviceable for the communication of the several Quarters of his Army. The resolution therefore of attaquing the Hill Janiculus being taken, order was given for the Forces design'd for the attempt to be in readiness to march at the first break of Day; and for those who were to make false assaults in several contrary places to be ready also to execute what should be commanded them, and likewise for all the rest of the Army to be in arms. Aronces was the man to whom this bold enterprise was encharged, Titus was commanded to back him, Porsenna and Tarquin remaining in the Camp to give orders according to occasion, and Sextus was intrusted with the care of the false assaults. Nevertheless he was desirous to be in the most dangerous place of all; but Tarquin knowing how violently he was hated by the Romans, conceiv'd if they should know him during the fight, it would make them become the more valiant. This design having more need of Foot than Horse, because it behov'd them to seize on a Pass, the access to which was difficult. Aronces put himself on foot at the head of the Forces intended for it, and a Horse was led by, for him to make use of, when he shall see it convenient. There was this difficulty in the thing, that the attaque could not be begun till it was day; because the Souldiers being to pass through rough and intricate places, would have molested one another, if they had gone in the dark without seeing their way. But not to lose time, Aronces marcht away in the head of his Forces as soon as the first appearance of day light. The Cavalry kept themselves on both sides of them, either to withstand such as might come out of Rome by the Sublician Bridge, where the Hill Janiculus was attaqued, or to oppose such as might come from the Hill by any other side. Titus kept in readiness to back Aronces, if there were need of it; and Aronces prepar'd himself to shew the Friends he had in Rome, and the Enemies he had in the Camp, that he deserv'd all the glory he had acquir'd in so many several occasions as he was present in. Telanus, Æmylius, Theanor, Lucilius and Cesonius, brothers to the generous Melintha, and all the other brave persons of the Army fought near Aronces, whose mind was then very much imploy'd, not onely with the care of coming off handsomely in this great enterprise, but also with the passion he had in his breast. For he was now beginning to draw his sword against Rome for whose interests he had gain'd a Battle, and he was going to see the house of Clelius, if his attempt succeeded; for it stood at the end of the City, on the side of the Hill Janiculus. He had indeed the consolation of apprehending, that neither Clelius nor Octavius would be in this attaque, for the hill Janiculus was a kind of out-piece of the City, which in all likelihood a man of Clelius's age would not go to defend, nor was it probable Octavius's weakness occasion'd by his wounds would yet permit him to come into the field. He had likewise understood by a Spy, that Mutius was upon the guard of that place; and therefore knowing how couragious he was; and looking upon him as Rival to Herminius, and consequently no friend to himself, he went to this assault with a resolution to signalize himself highly in it. He fanci'd also some pleasure in thinking that after the taking of this Hill, he might be able to seize on the Bridge and the Gate, and that his valour might have the fair eyes of Clelia for Witnesses, it being sufficiently difficult for the last daring Ladies to refrain from beholding that, which nevertheless they would be willing not to see. Aronces therefore went to the fight with all the ardour of an Hero, that would make it the interest of his Love to be courageous, to the end he might be more so. He caus'd his Forces to advance in so good order, that their march did not break them, tho they were necessitated to pass through a way sufficiently troublesome, and they came very near the Hill Janiculus before Mutius discover'd them; for they took a certain by way the which kept them from being taken notice of. Besides that a good thick mist being risen that morning which held for an hours space, it was not easie to discern them. 'Tis true, Mutius did not fail to send forth every night a party of Horse, to serve for a Guard to the Place he was Commander of; but Aronces took a way, by which he did not look to be assaulted. So that he was sufficiently surpris'd when he saw himself forc'd to prepare so suddenly to fight; but having an undaunted heart, he soon resolv'd upon it. However he sent forthwith to advertise Herminius, Who kept Guard at the Gate of the Bridge, to send him aid; and accordingly Horatius in the Head of the Principal Troops of the second Legion, went to assist Mutius to defend a hold of such importance. When he arriv'd, Aronces had already beaten back the Enemies to their first Trench; for when Porsenna's Troops advanc'd, Mutius came out in person against his Assaulters; upon which Aronces seeing an Enemy against him, which he could not overcome without Glory, encourag'd his Souldiers with his voice example, and went directly up to him, conceiving that if they could kill him, he might then easily carry the Pass which he guarded. The fight was very sharp, and very Bloody in this place; for the example of two such valiant men so animated both parties, that if it had been possible to resist Aronces long, Mutius had not yielded to him. But this Prince being this day more redoubtable than ever, there was no means to hold out against him. Every blow that he gave was mortal, all his Orders were executed as he could have wisht, his example redoubled the Valour of his own Party, and weakened that of his enemies. Mutius himself was amaz'd at it, and soon constrain'd to abandon the first Trench, to the end he might better defend the second. But Horatius being arriv'd in the Head of the Troop which were sent to aid Mutius, Aronces, after having first forc'd the Trench, found the number of his Enemies redoubled, but as it is the custome of those who have great hearts, for their courage to encrease when the danger is so, Aronces being follow'd by all the brave Persons that accompani'd him, charg'd his Enemies with such vigour that they were aſtoniſh'd at it, and conſtrain'd to withdraw from the ſecond entrenchment, as they had done from the firſt. Now altho Horatius ow'd his life to a Rival more than once, and in ſpight of his love was loath to be ingrateful to him, yet he did not ceaſe to prepare himſelf to fight with him in this occaſion, after having ralli'd and encourag'd his Forces; for the intereſt of Rome being contended for, and they in oppoſite Parties, he made no ſcruple of defending himſelf againſt him that attaqued him, how oblig'd ſoever he was to him. So he helpt Mutius to bear up againſt the violence of ſo redoubtable an Enemy; but tho his valour was not eaſily parallel'd in the World: yet that of Aronces was greater than his; for without looking whether he were follow'd or no, he ſtill charg'd forward, and ſuffer'd none to ſtand againſt hm. Mutius himſelf was wounded by Aronces, and carry'd out of the fight, tho it was not mortally. So that Horatius perceiving it would he impoſſible to hinder Aronces from making himſelf Maſter of the Place, judg'd it more requiſite to think of going to defend the Bridge, than to perſiſt in the unprofitable maintaining of a Poſt which he could not keep. Nevertheleſs he made a great ſhock to beat back the Enemies: but Aronces coming up to him, brandiſhing his ſword, This is the day, Horatius, (ſaid he to him) that we may end all our differences, and perhaps our misfortunes. Since 'tis lawful for me (anſwer'd Horatius fiercely) to fight againſt all Enemies of Rome whatſoever, I am willing that we determine all our quarrels with our ſwords. In ſpeaking of this, theſe two valiant Men began to fight, which in all probability had not ended but in the death of both, if Publicola, who was advertis'd of the ſtate of the matter had not ſent order to withdraw the Forces from the Hill Janiculus, and to take care only for the defence of the Bridge. 'Tis true this order was in a manner unprofitable; for the valour of Aronces and thoſe who follow'd him, had already driven the Enemies to that choice. Wherefore Horatius obſerving the diſorder of his Forces, bethought himſelf of retiring. Which yet he was much put to't to do. For Aronces having paſs'd upon him, ſeis'd upon his Sword, and took it from him: but Horatius being ſtrong, diſengag'd himſelf from his Enemy, and drawing back towards his Souldiers to get a Sword, they enclos'd him, and ſhrouding him from the ſight of his Rival, conſtrain'd him to obey the Orders of Publicola. Aronces all fierce with his victory, ſought for his enemy, whom he had overcome; but not finding him, he ſacrific'd to his revenge, all ſuch as dar'd to reſiſt him, and made himſelf abſolute Maſter of the Hill Janiculus. After which conceiving it requiſite to make ſure of the place he had gain'd, he ſtaid there to give neceſſary orders for the guarding of it, and cauſing freſh Forces to come to ſeize upon the Bridge, whilſt Telanus in the head of a part of the victorious Troops purſued thoſe that retreated, with intention to begin the aſſault of the Bridge, and ſo to become Maſter of the Gate which Herminius guarded. But the Tuſcans found this deſign was not ſo eaſie to execute as they had believ'd; for Horatius, being provided of another ſword, ſtay'd at the end of the Bridge, and bore up againſt all the impetuoſity of the Enemies. Aronces indeed was not there, but he had ſo many Enemies on all ſides, that any other but he would never have dar'd to think of reſiſting. In the mean time there was a ſtrange confuſion in Rome: the affrighted People believ'd the Enemies were coming in upon them on all ſides, the Women went to the Temples to ſupplicate to the Gods, the Old Men encourag'd their Children to the defence of their Country, all ſuch as bore Arms, went whither the Conſuls commanded them to go: and Publicola without being terrifi'd gave ſuch orders as was neceſſary for the conſervation of Rome. During this great Tumult, Clelia was at a window of her Cloſet with Valeria and Colatina, who were then at her houſe, and who ſuffer'd more than can be imagin'd; for they might propably undergo conſiderable loſſes in both parties. It was known by wounded Mutius, that Aronces was in perſon at the Hill Janiculus, and that the Prince Titus was there too; for his Troops advanc'd for the winning the ſecond Trench, and Valeria ſeeing her dear Herminius at the guard of the Gate which was expos'd to the Enemies, thought her ſelf every moment in danger of loſing all ſhe lov'd, as well as Clelia and Colatina. They having a true love to their Country in their hearts, pray'd the gods for the preſervation of Rome: but at the ſame time they pray'd for thoſe that aſſaulted it, and made as ardent vows for Aronces and Titus, as for the liberty of their native City. No queſtion but they judg'd it a dreadful ſpectacle, to ſee all the Mountain which lay at the end of the Sublician Bridge cover'd with Souldiers, who throng'd down it to back thoſe who attaqu'd the Bridge, and to ſee the Roman Souldiers at the ſame time daunted with the approach of that multitude of arm'd Men, who came upon them, as to an aſſur'd victory, and retiring in Confuſion, and entring tumultuouſly into the City, for all the reſiſtance of Herminius, who endeavour'd to hinder them from it, and could not ſo much as cauſe the Gate to be ſhut. So that Horatius ſaw himſelf left alone, to bear up againſt the whole power of the Enemies. 'Tis true, Herminius and Spurius ſoon joyn'd themſelves to him, and theſe three Lovers did prodigious things in the ſight of their Miſtreſſes. Whither flie you, Cowards as you are, (ſaid Horatius to the Souldiers that forſook him)? do not you ſee, that if you abandon the defence of the Bridge, there will preſently be as many Enemies, in the Palatine Hill, and the Capitol, as in the Hill Janiculus? At leaſt (added he) if you will not fight, break the bridge, and leave me alone to bear the ſhock of thoſe Enemies, who are not terrible but becauſe you fear them. At theſe words the affrighted Souldiers choſe rather to break the Bridge than to fight; and accordingly they began to break down the Bridge with all the dilligence of people poſſeſs'd with fear, whilſt Horatius accompani'd onely with Herminius and Spurius, ſuſtain'd the whole power of the Enemies, without other arms than their bucklers and ſwords. 'Tis true he appear'd with ſuch a boldneſs, that the fierceneſs wherewith he repell'd thoſe that aſſaulted him, ſtruck terrour into them, and ſometimes forced them to recoil. Herminius and Spurius ſeconded him likewiſe with very great valour; but at length the Bridge being almoſt broken, and nothing left but a ſmall Plank to paſs from one ſide to the other, he told Herminius and Spurius, it was time for them to retire; and accordingly theſe two gallant perſons imagining he intended to paſs over the plank as well as themſelves, retir'd. But Horatius led by an Heroical ardour, fiercely commanded commanded the Romans to break down that Plank, and ſtaid alone for defence of the Bridge, ſometimes defying the Tuſcans, and ſometimes reproaching them for their injuſtice in protecting a Tyrant; and ſometimes threatning them as fiercely, as if it had been in his power to overcome them, tho he ſtood alone againſt a whole Army. This extraordinary action ſo amaz'd the Enemies, that for a ſmall while they ſuſpended the violence of their valour, not knowing almoſt what they were to do. But at length ſeeing Horatius going from ſide to ſide with his ſword in his hand, to the end he might take up all the Bridge, they were ſo ſtruck with ſhame, and enrag'd, that in an inſtant a ſtorm of Arrows falling upon him, his Shield was broken all to pieces. At which moment Herminius and Spurius perceiving Horatius had not paſs'd back upon the plank, offer'd to return to him; but they could not, becauſe they, who were ſet to break it, having done it according to Horatius's orders, and that part of the Bridge being fallen into the Water with a great noiſe, all the Romans ſent forth ſuch loud cries of joy, that the Enemies withheld their fury for an inſtant, whilſt Horatius obſerving Rome was in ſafety, lifted up his eyes to Heaven and cry'd, O god of Tyber, receive favourably into thy boſome, a man who has never been willing to live or die but for his Country: In ſaying which he leapt into the water, and turning his face towards the windows of Clelia, which lookt out on that ſide, he began to ſwim, without forſaking his ſword or his ſhield ſo ſhatter'd with the Enemies arrows. But tho this ſpectacle deſerv'd only admiration, yet the Tuſcan Soldiers looking upon Horatius, as a man, who alone had hindred them from taking Rome, began to ſhoot upon him ſuch a great multitude of Arrows, that he could not have fail'd to periſh, if the valiant Aronces, after having aſſur'd the Poſt which he had gain'd, had not arriv'd on Horſeback upon the bank of Tyber. Where being inform'd of what had paſs'd, and being not able to hinder himſelf from admiring his Rival, the ſame Prince who an hour before endeavour'd to kill him, could not ſuffer that ſo valiant a Man as he ſhould periſh after ſo ſtrange a manner. Yet he wiſht he could have fought with him, and advanc'd towards the River for the purpoſe; but Horatius was already ſo near the other ſide of the Tyber, that he could not come at him. Wherefore not being able to overcome him gloriouſly, he would not that he ſhould periſh in his preſence, after having done ſo glorious an action; and, out of unparallel'd generoſity, forbad his Souldiers to ſhoot upon Horatius. Ah Cowards (ſaid he to them) you ought to have overcome him with your ſwords, and forc'd the Bridge which he defended, and not cover him with Arrows when he can no longer defend himſelf. Theſe words having ſtopt that clouds of Arrows which darken'd the Air, both parties beheld Horatius ſafely arrive at the other ſide of the River, and Aronces had the grief to imagine, that Clelia ſaw with her own eyes the great action of his Rival, and that ſhe beheld at that inſtant the great honours the Romans were doing him. However there being nothing more to be done, Aronces was enforc'd to be contented with having gain'd a very advantageous place, which would extreamly inconvenience Rome, and prevented their making of Sallies, which might have much moleſted the Camp of the Beſiegers. But tho this dayes actions were very glorious to him, in as much as he had wounded Mutius, diſarm'd Horatius, and taken the Hill Janiculus, yet he was exceſſively afflicted. Not that he was capable of envy; but the Paſſion of Love in his breaſt, caus'd him to apprehend diſtaſteful conſequences of his Rival's glory. Accordingly the next morning he underſtood by a Spy, that the like honour had never been done to any other Roman ſince the foundation of Rome; that the Senate had decreed a Statue ſhould be erected to Horatius at the end of the Bridge which he had defended, that Clelius was the Man that propos'd the rendring the publick teſtimony of gratitude to his valour, and that at the diſſolving of the Senate, the ſame Clelius had carried Horatius to Sulſpitia and Clelia. Diſpatch, Fortune, diſpatch, (ſaid Aronces in himſelf, as ſoon as he had opportunity to be alone) render me the moſt unhappy of all men, by wholly depriving me of hope and poſſibility of ever to become happy. For what ground is there to retain the leaſt hope after that which is arriv'd? Clelia hath ſeen my Rival with her own eyes, doing the greateſt action that ever was, and perhaps too ſhe believes I was among thoſe he fought with at the end of the Bridge, and puts me in the number of thoſe that could not overcome him. But, alas! tho this ſhould not be ſo, yet Clelius will make uſe of Horatius's valour againſt me: for what can be refus'd to him, that has preſerv'd Rome? Therefore I muſt reſolve to ſee Clelia unfaithful, or Clelia perſecuted; and conſequently I muſt prepare my ſelf to be alwayes miſerable.

MADAM,

THe unfortunate CLELIA having ſince her arrival in this Nation, ſought a patronage from many noble hands, doth at length addreſs her ſelf to yours. As if thoſe various adventures, which traverſ'd her illuſtrious life could not terminate in a compleat happineſs before ſhe were acknowledging to you for it, and that her vertue had not been ſufficiently try'd to merit that felicity which was preparing for her before it had receiv'd a teſtimony from you, who are the perfect Patern of it. That ſhe is worthy your protection I cannot doubt, at leaſt if thoſe excellent beauties of hers which are almoſt matchleſs in the original, come not ſullied from my unskilful hands. And ſince it is reported it was not the illuſtrious Scudery, but that celebrated Vertuoſa his Siſter who finiſh'd the Romance after his deceaſe, I could not make a more apt Dedication than the work of a Lady to the moſt Noble and accompliſh'd Perſon of her own Sex. That which may cauſe you to make ſome difficulty in the reception of CLELIA, is the perſon of him that ſhall aſſume the boldneſs to preſent her to you. Yet it cannot ſeem ſtrange an unknown perſon ſhould thus preſume, ſince an heroick vertue, ſuch as yours, commands the addreſſes and devoyrs of all that honour it; the ſence of which I cannot better manifeſt in my ſelf, than by my humble deſires to be admitted together with CLELIA in the quality of

CLELIA.

A New Romance.

The Fifth and Last PART.

The First BOOK.

WHilſt Aronces was poſſeſt with an opinion that his preſent condition rendred him the moſt unhappy Man in the World, Horatius ſometimes enjoy'd all the delectation that glory together with hope is capable to excite in a heart truely amorous. He taſted the joy of being ſatisfi'd with himſelf; which is the higheſt pleaſure poſſible for a rational perſon to reſent: He had perform'd a piece of ſingular ſervice to his Country; and altho Aronces had diſarm'd him, yet his laſt action afforded him ſatisfaction for that miſfortune. Beſides Clelius being ſo favourable to him, he had reaſon to conceive that the end of the War would prove the beginning of his felicity. And indeed he perceiv'd ſo unanimous a Reſolution in the Roman Citizens to defend themſelves to the utmoſt, that he would not ſo much as entertain in his thoughts a poſſibility for Porſenna to become Maſter of Rome. What place ſoever he went into, afforded him new cauſe of contentment, ſaving when he repair'd to Clelia, whom he alwaies found affected with the ſame averſion towards him. When he paſs'd along the ſtreets, the people atteſted his glory with a thouſand acclamations; when he went to the Temple, he beheld Sacrifices offer'd there in thankfulneſs to the gods for the great action which he had perform'd; when he went to the Senate, he underſtood they had ordain'd a Statue to be erected to him as an eternal Monument of his valour: to conclude, only the fair eyes of Clelia deprivld him of the hope, which fortune every where elſe ſuggeſted to him. And truly this was oftentimes ſufficient to diſturb all the pleaſure, that hope could give him. The next morning after that great exploit, which had rendr'd him ſo eminent in Rome, Clelius bringing him to his houſe, and preſenting him to his Daughter, he found cauſe to believe that what he had done had no influence to change the heart of that fair Lady. At firſt Clelius having beheld her with a ſufficiently cold air, was immediately, out of an exceſſive affection for his Country tranſported againſt her. How? (ſaid he to her with a low but angry Tone) dare you appear ſad, when I bring the Deliverer of Rome to you? and have you the boldneſs to diſcover in your eyes the tokens of that obſtinate and unjuſt paſſion which you harbour in your mind? Clelia hearing her Father ſpeak in this manner, bluſht and caſt down her eyes; ſo that Horatius not doubting, but that which Clelius ſpoke low to her, diſpleas'd her, was almoſt ſorry for it, tho he apprehended the diſcourſe could not but be in his favour. Wherefore advancing towards her, he interrupting the private communication, Permit me to ask you, Madam (ſaid he, perceiving Clelius retire) whether the general fright yeſterday did not reach you too, and whether you had the reſolution to behold from your windows, that multitude of enemies which would have ſurpriz'd the City, had not the bridge been broken down, at which they endeavour'd to enter. You ſpeak very modeſtly of one of the faireſt actions of the world (anſwer'd ſhe) but to ſhew you that I am never unjuſt (added this prudent Lady) know, that tho you ſeem'd appointed by Deſtiny for the cauſe of the greateſt infelicities of my life, nevertheleſs I did not ceaſe to make vows in your behalf, when I ſaw you alone in the middle of the Bridge, ſuſtaining the whole power of the Enemies. For indeed I ſaw all that paſs'd in that great occaſion; and I likewiſe beheld Aronces forbid his men to ſhoot at you, when you were in the River Tyber. I ſhould my ſelf have inform'd you, Madam, (repli'd Horatius) of that generoſity of my Rival, tho you had not ſeen it; for I have heretofore often told you, that I yield to his merit and his vertue; 'tis only in point of Love that I contend with him for ſuperiority. And to teſtifie to you at leaſt, Madam, that I do all that I can, know, I did not interrupt Clelius, but only becauſe I apprehended he ſpoke ſharply to you in my favour. I acknowledge it (anſwer'd Clelia) and I ſhall alſo acknowledge that you deſerve my eſteem and my friendſhip. Nevertheleſs, obſerving hope this day become more prevalent in your heart, I ſhall tell you once more (generous Horatius) that it will be beſt for you not to flatter your ſelf into an errour by it; ſince the more Aronces becomes unhappy, the more ſhall I be oblig'd to be faithful to him; and the more my Father perſecutes me, the more reſolvedneſs ſhall I have to withſtand him. For in brief he has once given me to Aronces, and I have joyn'd in the gift; ſo that 'tis in the power of death alone to hinder me from being his. Moreover were he no longer mine, I have told you an hundred times, I ſhould never be yours nor any others. Content your ſelf with being belov'd by the whole People of Rome, enjoy quietly the glory you have acquir'd, and do not render your ſelf miſerable, for a perſon, that can never make you happy. Other viſitants hereupon arriving, Horatius was constrain'd to withdraw, his heart being so full, that he could not but manifest part of his grief. And therefore he made a low reverence, without being able to speak any thing to Clelia, saving by some glances not less sad than amorous. As he came from thence he found Æmilius, who being unhappy as well as he, seem'd a fit person to be the confident of his sorrow. Walking along together, and Æmilius observing him very sad, What's the cause (said he to him) that you seem so melancholy in a day wherein you ought to know no other passion but joy? Alas Æmilius (cry'd Horatius) 'tis in vain that I have repell'd the enemies, since Aronces is not so absolutely Master of the Janiculum, which he hath seiz'd, as he is always of the heart of Clelia; and should Fortune cause me to perform miracles for the safety of Rome, I should not thereby be less unhappy, In which regard, I can assure you Aronces is not at present so miserable as I; undoubtedly no unhappiness being so unsupportable as that whereby we find, that what ought to produce our felicity causes our misfortune. However (reply'd Æmilius) your misery is not so extraordinary as mine; Clelia lov'd Aronces before she knew you; she has lov'd him ever since, and you have not been able to win her affection. But as for me, unfortunate as I am, I have seen the cruel Valeria not to hate me, during the time she believ'd Herminius was unfaithful and dead: but since she understood his being alive and innocent, she has ceas'd to love me, and depriv'd me of all hope for ever. Ah! Æmilius (answer'd Horatius) that which you say causes your regret, is the very thing that ought to afford you consolation; For according to the transports of Love in which I am at present, I think if Clelia had lov'd me but only one day in all my life, the remembrance alone of so great a pleasure would suffice to keep me from being miserable the remainder of my days. But when I consider that my Rival is belov'd, that according to all probabilities he will be ever so, that I have never been so, for so much as one moment, and that perhaps I never shall be during my life; patience forsakes me, despair seizes me, and I wish for death every instant. Had I the same sentiments as heretofore (continu'd Horatius) when I carry'd away Clelia, I could easily induce Clelius to constrain her to marry me. After what I have perform'd, the people would approve the violence, and the Senate in the present posture of affairs would not offer to oppose my happiness: but (Æmilius) I know to my misery, that unless Clelia bestow her self, I cannot wish to possess her; since 'tis the heart of that cruel person which can cause my felicity. But (alas) that (to my misfortune) is in the power of a Rival whom I admire in spight of my self, for whom I bear as much esteem as hatred, to whom I am so highly oblig'd, that I cannot injure him without ingratitude, and who sets me such great examples of generosity, that it's necessary to be a Heroe to surpass him. Cease therefore to bemoan your self, or at the best think me the greatest object of commiseration. Yet on the other side generous Horatius (reply'd Æmilius) did you know what it is to have been lov'd and to be so no longer, you would change the thoughts; for no favourable glance has been formerly obtain'd, but then causes a thousand regrets; not an advantageous word heard, but occasions a thousand torments; and the opposition of misery to happiness, produces such a strange hurly-burly in an amorous breast, that the insensibility of a Mistress is an affliction not comparable to what I speak of. Did I love a person insensible in reference to all love (answer'd Horatius) you would have reason: but I love a person that has a soft heart, that is able to love both with order and constancy, and consequently to resist whatever opposes the affection she has in her soul. When I spoke of an insensible Person (reply'd Æmilius) I meant in respect to you alone; for, as I said before, 'tis a more exquisite misery to be belov'd no more, than to have never been lov'd at all. I conceive indeed (said Horatius) it would be a greater affliction to fall into poverty after having been rich, than to have been always poor; but 'tis not so in love: for in my apprehension, the thought of never having been lov'd, not being so at present, and despairing ever to be so, is the most cruel and insupportable of all those that can be inspir'd by an infortunate passion. Æmilius answer'd Horatius again, and Horatius yielded not to Æmilius; so that they parted without having convinc'd one another. But while these two Lovers bemoaned themselves together, there were others also who did the like. All Plotina's Lovers, looking upon Amilcar, as he that of all the rest injur'd them most, scarce hated one another at all, but hated him excessively, tho they dar'd not to express it. Themistus being always absent, and always discontented, lamented himself amongst his Friends. Artemidorus being always lov'd by two very aimable persons, had not a little to do. Spurius was displeas'd with himself that he had not been able to out-do Herminius, who signaliz'd himself most, next Horatius. And Mutius being as ambitious as amorous, was desperately afflicted for that he had not been able to defend the Janiculum, and had been wounded: for altho the wound he receiv'd was not dangerous, yet it confin'd him to his Chamber; where abandoning himself to regret, he revolv'd in his thoughts what ever most difficult attempts a great Spirit incensed both against Love and Fortune could devise to overcome his misfortune. But having a Soul too noble to seek ways that were not honourable, he fanci'd nothing but what was grand and heroical. Herminius is belov'd (said he within himself) and deserv'es to be so; Æmilius is an amiable Person, and was not hated whilst Valeria believ'd Herminius had betray'd her and was dead; and Spurius is subtle, daring, dextrous and amorous. What then shall I do (continu'd he) to overcome such formidable Rivals? I must do some action transcending that of Horatius (added this afflicted Lover) and signalize my self so remarkably, that my Rivals may not afterwards dare to stand in competition with me for Valeria. I must save Rome with one stroke, if it be possible; and indeed it is too shameful to see it Captive when it boasts to be free, and to see it more miserable when it has no Tyrants, than when it was under the Tyranny of the Tarquins. After which Mutius having thought upon what he would undertake, took no care to be cur'd speedily, to the end he might execute the great design he had determin'd of in his mind. In the mean time Aronces maintaining his Conquest, and taking care to cause the Janiculum to be more fortifi'd on the side towards Rome, suffer'd more misery than can be imagin'd: for he well perceiv'd, that since this famous City could not be surpris'd at first, it would be very difficult to become Master of it by force, unless it were in a time so long, that Horatius would perhaps have leisure to work some change on the sentiments ments of Clelia; not that he could believe her capable of infidelity; but tho he could not believe it, yet he could fear it; and the glory of Horatius, the authority of Clelius, the people's affection towards his Rival, the little probability there was that Porſenna would conſent to his marriage, all theſe circumſtances conſider'd, together with his own abſence, added weight to his fear, and diminiſh'd his hope. Nevertheleſs he truſted to the fidelity of his Illuſtrious Friends at Rome, and ſometimes imagin'd ſecret conſolations to himſelf, which enabled him to ſupport all his misfortunes. Moreover, a ſentiment of glory adding it ſelf to that of love, the care of the Siege almoſt wholly imploy'd his mind. But that which rendered him more unhappy, was, that he was conſtrain'd to ſee Tarquin and Sextus. He knew that the firſt always lov'd Clelia; and looking upon Sextus as one that had lov'd her, that might ſtill love her, and that had caus'd the death of Lucretia, he hated and diſdain'd him, tho he was not ignorant, that as voluptuous and unjuſt a Prince as he was, he had ſome qualities in him not unpleaſing to ſuch as did not know him. Aronces likewiſe underſtood by a ſpy, that the Senate in teſtimony of greater acknowledgement to Horatius, had beſtow'd on him as great a compaſs of Lands as two Oxen could in one day encloſe with a furrow; that all the Inhabitants of Rome had particularly made him a preſent of ſomething or other, to the end he might not ſuffer any inconvenience during the Siege; and that Horatius making a generous uſe of the ſame, had not only given to the poor all that they had offer'd to him, but moreover all that he had received from the rich. By which means the good fortune and the virtue of Horatius being alike terrible to him, this Prince was extremely miſerable, and found no comfort, ſaving when he was free to go and entertain the Princeſs of the Leontines, a few moments, with diſcourſe of his infelicities. Which notwithſtanding he could not do often at the beginning of the Siege, by reaſon his preſence was neceſſary in ſo many places, that he had ſcarce time to go ſee the Queen of Cluſin. In the mean time it being reſolv'd at a Council of War not to make more attempts to take Rome by force, order was taken to famiſh it. To which purpoſe Porſenna caus'd little Forts to be rais'd at equal diſtances about the City, and the Tyber to be ſecur'd both above and below Rome, with Boats faſtned together with chains; all theſe Boats being defended by Towers which were rais'd to that end on each ſide of the River; beſides that there were alſo guards of Souldiers placed in ſeveral ſtations, which were reliev'd from time to time. Theſe Boats ſerving at that time for a Bridge to Porſenna's Army, the Tarquinians paſs'd over from the other ſide of Tyber, and extended their Camp into the Plain, after having pitcht upon a very advantageous place, where they might eaſily hinder any thing from being carried into Rome on that ſide, and from whence they ſent parties out to waſte, to make ſpoil in all the adjacent parts about that City. Rome was by this means begirt on all ſides; but the more it was ſtraightned, the Romans became the more couragious. Herminius being deſirous to ſignalize himſelf, and accounting it a diſparagement to be coop'd up, undertook to fetch proviſion into the City. Not that he believ'd that what he could procure brought in, would be capable to make it ſubſiſt any long time; but being a perſon of great prudence, he underſtood it was requiſite to amuſe the people, and he had occaſion to take this courſe with them; for as ſoon as all the avenues and paſſages of Rome were ſecur'd by the Enemy, the common ſort began to have an extreme dread of Famine. But altho this fear ſeem'd but to encreaſe their hatred againſt Tarquin, yet there was cauſe to ſuſpect it might at length adminiſter occaſion to a ſedition; it being natural enough to the poor to murmur againſt the rich, and likewiſe ſufficiently ordinary for the rich to have no great pity of the poor. Herminius therefore minding to prevent ſo great a miſchief, told Valerius, it was requiſite to ſend to the neighbouring people, to the end to obtain of them ſuch things as they had moſt need of; and that, for his part, he would engage to ſecure the entrance of Convoys into Rome. Whereupon ſome perſons were ſent out by night, to go to the people of Latium, and to oblige them to ſuccour the City; and others alſo to Cuma of Campania, and to Pometia: but the Latins refus'd to take any ſide between Rome and the Tarquinians, and they of Cumæ anſwered ambiguouſly; only the people of Pometia promis'd proviſions, conditionally they might be oblig'd to nothing more than to furniſh the Waggons which were to carry them. Wherefore Herminius to acquit himſelf of his word, one night when the Moon did not ſhine, iſſu'd forth of the City with ſome Troops, and taking a by-way, which the Beſiegers had not took care to ſecure, happily executed his deſign, and brought a competent ſupply of mouth-munition into Rome. The Enemies indeed being aware of it, there was a very ſharp conflict between them and the Troops that guarded the Convoy; but the valour of Herminius held them off, till all the Waggons were enter'd into the City, without ſo much as the miſcarriage of one; and this Illuſtrious Roman having born the ſtroke of the Enemies as long time as was requiſite for the executing of his purpoſe, re-entred into Rome, about the break of day, in the ſight of all the people, who beheld him as a ſecond Protector, next Horatius. Moreover, to the end this might have the greater effect upon the minds of the multitude, all theſe Waggons were made to paſs through the principal ſtreets, before they went to the publick Store-houſes. By which means they murmur'd leſs for ſome dayes than they had done formerly. But for that they were at that time above 300000 perſons in the City, this ſupply was quickly ſpent; and the dearneſs of proviſion encreaſing from day to day, the repinings of the Commonalty began alſo afreſh. It was in vain that Valerius, Clelius, Horatius, Herminius and the reſt endeavour'd to appeaſe the People; for the fear of Famine, and the preſent ſuffering render'd them ſo perverſe that whatever was reſolv'd upon, incens'd them. When ſallies were made, it was ſaid they were intended only to occaſion the ſlaughter of men, and that there might be a leſs number to feed; if none were attempted, it was publiſh'd about as cowardize to ſuffer themſelves to be ſhut up by ſo few Beſiegers: If the Publick Stores were ſet open, they rumor'd that all the Proviſions would ſoon be conſum'd and that only the creatures of Tarquin gave this counſel, which was far more dangerous than it ſeem'd: If there were any ſpeech of ſhutting the ſame up, and preſerving the Publick Proviſions againſt extremity, preſently it was threatned to ſet fire on the Stores: In brief, nothing could be more difficult than to find out ſome fit means to compoſe the diſcontents of the City. Porſenna and Tarquin having intelligence of this diſorder, ſent Heralds to demand to ſpeak to the people. Then it was that all the intelligent perſons in Rome ſtood in fear; for they conceiv'd it was to make some Propoſition of Peace, with intention to cauſe the people to mutiny, if it were not receiv'd. Wherefore the Senate was minded to ſend back the Heralds unheard. But the multitude was ſo tumultuous, that it was neceſſary to hear them; all that could be obtain'd from the provoked people, was, that thoſe Heralds ſhould not enter into the City, but make their Propoſitions at the Gate. To which being accordingly oblig'd, they declar'd there aloud, that Porſenna ſent to acquaint the Romans, that if they deſir'd to be deliver'd from the War and Famine, and to avoid inevitable deſtruction, it was yet poſſible, and they needed onely to admit Tarquin, to ſecure their Peace; Porſenna engaging to cauſe him to paſs an Amneſty for all that was paſt, and to protect them alſo againſt him in caſe he falſifi'd his word. The Conſuls trembled at this Propoſal, fearing leſt the preſent miſery might induce the people to prefer a ſhameful Peace before a glorious War: but the matter had a better event than they imagin'd. The name of Tarquin was ſo odious to the People, that what Porſenna caus'd to be declar'd to them, to the intent to cauſe the ſedition, produc'd a calm; for ſcarce had the Heralds done their Meſſage, but the multitude who had beſet all the Ramparts, relating to one another confuſedly the Propoſition that Porſenna made to them, cri'd all with one voice, No, no 'tis better to die, and we will rather ſet our City on fire, than receive Tarquin into it: and their fury tranſported them in ſuch ſort, that they had ſhot their Arrows againſt the Heralds, and violated the Law of Nations, if the Conſuls had not reſtrain'd them. So theſe Meſſengers of Porſenna were enforced to depart; and the people, after this, ſeeing nothing to be choſen but War or the Tyranny of Tarquin, generouſly reſolv'd upon ſuffering, and endur'd all the inconveniences of this Siege with admirable patience. Soon after, a private Council of War was held in order to attempt to break thoſe two Bridges of Boats which ſecur'd the River, ſince had it been free on one ſide onely, Porſenna's deſign had been deſtroy'd, and this Prince would have found a neceſſity of giving over the Siege. It had been ſufficiently experienc'd that ſallies ſerv'd only to weaken the Cavalry which was in the City; for there being no other Forces in the Compagne deſign'd to relieve it, all ſallies were unprofitable, and did not ſufficiently facilitate the paſſage of Victuals for the ſubſiſtence of it. So that the only way to deliver it, was to render their River free. To which end it was reſolv'd an attempt ſhould be made, and that above Rome rather than below, ſince by that means it would be commodious for the Veſſels to come down with the ſtream, for carrying neceſſaries into the City; whereas on the other ſide it would be requiſite to row up againſt it. The on-ſet indeed was very difficult, but the deſigning to put good Rowers into all the Boats appointed for the attaque, made that no obſtacle. Themiſtus, tho a ſtranger, was called to this ſecret Council, and propounded to ſet the Enemies Boats on fire, in caſe they could not be force'd; and accordingly preparation was made for this. In order to which, two Boats were fill'd with ſeveral kinds of combuſtible things as Pitch, Sulphur, Bitumen, and divers Gummes; and a hundred others were choſen out and fill'd with reſolute Souldiers. Every Boat had a particular Commander in it; and beſides the Souldiers, and the Rowers, there were alſo men with Axes to break and looſen the Chains which faſtned the Boats to one another. This enterprize being accompani'd with much danger and difficulty, all the Gallants were eager to be in it. Mutius, who was almoſt cured of his wound, deſir'd the command of a Boat; Themiſtus, Herminius, Æmilius and Spurius did the like: Artemidorus and Merigenes were in the ſame Boat, Amilcar was in that of Herminius, Zenocrates commanded one by himſelf, in which Octavius was pleas'd to be; Horatius had the conduct of one of the Fire-boats, which was faſtned to his own, and Herminius had charge of the other, altho Mutius had us'd all poſſible endeavours to get that employment. Damon, Sicinius, Acriſius, and divers other Gallants, were diſpers'd in all the Boats. In the mean time, tho all care had been taken to keep this enterprize ſecret, yet the Enemies got intelligence of it, and prepar'd themſelves to be aſſaulted. But for that they could not learn whether they ſhould be attaqued above or below Rome, they were neceſſitated to divide their Forces; and moreover, the better to deceive them, a falſe attaque was thought fit to be given on that ſide which was not intended for the place of on-ſet. The Tuſcans and Tarquinians had raiſed little Forts at both ends of that Bridge of Boats, which ſtopt up the River, and ſerv'd for the communication of the diſtant quarters of their Army: & this no doubt augmented the difficulty of the Romans attempt. But how hard ſoever it was, it was reſolv'd upon; and all things being ready for it, preciſely at midnight, all the Boats appointed for both purpoſes put forth upon the River. But thoſe which were to make the falſe attaque, ſet out firſt, to the end to divert the enemies Forces to that ſide; and a quarter of an hour after, the others moving in order, and taking up almoſt the whole breadth of the River, in ſeveral ranks went to encounter the Enemies with ſo much greater hope of Victory, for that they knew Aronces was not on that ſide, pretending to make uſe of their Fire-boats according to the occaſion they ſhould have for them. But, for that it is alwaies a little lighter in the night-time upon the water than upon the land, the Tuſcans confuſedly perceiv'd thoſe that were coming to attaque them, and provided for their defence. So that the Bridge of Boats, and two little Forts defending it, were ſoon beſet with Souldiers, and eſpecially with Bow-men, who ſeeing the Romans within reach of their Arrows, ſhot with ſuch eagerneſs, that the multitude of Arrows made a greater darkneſs thereabouts than that of the night. But becauſe they ſhot at a venture, this firſt diſcharge had no great effect, and hinder'd not the Romans from approaching the Bridge with cries ſo fierce, that they ſeem'd to be a preſage of Victory. All the Boats as they drew near to thoſe which upheld the Tarquinians Bridge, hooked themſelves thereunto, and they planted little Ladders againſt them for the Souldiers to mount upon the Bridge, whilſt the work-men did what they could with their Axes to break the Chains that linked the Enemies Boats together. On the other ſide, Horatius and Herminius, who were the chief Commanders in this enterprize, went to faſten Fire-boats to the middle of the Bridge, in ſpite of the Enemies oppoſition; and having left a hidden fire in the two Boats, which would break out ſuddenly after they retir'd, one went towards the right hand, and the other towards the left, to encourage their men to make themſelves Maſters of the Bridge, and to endeavour to mount upon it themſelves; which

which was no eaſie matter; for the Enemies who ſtood thick upon it with their ſwords in their hands, repell'd them impetuouſly either into their Boats or the River. Mutius, Artemidorus and Merigenes mounted twice upon the Bridge, and were as often beat back into their Boat. Acriſius laying hold of a plank of the Bridge, and being almoſt got up, was wounded in the right hand: Zenocrates alſo mounted upon it courageouſly; but for that they which follow'd him were caſt into the River, he found himſelf alone amidſt many enemies, who ſeizing upon him, threw him into the River alſo on the other ſide the Bridge, after he had wounded one or two of them. Nevertheleſs loſing neither his courage nor his judgement, he ſwam back under the Enemies Bridge with his ſword in his hand, and got into one of the Boats again, to return to the aſſault. Amilcar being got up the Bridge, and perceiving himſelf the ſole man of his party there, counterfeited a Tuſcan, and had the good fortune to leap back into Herminius's Boat without being taken by the Enemies. Horatius was four times repuls'd; Spurius had like to have been drown'd, and ſo had Æmilius; but Herminius was ſo fortunate, that he caus'd one of the Enemies Boats to be looſned, at the ſame time that the Fire-boats doing their effect immediately burnt down the middle of the Bridge, which conſiſting only of planks and faggots was ſoon conſumed. Then was there heard a moſt terrible noiſe, for the Romans ſent forth a thouſand cries of joy, and the Tuſcans contrarily a thouſand tumultuous ſhouts, which teſtifi'd their aſtoniſhment; for the fire having taken away the middle of the Bridge, depriv'd them of communication from one ſide to the other, and opened a paſſage for a great Convoy which they underſtood was prepared in Boats under the walls of a little very ſtrong Town, where the Romans knew the ſupply was which they expected. And things were accordingly ſo happily executed, that the Convoy was already very neer, when the middle of the Bridge was burnt. Wherefore ſo ſoon as the fire mingled with Sulphur and Bitumen began to deſtroy the middle of the Bridg, Horatius & Herminius eaſily caus'd as many Boats to be looſned as was requiſite for the paſſage of thoſe which carried the Proviſion: for ſuch as were appointed to that purpoſe, with great hooks diſpers'd thoſe burned Boats, which ſeparated one from another, and being driven by the ſtream towards Rome, conſum'd by degrees, and cover'd all the River with flaming wracks not without ſome terrour in the ſpectacle. In the mean time, as ſoon as the paſſage was open'd by the flame, the attaque of the Bridge was given over, there being no likelihood of doing any good upon the two Forts, and the only buſineſs being to procure a ſafe entry for the Convoy. Wherefore as ſoon as the River was free, at the firſt ſignal that was given of it, all the Boats drew together, and one half of them following Herminius went to meet the Convoy, and the other commanded by Horatius ſtay'd to guard the paſſage. At which time the Enemies diſcharg'd a ſtorm of Darts both upon thoſe that ſtay'd to guard it, and upon thoſe that conducted the Convoy. Which while they were approaching ſome Gallants amongſt the Enemies got into the Boats which remain'd at the two ends of the Bridge at the foot of the little Forts, and came forth to chaſe away the Romans from the place. And indeed they being aſſiſted by thoſe of their party, who ſtill ſtood with their ſwords drawn upon both the ends of the broken Bridge, where they had at length ſtopt the courſe of the fire, Horatius being unable to maſter thoſe that guided the Boats, was in a ſhort time conſtrain'd to deſert the paſſage of the River to the Enemies. So that when Herminius came back with the Convoy, he found that he was to fight again if he intended to paſs. It was about day-break, and preciſely at that time the Prince of Meſſene coming to ſecond Titus who commanded the Souldiers in the Boats, appear'd with his ſword in his hand upon the end of the Bridge. But when he perceiv'd Themiſtus in one of Horatius's Boats, he leap'd into one of thoſe that maintain'd the paſſage, deſiring to take this opportunity to encounter his particular enemy amongſt the enemies of the ſide he had choſen. Themiſtus alſo knowing him, cauſed his Boat to advance neerer than it was, and with a threatning action ſignifi'd to him that he was glad to ſee him in a place were he might evince that himſelf was more worthy of Lindamira than he. Matters ſtanding thus, Herminius appear'd in the head of the Conduct of the Convoy; for Horatius was conſtrain'd by the advice of all the chief Officers to defer charging thoſe that defended the paſſage, till they might be attaqued on both ſides together. And accordingly Horatius and Herminius advancing at the ſame time, and being follow'd by as many Boats as were neceſſary to poſſeſs the paſſage, went to charge them with their ſwords in hand. Whereupon enſued a very terrible combate; for from the Forts and the two ſides of the broken Bridge, a ſtorm of Arrows like hail was ſent both upon Herminius and Horatius. But without taking unprofitable care to ſecure themſelves from a danger which they could not avoid, but by deſerting their interprize, they minded only the overcoming thoſe who obſtructed them. Horatius leapt into a Boat which Telanus defended, Herminius into another; Themiſtus and the Prince of Meſſene having the ſame purpoſe, executed it ſo exactly, that at the ſame time that Themiſtus leapt with his ſword drawn into the Prince's Boat, the Prince paſs'd into that of Themiſtus. But perceiving their errour, they endeavour'd either of them to return into his own Boat; which as they were doing, they grapled together, and fell both into the water. As they fell, they were parted by their own weight; and being both skilful in ſwimming, as ſoon as they got their heads above water, they approacht to one another and exchanged ſome blows; and this ſtrange combat would probably have prov'd fatal to both, had not a Roman Boat drew towards theſe two Rivals. Which as ſoon as the Prince of Meſſene ſaw, he endeavour'd to avoid being taken, and began to ſwim towards one of the Forts; but finding that he had received a ſlight wound in the right hand, his ſword dropt from him. Wherefore Themiſtus ſeeing him without arms, and ſtreaming with bloud, would not kil him in that condition; but entring into the Boat which came to his ſuccour, ſuffer'd him to get the bank of the River, where he was receiv'd by thoſe of his party. In the mean time Horatius and Herminius being ſeconded by all the other Gallants, maugre the reſiſtance of the Tarquinians, ſunk two Boats, ſlew almoſt all that were in the reſt, and became at length ſo abſolute Maſters of the paſſage, that they got the Convoy clear through it. They had a mind to have maintain'd it afterwards, but it was not to be done; for the Enemies poſſeſſing the Forts ſtill, and the two ends of the Bridge, would not have ſuffer'd them in the place. So that it behov'd them to content themſelves with carrying their Convoy to Rome, which was likewiſe more conſiderable in reſpect of the joy and hope it excited cited in the people, than of the real succour it brought to the Publick necessity: for in these occasions, the multitude alwaies magnifies things, and do's not carry their fore-sight so far as to destroy the pleasure arising from a present relief. This victorious Fleet therefore return'd to Rome, which was received there with a thousand acclamations. It had cost the life of some few Souldiers, and their were also certain persons of quality wounded. Spurius was shot with an Arrow that rais'd his shoulder, Damon was wounded with a sword in the side, Horatius receiv'd a slight hurt under the right eye, and Meleagenes on the arm. But however, this Victory did not prove a bloudy one, and the action was accompani'd with great glory. The better to set it off to the people, thanks were render'd to the gods in all the Temples, the price of Victual was abated, part of these Provisions brought into the City were distributed to the people, and they were put in hope that other Convoys would also shortly come by land. As for those that had made the false attaque, Fortune was not so favourable to them as to the others, and they were inforc'd to fight more than they intended; for Aronces hapning to be on that side, because it was believ'd it would be the most dangerous, came forth to meet them with armed Boats, and repell'd them so vigorously, that they were constrain'd to return towards Rome. He also took two of their Vessels: but understanding the real attaque would not be on that side, a sentiment of glory made him regret his absence from the place of greatest danger. Nevertheless soon after, a sentiment of Love made him the less sorry, inasmuch as he could not be accused by Clelia for being instrumental by his valour to encrease a necessity, in which perhaps she might be concern'd, by hindring Provisions from entring into Rome. But being desirous to send her some tidings of himself, and not being able to go where the conflict was, since Rome stood between him and the place, he writ a short Letter in his Tablets, and gave liberty to a Commander of a Boat whom he knew was alli'd to Clelius, on condition that he would deliver the same to Clelia. This person at his return to Rome made good his word to Aronces, and went to carry the Prince's Letter to that Illustrious Roman Lady, who found these words in it.

ARONCES to CLELIA.

SInce it has not been my fortune to be any wise concern'd in the danger of this daies action, know, 'tis alwaies with regret that I fight against Rome, and that for your sake I comfort my self more easily for loosing an occasion of honour; because I am more solicitous to give you testimonies of love, than to shew signs of courage to all the world. The Prisoners I send you back, will tell how highly I respect all that belong to Clelius. This is all can be said to you at present by a Prince, who has the unhappiness to be in an Army that is Enemy to Rome, and who is faithful enough to adore you in the midst of your Enemies.

This Letter gave much joy to Clelia, but withal it augmented her persecution; for Clelius understanding it, told her, she was infinitely culpable for receiving it; that there could no longer be an innocent correspondence between her and Aronces, since himself prohibited it; and that Rome having daily greater obligation to Horatius, it behov'd her to look upon him as the man that was infallibly to marry her at the end of the War. Clelia answer'd to this speech of her father with her accustom'd constancy; & tho she said nothing inconsistent with the respect she ow'd to such a relation, yet withal she said nothing prejudicial to the fidelity she had promis'd to her Lover. In the mean time, to keep up the peoples hopes, who were troubled that the Enemies had again stopt up the passages of the River, sallies were frequently made upon them, and one day the herds of Cattle were driven forth out of the City, both to signifie to the Besiegers that they wanted nothing, as also to let the people to see, that it was not so straitly begirt. Moreover Publicola had a design to draw the Enemies to a conflict by this Stratagem, imagining they would soon have notice that the droves of Cattle were to go out of the City; for every day some treacherous slaves slunk out of the City into the Enemies Camp. Publicola therefore commanded Herminius to go with a small number of resolute Souldiers and ly in ambush along the great way of the Gabinians, in a little wood two miles distant from the City; and appointed Spurius who was accompani'd with a troop of young men lightly armed, to stay at the Colline-gate till the Enemies were pass'd by it, to the end to intercept their way of return. On the other side, the second Consul went forth at another gate, and getting to the top of mount Clelius with foot only, he appear'd first to the Enemies with the Romane Ensigns, to the end to draw them out to fight. And accordingly Tarquin, whose quarter was on that side, first sending his forragers to attempt the driving away the Cattle, commanded other Troops to second them, who hastned to the place whither they were directed, with all the eagerness that useth to be in people that hope to make a great booty. Herminius no sooner saw them advanc'd, but giving them a smart charge, he drave them towards the second Consul. The Tarquinians thereupon ralli'd themselves, and encouraging one another to fight stoutly, made head on both sides: but at the same instant a great noise arising about the Colline, and the Nevian-gates, they understood they were inclos'd round; so that on a sudden losing their courages, they forsook their ranks, and were all taken or cut in pieces. Whereupon the people beholding the Prisoners brought in, and afterwards the Cattle, fell into an excessive joy, without considering that the City was thereby no better provided for than before. But the Consuls, Clelius, Horatius, Herminius and all the other chief Romans well understood that this small advantage was far from being decisive of the main War; and that unless the Forts were taken that defended the broken bridge which the Enemies had repair'd, it was impossible to have the River free on that side, and consequently Rome could not long hold out. Therefore they resolv'd to make a great attempt to accomplish this; which resolution was kept with much secresie, to the end they might, if possible, surprise the Enemies. Nevertheless they accounted it fit to defer the execution of this design for some daies, during which nothing pass'd very considerable either in the Camp of Porsena or in Rome. In the mean time Aronces omitted nothing to which honor obliged him, and was depriv'd of all consolation, saving what the conversation of the Princess of the Leontines, and the generous Melintha gave him. The Prince Titus was also very much much devoted to his interest, and Telanus acquitting himself of the promise he had made to Octavius, rendred him all offices in his power. As for Tarquin, his solicitude of regaining the Throne wholly took him up; Sextus liv'd after his accustomed manner, to wit, as voluptuously in the Camp, as in time of peace: the fierce Tullia bestirr'd her self continually at Tarquinii to promote the design of Porsenna, who aim'd at the glory of compelling the Romans to receive a King from his hand: But altho War be a great affair which employ's all the world, even to those which go not to it, notwithstanding there wanted not some persons at Rome who diverted themselves agreeably; and War and Love have such a sympathy, that they sometimes produce one another, and often subsist together without mutual prejudice. Thus there wanted not good company at the houses of Domitia, Valeria's Mother, Sulpicia, Bereliſa, Ceſonia, and divers other houses of quality: and all the Lovers, how courageous soever, fail'd not to find opportunities to make visits to their mistresses. They also who were not amorous, but yet had pleasant wits, and were of a debonair humor, frequently diverted themselves with the misfortunes of others. Amilcar found pleasure to himself in a hundred things, which nevertheless had something of sadness in themselves. Damon furnisht him with a sufficiently ample subject, for tho he hated Amilcar ever since he perciev'd that he derided him, in pretending to remember what he had been before he came into the world, yet he thought him of the Sect of Pythagoras, and that he wanted only firmness enough of mind to own an opinion publickly, which was generally so little receiv'd. Wherefore being very ill of the wound he had received at the attaque of the Tarquinians bridge, and believing he should die (tho his attendants thought otherwise) out of Zeal to the Sect he was of, he sent to desire Amilcar to come to see him; for one of the principal Precepts of Pythagoras was, Never to sleep with hatred in the Heart. Now Damon having pass'd many daies and nights without being able to cease hating Amilcar, desir'd to see him before he di'd, that he might be reconcil'd to him and admonish him, since they were of the same Sect, not to make a secret of it, but to maintain that important verity; wishing passionately, that he might retain the remembrance of it when his Soul should be inclos'd in another body, as he believ'd it would in a short time. Amilcar at first much commiserated the prepossessed fancy of a man whom he saw really very sick. But there being no hope to cure him thereby, he answer'd him according to his desire. When he was gone out of his chamber, and had that object of compassion no longer before his eyes, and moreover understood by those that attended on Damon, that whatever he fanci'd, there was no danger of his dying, his jolly humor could not let pass so ample a subject of divertisement, but at night he compos'd a Dialogue between himself and Damon, which the next morning he sent to Plotina by an unknown person. When Plotina receiv'd the Pasquil, Valeria, Bereliſa, Clidamira, Herminius, and Anacreon were in her chamber. The hand being also unknown to her (for Amilcar had caus'd his composition to be written by one of his Attendants) she imagined it might haply be something to declare her condition to her, and inform her who she was. Wherefore rising up to open it, and withdrawing towards the window, she was immediately surpriz'd upon reading these words;

This odd Title excited such laughter in her, that Anacreon told her she would be very unjust if she depriv'd the company of reading that which made her so pleasant. I assure you (answer'd she) 'tis not my intention, for I think the pleasure the company will receive in seeing that which is sent me, will augment my own. And accordingly Plotina, having resum'd her seat, and intreated her Auditors not to interrupt her, began to read that which follows, with that sweet and agreeable Air that was natural to her.

A Dialogue between Damon sick, and Amilcar in health.

Amilcar.

WHat has mov'd you to send for me? Am I not your Rival, and consequently your Enemy?

Damon.

Alas! When a man is at a point of death, and perhaps ready to become a Crane the same moment, he has no longer power to hate any person: for, in brief, Amilcar, I may undergo that destiny if the Gods please, and if Pythagoras be not mistaken.

Amilcar.

Since I conceive Cranes are very healthful (for in my opinion they are birds which do not much torment themselves with the affairs of this world) I should as soon chuse to be a Crane in health, as to be sick Damon. But however, for what reason have you sent for me hither?

Damon.

To conjure you that you would cease deriding the Doctrine of the greatest Philosopher that ever liv'd; since I am fully perswaded you are of his opinion, and 'tis only out of an evil bashfulness that you dare not own it seriously.

Amilcar.

But what are you concern'd whether I believe that which you do, or no?

Damon.

'Tis because I would be assur'd to leave a Pythagorean Lover to Plotina, to the end he might perswade her of so important a truth as that of the Metempsychosis (or transmigration of Souls) is.

Amilcar.

How? Would you have me perswade her, that perhaps she has been a Stork, and may possibly become a Hinde; which are difficult matters to believe, when one is not accustomed thereto? I, that cannot perswade her that I love her passionately, tho it be sufficiently probable for a man that has black eyes, an airy mind, and a sensible heart, to love the most charming person in the world?

Damon.

At least be so generous to perswade Plotina, that if the Gods hear my prayers, my Soul shall pass into the body of some pretty little Dog, which may divert her, tho she should receive it from your hand.

Amilcar.

Could I know you in that condition, I should beware of giving you to my Mistress; for you might be so dispos'd as to retain the hatred of a Rival under the form of a Dog, and to bite me as one of those Creatures when possess'd with madness, if I should offer to kiss the border of her robe.

Damon.

Alas! What then can I wish to be, that I may once again enjoy the presence of Plotina?

Amilcar,

Verily I think your case very hard herein; according to all likelihood, you can never see your self her Lover again,

tho

tho the ſame moment enſuing your death ſhould be the firſt of your ſecond life: for twenty years hence you would be quite a new Lover, whom ſhe would much contemn; and beſides, ſhe makes ſo little reckoning of her beauty at this day, that it's likely ſhe would then much leſs eſteem it. But if you will believe me, deſire to become a Mouſe, and to be hid in her cloſet. I have ſometimes made a Metamorphoſis of a Mouſe into a woman, doe you make one of a Lover into a Mouſe.

Damon.

But you do not conſider that ſhe would not love me, but rather do all ſhe could to cauſe me to be taken.

Amilcar.

You have reaſon, and I am miſtaken; not but that, according to the example of the Mouſe I once told you of, which gnaw'd Mars's Love-letters, you might have pleaſure enough in gnawing all the ſweet Letters that ſhould be written to her; and eſpecially mine.

Damon.

'Tis true; but however, I cannot think fit to become a Mouſe.

Amilcar.

Indeed 'tis ſufficiently difficult to chuſe to be a Beaſt in the company of Plotina.

Damon.

Yet I ſhould rather like to be ſome poor little Animal and made much of, than to be a Lover and ill treated.

Amilcar.

Every one has his fancie; but in concluſion, what doe you reſolve upon?

Damon.

To die without knowing what I would be, that I might ſtill ſerve for ſomething to Plotina.

Amilcar.

Trouble your ſelf no more about this matter; for I ſwear to you with all the ſincerity of a Rival, that whatever you may poſſibly become, I will make you ſerve for divertiſement to Plotina as often as I ſhall talk with her about your Pythagorean opinions. And now die with joy, ſince you can have no greater contentment, having troubled her during your life, than after your death, to ſerve for the pleaſure of the faireſt and moſt amiable perſon in the world.

It muſt needs be confeſt (ſaid Plotina ſmiling) that Amilcar is not over-wiſe; for certainly 'tis he that made this Toy. Rather ſay (anſwer'd Valeria) that he is an agreeable perſon, and of an ingenious and diverting humor. For if Damon did not ſpeak what is in the Dialogue, 'tis poſſible he might, according to the humor that I underſtand he is of. 'Tis true (reply'd Herminius) that a man who could believe Amilcar remembred he had been a Phœnix, might ſay all, that is here aſcrib'd to him. I beſeech you (ſaid Bereliſa to Plotina) give me a Copy of this Dialogue. And I deſire the ſame favour (added Clidamira) and if you pleaſe, will writ it out immediately. Amilcar's conſent muſt be ask'd (anſwered Plotina ſeeing him enter) for no queſtion he has more right than I in what you demand. I do not think that can be (ſaid he) tho I know not what you ſpeak of. We ſpeak (anſwer'd ſhe) of the pleaſant Dialogue between Damon ſick, and Amilcar in health. How? (cry'd he) as for the Amilcar you ſpeak of, I aſſure you I do not know him; but thanks to your eyes, he that ſpeaks to you is more ſick than Damon. Since your malady does not appear in your aſpect (anſwer'd Plotina) it is not eaſie to believe you; therefore you may pleaſe to ſuffer me to take you for the Amilcar in health, who has made Damon ſpeak a thouſand follies, and who alone can grant me permiſſion to give Bereliſa a Copy of the Dialogue which he has made. Amilcar thereupon ſaid, it was true he had a diſcourſe with Damon which deſerv'd to be witten, but he endeavor'd to deny that he had ſent any thing to Plotina. Yet it was in vain; for all the company ſo confidently maintain'd that it was he, that he could no longer defend himſelf. Well then, Madam (ſaid he to Plotina) ſince 'tis your pleaſure I ſhould paſs for the Author of the Dialogue in queſtion, I conſent to it, for I am the moſt complacent perſon in the world. Since 'tis ſo (ſaid Bereliſa) you ſhall give me a copy of what you have made. If Damon dies (anſwered Plotina) I ſhall conſent to it; but if he does not, I conceive it will be beſt not to let this toy run abroad in the world, for fear at length he be angry in good earneſt. On the contrary (reply'd Amilcar) if he dies, 'tis fit it die with him; but if he eſcape, as they who attend him believe, I care not if it be ſeen: for ſince Damon is of a Sect according to which it is not lawfull to ſleep with hatred in the heart, he will doe me no great miſchief. In truth (ſaid Valeria) I conceive, whether Damon die or no, 'tis beſt to give no copy of Amilcar's Dialogue, tho it be very agreeable. Your goodneſs extends too far, Madam (anſwer'd Bereliſa) and 'tis enough to ſay only that 'tis not fit to publiſh this pleaſant Toy, but too much that it ought not to be given to any whatſoever, ſince delightful things are not made with intent not to be ſeen. No (reply'd Amilcar) but fooliſh things, as this in queſtion is, ought not to be made common. Nevertheleſs (ſaid Bereliſa) when a copy of them is given to a diſcreet perſon who promiſes not to lend them, and ſwears to be faithful, to entruſt them is not all one as to publiſh them. The world (ſaid Plotina) is full of ſuch diſcreet perſons who promiſe all, and perform nothing which they promiſe. But for my part (anſwer'd Bereliſa) I am not of that number, and none can be more exact than I am. For my particular (ſaid Clidamira) when only Verſes, Sonnets, or ſuch like things are deſir'd I ſometimes ſuffer my ſelf to be perſwaded to ſhew them, tho I have promis'd the contrary, becauſe for the moſt part I believe they who make ſo great ſecrets of ſuch kind of trifles, do it not but only to make them be thought the better. All ſuch little infidelities (anſwered Bereliſa maliciouſly) produce a ſtrong diſpoſition to greater. I am of Bereliſa's opinion (reply'd Herminius) and for that reaſon I judge it requiſite to accuſtom ones ſelf to be exact even in the concernment of ſmall things. In good earneſt (ſaid Amilcar) 'tis more trouble than 'tis imagin'd to keep a ſecrecie of trifles: for as for thoſe greater ſerious ſecrets (added he) all people keep them that have but a little ſenſe of Honor, or only a little prudence. But as for the ſecrets of Verſes, Sonnets, Dialogues, or pleaſant Novels, 'tis very difficult not to reveal them to ſome or other. Nevertheleſs, I confeſs 'tis dangerous enough to give Copies of Letters or Verſes, when 'tis not deſir'd they ſhould be common. For the more loth you are to have them ſeen, the more they are ſhown; and which is worſt, ſuch Copies paſs through ignorant hands, who change and pervert the ſenſe of the Copies which they tranſcribe. I remember I one day made a Sonnet which I was unwilling ſhould goe abroad at that time; yet I gave it to a Lady who promis'd me not to ſhew it to any perſon living: the firſt Stanza was this which I ſhall repeat to you, if my memory doe not deceive me.

Reaſon

Reason and Love are at perpetual strife:
Who so with that partaker is,
Becomes an Enemy to this.
But without Love there's no content in life.

Nevertheless this faithful friend who should not have shewn it to any one, gave it privately to a friend of hers, that Friend to a Lover, that Lover to another Mistress (for I am not the only man in the world that has more than one Mistress at a time) that Mistress to a Kinswoman that sung well, and that Kinswoman to a Master that taught her Musick, who immediately made an Air to it. But this miserable Stanza having pass'd through several hands, was so transform'd, that I could scarce own it: see how that simple fair one sung it.

Destiny and Love are at perpetual strife:
Whoso with that partaker is,
Becomes an Enemy to this.
But without cause to laugh's a pleasant life.

Seriously (said Plotina smiling) I think I like this non-sense Stanza as well as the other, for the last Verse seems to me perfectly pleasant. Since it is so (said Amilcar) I consent that the Dialogue be given; for perhaps it will be as pertinently chang'd to divert you, as the Stanza of my Sonnets, which nevertheless astonish'd me when I heard that fair ignorant sing it, and account it the pleasantest thing in the world. 'Tis true (said Anacreon) this is a hard fortune. For my part, I remember I one day made an Ode, in the beginning of which I mention'd a Swallow; and as this composition had the good fortune to please, it was talk'd of sufficiently at the Court of Polycrates where I then was, and at length was so often repeated, and so many Copies made of it, that I met with one of it, in which in stead of the two first Verses which might be thus translated:

Thou in Spring-season each year dost return
Too happy Swallow ——

was put

Thou as a Locust each year dost return
Too happy Turtle

So that this handsome Metamorphosis being made of a Swallow into a Locust, my poor Ode became a strange peice of non-sense. But people that understand a little sense (answer'd Berelisa) perceive well that it was not made so. No doubt they do (reply'd Herminius) but sometimes there are things whose meaning cannot be conjectur'd, and all that can be known of them is, that they are not understood. Wherefore the less a man can expose himself to these events, the better; and yet they would be avoyded, if all the world were exact. 'Tis so troublesome to be always exact (answer'd Clidamira) that nothing requires more pains. All other things have their bounds, but exactness has none: it is diffus'd every where, and there is scarce any thing in which it may not be found. When exactness is excessive (reply'd Plotina) I confess 'tis something inconvenient; and if you observe, they that profess it have a kind of a constrain'd Air, their complements savour of ceremony, their familiarity is so nice that the least thing hurts it, and there is no quiet from them. He that is guided by true reason (answer'd Herminius) never addrest himself to any thing in the excess, but acquires a certain habit of being exact, which affords delight in stead of trouble. For I conceive they who are exact, as vertuous persons ought to be, cannot but always continue so. They are so, without perplexity, constraint, or ceremony; and because they understand exactness to be a point of elegancie, that it is necessary to Society, and finally, that without it a man can promise himself nothing from any other person. For when I tell a small secret to a friend who promises me not to reveal it; if I know he is not exact, I am always in fear. Moreover, for a man to comport himself rationally in friendship, it behoves him not only to conceal what he is desir'd to keep secret, but sometimes also not to divulge things which he is not requested to be silent of; because generosity requires him to have a certain charitable discretion, even towards those that are not wise enough to be absolutely discreet in their own concernments. For indeed, it is never commendable for a man to lose an occasion of testifying to himself that he has more prudence, goodness and vertue than another. He ought to make a secret delectation to himself by acting better than others do, and account it a glory to supply the reasons of others by his own, and not be like those who more frequently speak what they never ought so much as to think, than what is fitting to be spoken. I confess (said Amilcar) they who have no exactness are sometimes injurious to others; for I remember I saw a man at Carthage, that through want of it committed the greatest extragavancies in the World. I remember one day he invited me to dine with him, but being invited himself about an hour after to another place, he made no scruple to goe thither, without so much as sending to advertise me of it. For my part (said Plotina) I shall never pardon a man who promis'd me a basket of Orange-flowers, and sent them not; and I shall remember another as long as I live, that sent twice to know whether I would be in my chamber that he might come to visit me. His messages were accompani'd with such earnestness, that imagining he desir'd to speak with me concerning a business relating to a friend of mine, of which he understood something, I broke off an appointment I had made, and sent him word, I would attend him. And so I did to no purpose, and that with very much regret. For it being a fair day, in which all the world went abroad to walk, no body came to visit me, and I was all the afternoon turning my head as often as my chamber door was open'd, thinking always 'twas he that I waited for. And which was worst, I understood in the evening that this shuttle-brain'd friend had spent the day walking with the Ladies which he met as he was coming to me. Judge therefore (said Herminius) whether the little exactness which troubled you in so inconsiderable matters, would not disgust you in more important occasions. Besides, 'tis certain, that when a person makes a custome of not being punctual in small things, he easily fails to be so in great, and consequently many times hazards the displeasure of his best friends. And therefore the surest course is to be punctual. In truth (said Amilcar) I am of opinion, all things are dubious, that there is no side but may be defended; and If I were to establish a Sect, I would have it lawful to doubt of every thing, except matters of Religion. For there is nothing we can be confident of. Many times we are ignorant of what we fancie we know, and know what we take our selves to be ignorant of. There are whole Nations which have Opinions, that pass for errors amongst others; and as all men have a constitution and temper particular to themselves, so every Kingdom, every Country, every City has its peculiar manners, customs, inclinations, and opinions too; so true it is, that reason varies according to the Climates and Nations. For the most part we believe what our Fathers believ'd before us, without searching into the reason of our belief; onely there are a few sublime Wits who pry into things in their Original, who seek to make a perfect discovery of their Opinions, and after all their pains find it almost impossible to be done. For indeed our Reason from the very first use of it is prepossest with the sentiments of others, and can't without violence clear it self from all that entangles it. In which respect I am perswaded, men are almost alwaies deceiv'd, even in things wherein they think themselves erre least; and the surest course would be, as I said before, to doubt almost of every thing. And to prove what I say; is it not true, that till the daies of Pythagoras, the most learned men believ'd the Evening-Star and the Morning-Star to be two distinct Stars? And nevertheless, the knowing Philosopher has discover'd to us, that the same Star which we behold so twinkling at the beginning of night, is the same which is so fair at break of day. All men before, judg'd of it in that manner, and two names were given it, which it bears still: and yet we see manifestly that all men were mistaken. That which you say is true (answer'd Anacreon) but the same man that could discover a truth that had been unknown before, teaches a ridiculous falshood in his Metempsychosis. 'Tis in that regard (reply'd Amilcar) that I have reason to affirm, 'tis best to doubt almost of every thing; since the greatest men are lyable to be deceiv'd in something. For my part (said Herminius) I cannot conceive that that excellent man positively believ'd that which his Disciples teach; for the Moral Precepts are so excellent, that 'tis hard to believe his Doctrine could have been so foolish. As for my particular (said Berelisa) I confess I cannot yet very well believe that he thought he remember'd he had been a Cock, and Euphorbus at the War of Troy, could be of any great judgment. Nevertheless 'tis certain (answer'd Herminius) that Pythagoras was one of the wisest men of the World. But what then (said Plotina) did he teach so Excellent? A thousand things, Madam, (answer'd Herminius) and to tell you some of them, he commanded his Disciples to honour the Gods, and never to desire any particular thing of them; maintaining, that no man knows exactly what is fit for him, and that 'tis more respectful to submit totally to the order of Heaven, than to endeavour to alter the Decrees of Destiny according to ones humor. What you say, has no doubt something very excellent in it (reply'd Valeria) for I conceive indeed that all men know not what is proper for them, and that the cause of disorder, division, and Wars in the World, is, for that in general all men desire good, and know not what it is. But to return to the excellent man you speak of, I remember I once heard the Illustrious Brutus (who was an intimate friend of the wise Damo, daughter of Pythagoras) say, that this great man compos'd a thousand excellent Verses concerning heroical Friendship. 'Tis very probable (answer'd Herminius) and to the same purpose he establisht a Community amongst his Disciples; for he confidently maintain'd, that there ought not to be any distinct interest amongst true friends, and that where there was, there was no friendship but society: and it may be averr'd, that never any before him so well understood all the duties of true Friendship. But that which makes me love him the more, is, that he was a profest enemy to Lying, which I hate more than can be imagin'd. No doubt Lying is an evil thing (reply'd Amilcar) but to say truth, it is sufficiently hard to renounce it absolutely; and upon due observation it would be found, that even they who hate it most, sometimes make use of it, notwithstanding their detesting it. At least I know that I do upon some occasions, and shall do still many times in my life. Not that I love to lye, but it has certain little conveniences in it very necessary. For example, is it possible to make a Story delightfully without lying, or adding some circumstance to render it more pleasant? Can one commend a woman, without speaking a little more good of her than she deserves? Can one speak ill of his enemy without aggravating his fault? Can one bemone himself in Love, without making his misery a little greater than it is? And to prosecute sincerity to the utmost, could I have compos'd the Dialogue of sick Damon, if I would have confin'd my self to the truth? All the company laught at this which Amilcar said; and as Plotina was going to answer him, Æmilius entred, and ask'd if they had heard the great news which he lately learnt. I assure you (answer'd Plotina) that we have heard none all this day. I inform you then (reply'd he) that I am just now assur'd, there is a great division between Tarquin and Porsenna, and that it may be an occasion of raising the Siege and delivering Rome. As things desir'd are easily believ'd, this news was receiv'd with joy; and tho Herminius made scruple at first of believing that Tarquin would fall out with a Prince without whose protection his case was desperate, yet he yielded at length, and discours'd upon this surprising intelligence as the rest did. A little while after, Flavia enter'd, and having taken a seat, ask'd, whether they had heard tell of the apparition of the God of Tyber, who was reported to have threatned Porsenna's Camp; and then making the description of that God, repeating the very words that were attributed to him, and indeed speaking as a person well perswaded of what she affirm'd was true. For my part (said Amilcar smiling) I have walk'd upon the banks of the fairest Rivers in the World, and also upon those of the River Alpheus, so famous for his love of the fair Arethusa; but none of the Deities that preside over them would never yet do me the honour to appear to me: and therefore Madam, (added he, looking upon Flavia) you must permit me to expect till the news you speak of be confirm'd, before I believe it. Flavia was going to answer, but Merigenes being enter'd hinder'd her; for beholding Amilcar in the company, he seem'd so surpris'd at it, that assoon as the first civilities were past, he could not but testifie his astonishment. I thought (said he to Amilcar) you had been gone disguis'd to the Enemies Camp, to foment the division which they say is between Porsenna and Tarquin; for I just now came from speaking with a man who confidently assur'd me he saw you depart thither. Well then (said Æmilius) you understand by Merigenes, that I am not the only person that have heard report of the division amongst the enemies. But if it be no more true (answer'd Herminius) that they are divid-

divided than it is that Amilcar is gone diſguis'd to Porſenna's Camp, there is not much ground to rejoice at this great news. But, I beſeech you (ſaid Plotina) from whom did you learn it? From a man (anſwer'd Æmilius) that I ſeldome ſee but in the Publick places, where they talk of general affairs. He ſeems to be ingenious, ſpeaks much and well, is not much to ſeek for what he would ſay, and affirms things ſo poſitively, that none dare doubt of what he delivers. 'Tis certainly the ſame (ſaid Merigenes) that told me you were gone diſguis'd to the Camp of the Enemies. May it not be the ſame man too (added Plotina, ſmiling) that acquainted Flavia with that wonderful Apparition ſhe tells us of? To ſpeak truth (anſwer'd Flavia) I think all our newes comes from the ſame place; for Mutius who inform'd me of what I have related to you, aſſur'd me, he heard it reported by an ingenious perſon in the Grand Court of Hoſtilius. 'Tis there I was told of the diviſion of the Enemies (reply'd Æmilius). And 'tis there alſo that I was aſſur'd (added Merigenes) Amilcar was gone out of Rome diſguis'd, but with all the circumſtances ſo preciſe, that any other beſides my ſelf would have been deceiv'd as well as I have been. Is he a Roman (demanded Bereliſa ſmiling) that told you all this News? No, Madam, (anſwer'd Æmilius) and I find his pronunciation manifeſts him to be a ſhanger. Certainly then (ſaid Clidamira to Bereliſa) 'tis a man whom we know, who accompani'd us in our paſſage from Cicily to Oſtia. I doubt no more of it than you do (anſwer'd Anacreon) and accordingly deſcribing that perſon to Merigenes and Æmilius, they underſtood 'twas he of whom he ſpoke. But what is this univerſal Impoſtor? (ſaid Plotina). He is a perſon of extraction good enough (anſwer'd Bereliſa) born at Lylibæum; he ſpent his youth in Africa, and has got ſuch a faculty of lying, that 'tis impoſſible to hinder him from it. So that I think I may ſafely affirm, he never ſpoke any truth in his life, but he thought he ly'd. Nevertheleſs, as you were told, he is ingenious, ſpeaks freely, and delights thoſe ſufficiently who know him not for a Lyar; for he alwaies tells new things, his wit is never exhauſted, and alwaies forgeing matter of diſcourſe; he talks all his life, and with al hath the art to contradict himſelf leſs than all other great Lyars. But, for that I am a lover of truth, and very much abhor lying, I cannot endure him, and he comes no more to ſee me. For an hour or two (reply'd Anacreon) one may be diverted by him; but continuing longer, his converſation is inſupportable; for what heed ſoever one takes, and what reſolution ſoever one makes not to believe him, yet one is alwaies circumvented by him; and he ſpeaks things with ſo free and ingenious an air, that he is able to deceive as long as he lives. 'Tis remarkable (ſaid Clidamira) that he has been ſo horribly encounter'd for his lying, at Lilybæum, that he dares live there no longer; and for that he is perſwaded 'tis impoſſible to ſpeak truth alwaies, he is come hither with intention to go to Præneſte, to inquire, whether it be poſſible there ſhould be a veracious man in the World. If he pleaſe (anſwer'd Amilcar) I will ſhorten his journey, for I will aſſure him ſincerely, that no man alwaies ſpeaks truth, and moreover that there are as many great Lyars as ſpeakers of truth. As for me (ſaid Herminius) who make a particular profeſſion to love truth and deteſt lying, I wiſh people would abſolutely conclude that it behoves never to lye. How? Never? (reply'd Plotina) I do not think it poſſible. For there are little Lyes of civility, which we cannot but ſometimes make uſe of, and decency does not oblige us to decline them. There are alſo Lyes of generoſity (added Amilcar) which ſometimes are very convenient to be us'd. As for the pleaſant Lyes (ſaid Anacreon) I beg favour in behalf of them, For my part (added Clidamira) I approve uſing a Lye in way of excuſe. For that I fear death much (anſwered Flavia) when I am very ſick, I am contented that people ſhould Lye, and tell me alwaies I ſhall recover, tho they do not believe ſo. As for me (ſaid Valeria) I will never uſe a Lye, unleſs when it may ſerve to ſave the life of ſome perſon. For my part (ſaid Merigenes) I ſhould extremely ſcruple to tell the leaſt Lye in the world; but I confeſs, perhaps I might Lye, at the command of a Miſtreſs. In good earneſt (ſaid Bereliſa) there are more Lyars, than I imagin'd. Some there are to (anſwer'd Æmilius) who are Lyars, tho they do not think themſelves to be ſuch. But ſince we are in the humor of ſpeaking truth (reply'd Plotina) I beſeech you let us eſtabliſh Laws which may inſtruct us how far 'tis lawful to Lye. I confeſs (ſaid Herminius) I am of opinion it behoves to have a general purpoſe, of Lying at no time, and not to produce in our ſelves a habit of thoſe ſmall Lies, which are not ſcrupl'd by any, and to which people inſenſibly become accuſtom'd. For ſince no crime is ſo eaſie to be committed, nor of more frequent conveniency than a Ly, we ought to reſtrain our ſelves from it to our power, and look upon Lying as a cowardly, low, weak, and infamous thing, arguing a leſs fear of the Gods than of men. But on the other ſide, we ought to look upon Truth as the Soul of Honeſty, if I may ſo ſpeak. And foraſmuch as ſcarce any thing beſides Speech diſtinguiſhes Men from Brutes, as being the image of their Reaſon, whoſo falſifies it, renders himſelf unworthy to be a man. Beaſts have no deceitful cries, except thoſe terrible Animals that are bred upon the banks of Nilus; there is none but man, whoſe wickedneſs perverts the uſe of the Voice. Moreover, truth is the Univerſal bond, which maintains order in the World; the Publick-Faith, the Law of Nations, and Juſtice are founded upon it. It bears the ſupreme ſway in Love and Friendſhip; without it, the World would be nothing but confuſion, all men would be cheats, cowards, and impoſtors; and there would be neither honour nor pleaſure in the World, if truth were baniſht out of it. There is no greater inconvenience then a ſervant that is a Lyar, that aſſures you he has done what you commanded him, when he has not ſo much as thought of it. For my part, I confeſs to the ſhame of my Reaſon, I partly owe the hatred I bear againſt Lying, to a Lying ſlave that I had, who caus'd me to loſe my patience a hundred times, and ſpoyl'd the order of my affairs by his continual falſhoods. For he was ſo exceſſive at it, that ſometimes he affected as much to accuſe himſelf by lying, as to juſtifie himſelf by ſpeaking truth. But to return where I was; is there any thing more inſufferable than an Artiſan, who promiſes you what you have commanded him, and deceives you continually? Is there any thing more odious than the practice of thoſe Great perſons, who with favourable words cauſe a thouſand favours to be hop'd from them, which they have reſolv'd not to grant? Is there any thing more cruel, than to diſcover that a friend whom you love, did not tell you truth, when he told you, he lov'd you above all the reſt of the World?

And lastly, is there any thing more insupportable, than to have a Mistress that swears to love none but you, and nevertheless loves several other persons, or (to speak more properly) loves none? for a divided love is no love. A Lye serves for dissimulation, fraud, perfidiousness, cowardise, and almost all crimes, and 'tis only weakness or imprudence to make use of it. For a man continually incurs the commission of a crime that can never be committed but in publick, and by endangering himself to be convinc'd of it. To lye for nothing, is folly; to Lye for interest, is a great crime, since certainly there is nothing so contrary to the Gods as Lying; the Gods, I say, who are so true in the Oracles which they render. And moreover, do not we see that the search of Truth is the Universal design of all men, and especially of the wise? That which I find yet more pernitious in Lying (said Merigenes) is, that it is a poyson which speedily communicates it self, and whose effect is scarce possible to be afterwards stopt. For when any one relates a Lye in company, all that hear it Lye after him with confidence, and cause all others to Lye, to whom they impart such false relation; so that I conceive Herminius has reason in condemning Lying as much as he does. As for all great Lyes (answer'd Amilcar) I think no man can justifie the practice of them at any time. I condemn the middle sort too (added Plotina) but as for those small ones which are in use all over the world, I think 'tis no easie matter to be able to disclaim them. For my part (said Herminius. I condemn all sorts; yet perhaps I can pardon some, but if I might prevail, none at all should be permitted. But then (said Plotina) 'tis requisite I should be fully instructed in this point, and propound Questions to the Company, which may teach me and correct me for the future. In the first place (said Herminius) it behoveth never to make either a great or a little Lye which may prejudice any person whatsoever; for since Justice and Generosity require not men to speak endamaging truths, they are far from permitting injurious Lyes. What you say, seems so equitable and generous (answered Plotina) that I will not contradict it: but however will you license those officious Lies which turn to the benefit of our Friends, or serve to conceal their faults? I love my friends very well (reply'd Herminius) and I am very joyful at any occasion to serve them; but if I should be unable to do them a courtesie except by Lying, I should be extremely perplex'd. Then you would suffer me to die for want of a Lie? (said Valeria smiling) I find I could not (answer'd Herminius) but I confess, I should have very much regret to save your life by a way so little honourable; for in brief, every Lye is a crime, and all I can do in favour of officious Lies, is to account them excusable in certain occasions. But when a Lye injuries none (said Amilcar) and benefits some person, is it not innocent? A Lye (answer'd Herminius) never fails to hurt him that uses it, tho it should injure no other person, and be only his own Lye; since it renders him less vertuous: and all that can be said, is, that to hinder a Friend from falling into a great misfortune, kindness may prevail above truth. But as for what concerns me, I confess, I should scruple to secure my self from a very considerable mischief by a Lye. Sincerely (reply'd Plotina) my generosity does not go so high as yours; for if I ly'd in behalf of another, I should also Lye in favour of my self. I am of your mind (said Amilcar) Nevertheless, that which Herminius says is very noble and generous (answer'd Merigenes) for I think it shameful to Lye for ones self in any occasion; and it were better to undergo the mischief that threatens us, than avoid it by such means: so that I conclude, a man may Lye to save his Friend's life or liberty, but never for his own interests. I maintain too (said Herminius) that Lying is always a crime, and that even when a man Lies to save his friend's Life, he ought to do it with reluctancy and sorrow, because all Lying is unworthy of a man of honour. Moreover it ought not to be conceiv'd, that there is but one sort of Lyers, since there are a hundred different kinds. 'Tis oftentimes to make a Lye, not to speak a truth that is requisite to be spoken; and dissimulation is so dangerous a concomitant of Lying, that they may be confounded one with another. I confess (said Plotina) I could sometimes have justifi'd certain persons, if I would have declar'd what I knew: but I care not to oppose what people speak affirmatively, especially when it concerns only indifferent persons, and who are accus'd of no great crimes. But why will you by your silence (said Valeria) charge your self with a Lye which you do not speak? For if you can refute it, you are culpable of it; and I conceive well that Herminius has reason, when he saies, there are several kinds of Lyes; for there are Lies in deeds as well as in words, Lying looks, deceiving signs, dissembling smiles, and a Lying silence. Valeria has reason (said Anacreon) and I think too there are Lying civilities, and Lying courtesies; for sometimes people do services to some persons whom they hate, because they have need of them in some occasion, and to others out of fear and weakness; sometimes also they make shew of being glad to see persons that are extreamly distasteful to them. I assure you (answer'd Berelisa) Clidamira is the person that of all the world has most of this Lying civility you speak of: for 'tis not three daies ago, since a young slave came to tell her there was a man desir'd to see her; Clidamira had no sooner heard his name, but she grew red with anger, because the slave had not told him she was not at home; then she sought all waies possible to cause him not to make his visit long, and gave order that a quarter of an hour after his coming, word should be brought her that she was expected elsewhere. After which, changing her countenance, action, and speech, it may be said she ly'd all the waies that can be in receiving this man. For she saluted him with an obliging smile, she caus'd him to sit down with all imaginable civility, and began to entertain him with so pleasing an air, that I am confident the poor man thought he should pass the whole afternoon with her, and that he did her the greatest pleasure in the world in visiting her. Nevertheless it is certain his presence was extreamly disgustful to her. I confess it (said Clidamira) but how can we tell unwelcome persons that they are so? It would be discourteous to tell them so (reply'd Berelisa) but yet 'tis not necessary to make such a false countenance to them; 'tis enough to shew them only a kind of cold civility, that is inoffensive on the one side, and on the other is not treacherous, and does not attract people that are not lik'd. But does not all the world use to do so? (said Clidamira). For my part (answer'd Valeria) I could not. I confess ingenuously (said Plotina) sometimes I can Lye in this manner, but not so perfectly as Clidamira; for they that understand my glances and smiles, perceive well when they are feigned or sincere. In earnest (said Amilcar) you could not deceive me with them. But I would know further ther (ſaid Plotina) whether Herminius, who loves truth ſo much, does not make complements, as others do. Nevertheleſs, to ſpeak ſincerely, all complements are Lies. I grant it (anſwer'd Herminius) but for that they are known to be ſuch, and no perſon laies any ſolid foundation upon complements, they are Lyes without malignity. People know well enough that no great credit will be given to them, they are return'd as they are receiv'd; and I conform to cuſtome without ſcruple, yet with ſuch moderation, that I make as few as I can. But as for pleaſant Lies (reply'd Anacreon) you do as little condemn them; and ſhould I go about to make a delightful relation, you would allow me to add ſomething to the Hiſtory; for truth has for the moſt part ſomewhat too ſerious in it, which does not delight ſo much as fiction. As for this ſort (ſaid Herminius) I think they may be permitted; for ſince ſtories are no more believ'd than complements, I leave your fancy liberty to invent what pleaſes it; and moreover, it belongs properly to you to enjoy the privilege of lying innocently. Indeed to ſpeak ſtrictly, there are no lyes innocent but thoſe that are related for lyes, as all the ingenious Fables of the Poets; yet they ought to have the appearance and ſhew of truth; ſo true it is, that a lye is foul and unhandſome of it ſelf. Yet there is a ſort of lying (reply'd Amilcar) which is an inſeparable companion of vanity; and I ſhould be ſorry if there were none of it in the world: for the lyers that uſe it, ſometimes give me ſufficient divertiſement. What lyers do you ſpeak of? (ſaid Poltina). Of thoſe (anſwer'd Amilcar) who commend themſelves, every one according to their fancy: for ſome people are guilty of the weakneſs to deſire the world would believe them to have a greater reputation than they have, and tell a thouſand lies to make it believ'd. There are Hectors who make long relations of dangerous enterpriſes, in which they never were; theſe are falſe Gallants, who pretend to good fortune, and ſpend the nights in deviſing amorous adventures, and the whole days in relating of them, as if they had hapned to themſelves. I know ſome ſuch, as well as you (repli'd Plotina) and I know others as very fools too: for I know a man that had the impudence to tell me he was deſcended in a direct line from Danae, and yet 'tis known he is of a very mean birth. However, he has made a long Pedegree, with which he tires ſuch as give him the hearing. As for falſe pretenders to Heraldry (ſaid Anacreon) they diſtaſte me as well as thoſe that would ſeem wealthy, and think to keep themſelves from being poor by lying. I aſſure you (anſwer'd Æmilius) I know ſome people very rich, that lye as ridiculouſly as theſe, who have a fancy to make it believ'd, that all that belongs to them is dearer than it is really, and deviſe a hundred extravagant lyes to publiſh their falſe magnificence. There are ſome likewiſe (ſaid Merigenes) who have the boldneſs to ſay they have given things which it would not be often in their power to beſtow. I know other lyers alſo (added Anacreon) that are ſufficiently extravagant, namely, ſuch as when they have been puzled by ſome perſon in diſcourſe, without knowing what to ſay, make the handſomeſt anſwers in the world at home, and which is more notorious, relate the ſame afterwards as if they made them upon the place. Moreover there are ſome (added Clidamira) ſo vain as to report that perſons of quality write to them, and go to ſee them, tho they never ſo much as thought of them. The ſum of all is (ſaid Herminius) that there are many fools and lyars in the world, and that I have reaſon to hate Lying extreamly. They that lye to prejudice others (added Anacreon) are worſe than they that lye to commend themſelves; but I look upon it as ſo ridiculous to tell lies out of vanity, that I find my inclination would ſooner lead me to utter ſome lye a little malitious, than to commend my ſelf, like thoſe above mention'd. Yet ſome of thoſe that lye in their own commendation (anſwer'd Amilcar) cauſe me to pity them, becauſe they do it according to their judgments, and having a better conceit of themſelves than there is reaſon for, lye innocently; but the worſt for them is, that tho 'tis commonly ſaid, The way to deceive others, is to deceive ones ſelf, yet they do not perſwade any to be of their opinion. But I beſeech you (ſaid Plotina) tell me further what you think of thoſe that write carefling and lying Letters both together, I think the ſame of them (anſwer'd Herminius) as of thoſe who ſpeak lying civilities. In earneſt (repli'd ſhe after a little muſing) if truth were well eſtabliſh'd in the world, people would ſpeak almoſt nothing of what they uſe to ſpeak. This intimates (ſaid Amilcar) that we ought not to truſt too much in your words. For the future (anſwer'd ſhe) I promiſe you to be the trueſt perſon in the world; for to ſpeak freely, all that Herminius has ſaid in behalf of truth, and againſt lying, hath ſo affected me, that I will never lye more at all. And to ſhew you that I have profited well by what he has ſaid, I conclude alſo with him, that every Lye is a crime, that if it were poſſible, lying ought in no caſe to be practis'd, that 'twere good never to employ a Lye to do a benefit, that it is leſs criminal to lye for ſaving the life of ones Friend, than ones own; that lying good-turns argue weakneſs, that diſſimulation is a baſeneſs, that lying civilities are blameable, that to lye for ones own commendation is ridiculous, and that complements are lyes ſo known, that they do no miſchief to any; that there is an implicite lying in ſilence, which ought to be avoided; that the cuſtome and habit of the leaſt lies is a great fault, and that the Poets are the onely Lyars that deſerve to be commended. You have undoubtedly benefited by the diſcourſe (ſaid Valeria) but methinks it might be further askt, whether a Lye be not more criminal in writings than in words? Do not doubt it, Madam, (ſaid Herminius) and I wonder all the company has left this to be obſerv'd by Valeria. In brief (added Anacreon) I conceive that of all the manners in which lying can appear, there is none more criminal and unworthy than that of certain mean wits, all whoſe faculties and genius conſiſting in their own malignant humour, they employ themſelves onely to heap falſities together, to the end to compoſe Satyrs of them. 'Tis poſſible no doubt, to make innocent Satyrs (ſaid Herminius) but they ought to be againſt vices in general; and ſuch as theſe do not make uſe of lying, but altogether of truth, But as for ſuch as are made againſt particular perſons, lying and calumny are inſeparable from them, they are alwaies the iſſues of hatred or envy; and the compoſers being never able to keep themſelves from Lying, are the moſt criminal of all others that practiſe it, For they endeavour to fix a Lye (if I may ſo ſpeak) to render it immortal if they could, to impoſe upon poſterity, and to accuſe people even when they ſhall be no longer in a condition to defend themſelves. But whereas the Gods are juſt, thoſe whoſe hearts are ſo ill temper'd as to affect making Satyrs, are alwayes hated and deſpis'd. even by them that laugh moſt at their calumniating lyes. They are like Tygers and Panthers amongſt men; people deſire to ſee them out of curioſitie, but not to have them at their own houſes. They are fear'd even when they ſport themſelves, and no truſt can ever be put in them. And to ſpeak freely, there is reaſon not to deſire friends which are declared Enemies of Juſtice Humanity, Vertue, and Truth. I ſee well (ſaid Valeria) that all the companie approves what Herminius has ſaid; but I know not whether a Lye may be excuſable in War and in Love, and whether equivocal and ambiguous anſwers which ſeem to be in the middle between truth and falſhood, may be permitted. As for equivocal anſwers (ſaid Herminius) as they are the products of ſubtility and deceit, I have great inclination to condemn them abſolutely, ſaving in certain occaſions wherein out of goodneſs we deſire to avoyd ſpeaking truths that are diſadvantageous to any. Moreover, I ſhould not love to find my ſelf conſtrain'd to uſe them, and to ſpeak ſincerely; it behoves alwayes to anſwer according to the intention or meaning of the perſon ſpoken to, and not to endeavour to deceive him. As for lyes which are made in war (ſaid Anacreon) I do not account them criminal, becauſe aſſoon as War is proclaim'd, each party diſtruſts the other. I confeſs it (ſaid Herminius) but yet I am aſſur'd no Heroe would take upon him the office of a Spy, or get a Victory to his party, only by a lying ſpeech, without being otherwiſe inſtrumental to it. Wherefore without going about to examine whether in general a Lye be lawful in War, I confidently affirm, that I would never take a Commiſſion to lye, and I ſhould alwayes chuſe rather to fight the Enemies, than to deceive them. But as for Lovers (ſaid Amilcar) if you abſolutely deprive them of the priviledge of lying, you take away all their ſtrength. For true Lovers (anſwer'd Herminius) I think that at utmoſt I ſhould but permit them to lye in Verſe, provided they always ſpeak truth in proſe. But the caſe is not the ſame in reference to light impertinent Lovers, for I licenſe them to ſpeak all they pleaſe; for ſince they are in no great danger of being beleiv'd unleſs by Goſſips that deſerve to be gull'd, 'tis not needful to deny them their feigned ſighs, and deceitful tears, flattering lyes, diſſembled deſpairs, and a thouſand other counterfeit toyes. Should you have been all your life as very a flatterer as I (reply'd Amilcar) you would not better underſtand the practices of extragavant Lovers. If he has not been ſuch (ſaid Valeria ſmiling) he may be; and I know not if he follow'd his inclination, whether he would not be ſo a little. I deteſt lying ſo much (anſwer'd Herminius) that methinks I ought not to be ſuſpected to be lyable to become a fond Lover, eſpecially by the amiable Valeria, who is the fitteſt perſon in the world to cure thoſe that honour her particularly, of ſuch malady. Herminius had ſcarce ended theſe words, but one came to advertiſe him, that Publicola deſir'd his preſence; wherefore he departing at the ſame inſtant, the diſcourſe was alter'd for a ſmall time, and ſoon after the Company ſeparated. Yet Plotina made an obſervation which caus'd her to judge it harder to ſpeak truth alwayes, than it ſeem'd; for all the civilities made by theſe ſeveral perſons, were for the greateſt part more flattering than ſincere. Herminius was no ſooner arriv'd at Publicola's houſe, but he underſtood it was requiſite to haſten that deſign of attaquing the two Forts of the Enemies, becauſe it was known they were making new entrenchments, which would render the taking of them impoſſible, if it were longer deferr'd. An hour after, a Council of War having been ſecretly held, at which the ſecond Conſul Clelius, Horatius, Artemidorus, Themiſtus, Mutius, Octavius, Herminius, Æmilius, and ſome others were preſent. It was reſolv'd not to attempt the taking both the Forts at the ſame time, becauſe the Roman Troops would be too weak, if they were divided; and therefore that only a falſe aſſault ſhould be made upon the Fort that was hardeſt to win, and in the mean time all the Troops ſhould march directly to the other Fort. To this end Gabions, ſheds of boards, faggots, platforms, rams, and other engines neceſſary in like occaſions were provided; and for that the Romans would not be commanded but by a Roman, Horatius had the general command, and under him Artemidorus, Themiſtus, Octavius, Herminius, Æmilius, Mutius, and Spurius, had the chief Offices. Merigenes, Amilcar, Meleagenes, Acriſius, Damon, Sicinius, and all the other gallants mingled themſelves amongſt the Bands, or ranked themſelves neer Horatius. As for the Conſuls, they ſtay'd in Rome for the ſecurity of the City, and to ſend relief to Horatius in caſe he needed it, or to ſuccour and receive him in caſe he were repell'd. But as a ſecret is the moſt difficult thing in the world to keep, when an enterpriſe of this nature is in agitation, Porſenna and Tarquin underſtanding the ſecret preparations that were making at Rome, did not doubt but they were intended for the ſtorming of one of the two Forts; wherefore their Army being very numerous, they provided likewiſe to ſuſtain both aſſaults. Aronces commanded on one ſide, and Titus on the other; the Prince of Meſſene, tho a little inconvenienc'd with the ſlight wound he receiv'd at the attaque of the Bridge, did not fail to accompany Aronces. The brave Lucilius, brother of the generous Melintha, was alſo on that ſide, and ſo were Mamilius Tarquin's ſon in-law, Telanus, Theanr, and ſeveral others; Sextus not daring to take any command, out of policy, for fear of incenſing the Romans too much, and making them more valiant by their hatred of him, continued neer Tarquin, who commanded the Body of the Reſerve, that he might ſuccour thoſe that ſhould need it. But at length the day appointed for this grand action being come, the one ſide prepar'd to make a ſtout aſſault, and the other to ſuſtain the force of the Aſſailants. Then it was that Clelia had an extreme great agitation of mind, for ſhe doubted not but that this would be a very dangerous encounter, and that Aronces would expoſe himſelf to the greateſt hazards of the day. And indeed this valiant Prince to comfort himſelf for not having fought in the moſt dangerous place when the Bridge was attaqu'd, reſolv'd to ſignalize his courage this day, eſpecially having underſtood that Horatius had the command of the Roman Troops for the execution of this enterpriſe. Not but that when he conſider'd that he ſerv'd Tarquin who was a Tyrant, who had uſed Clelia unworthily, and was ſtill amorous of her, and moreover when he reflected that he fought for Sextus who was the cauſe of Lucretia's death, and afterwards of that of the Illuſtrious Brutus; he reſented an exceſſive grief, and judg'd it an intolerable cruelty to hinder proviſion from entering into a City were his Miſtereſs was incloſ'd. It was alſo very hard for him to ſee himſelf with his ſword

in his hand againſt his deareſt friends: but however, honour and nature tying him to the ſide of the King his father, and his hatred of Horatius animating him to a new deſire of glory, he diſpos'd himſelf to fight with a certain kind of boldneſs, which raiſing fierceneſs in his eyes, made him ſeem to have a more high aſpect when he was at the head of the Troops. The opinion of Tarquin was only to ſuſtain the charge of the Romans in the Fort, but that of Aronces was to march out and meet them, and preſent them with battle. And this advice being follow'd, he went to take a ſtand between Rome and the Fort that was to be attaqu'd, and ſo marſhall'd the Troops he had with him, that one would have ſaid all Porſenna's Army was in the place. When the Romane Forces which march'd in order, appear'd, the two Armies were ſoon in a poſture to joyn battle. Horatius beholding Aronces in the head of his Forces, was extreme joyful that he had an opportunity to draw his ſword againſt him without ingratitude; and Aronces knowing him, felt all the motions in his breaſt, that hatred, love, and glory are able to inſpire. the Romans being the Aſſailants, Horatius march'd up firſt to the Enemies, after having encourag'd them which were to follow him, both by his voice and action. Almoſt at the ſame time, Aronces, follow'd by all his party, advanc'd, and ſo bore up againſt the ſhock of the Enemies, that in ſtead of being broken by them, he broke their Forces. This is the day (cry'd Aronces ſpeaking to Horatius) that muſt end all our differences. At theſe words the valiant Prince redoubling his ordinary valour, charg'd his Rival with ſuch violence, that he gave him no time to deliberate what to doe, becauſe he was conſtrain'd to defend himſelf. Yet he did not forget himſelf in this conflict, but as he warded off Aronces firſt blows, ſince my deliverer (ſaid he) will take away my life, which he has ſav'd more than once, I muſt ſhew him at leaſt, that I know well how to defend it. Hereupon enſued a furious combate between theſe two valorous Rivals, and Horatius found himſelf in more danger by having to bear up againſt the ſingle valour of Aronces, than he had been when he alone ſuſtain'd the whole power of the Enemies in defending the Sublician-Bridge. At length, Aronces having ſlightly wounded him in two places, wreſted his ſword away, took him priſoner, and deliver'd him to be guarded by ſome of his Souldiers, whilſt himſelf purſu'd his advantage. But when the Romans perceiv'd the taking of Horatius, they made ſo great a charge to diſingage him, that they recover'd him indeed, whil'ſt Aronces was fighting againſt many together, who having rallied, encompaſs'd him about. At another place the Prince of Meſſene who commanded the Cavalry, perceiving Themiſtus his Rival and fierceſt Enemy in the front of him, preparing himſelf to receive him, he ruſh'd forward with his Horſe at the ſame time that Themiſtus gave ſpeed to his; ſo that meeting with equal impetuoſity, the Prince was dangerouſly wounded in the breaſt, and Themiſtus's right arm was run through. The former reeling with the blow he had receiv'd, was reliev'd by his Souldiers, who carried him off to a place of ſecurity: and Themiſtus being unable to bear his ſword with his wounded arm, put it into his left hand, and drawing back to the ſecond rank, did not ceaſe to give Orders till the end of the fight. In the mean time Aronces ſeeing the Victory was too long diſputed with him, caus'd Titus to advance, who fighting with ſeveral Intereſts that augmented his courage, ſeconded Aronces ſo well, that in ſpight of the Romans valour, they began to give ground on that ſide. Artemidorus ſeeing this diſorder, and obſerving Titus in the head of the Romans, which were of Tarquin's party, made directly at him with his ſword; but that of Titus breaking as he warded off the blow, he retir'd into the midſt of his followers. But Artemidorus being unhappily carried forward by his valour in repelling the Enemies, receiv'd an Arrow into his flank, which was ſhot by a common Soldier, hid behind a buſh; whereupon falling down, the Enemies had taken him priſoner, if Mutius follow'd by the courageous Merigenes had not arriv'd there at the inſtant to reſcue him. Then it was that the valiant Aronces ſtood in need of all his courage and prudence; for he ſaw that notwithſtanding all his endeavors, the Romans on a ſudden taking heart again, had put their Troops in order; that Octavius, Mutius, and Herminius were advancing, and that his own Soldiers were ready to turn their backs to the Enemies. The Prince therefore taking up a daring and generous reſolution, commanded his guards which follow'd him to kill all ſuch of his party as offer'd to ſtir a foot, or refus'd to follow him. Whereupon joyning a great example of valour to this command, the fight was renew'd with more heat than before. Horatius on his part having reſum'd his place, notwithſtanding his wounds, perform'd his utmoſt either to overcome or die. So that in an inſtant all the forces being mix'd together, the perſons of Quality all came to handy-blows, and ſignaliz'd themſelves. Mutius perform'd admirable things, Octavius did no leſs. Lucilius on Aronces's party ſignaliz'd himſelf highly; Æmilius fought like a brave and unhappy Lover, that hop'd for nothing, and fear'd not death; and in a word, all acquitted themſelves courageouſly on both ſides. But Aronces having too few foot, and for that to goe towards a Batalion which flanked him there was a little Curtain to be paſs'd over, where his Cavalry would be unprofitable, and beſides, that his Infantry was extremely tir'd, he turn'd towards a party of his Horſe-men, and propounded to them to forſake their Horſes and follow him, they obey'd him, and furiouſly charg'd thoſe they were to encounter. Then Aronces's Foot reſuming courage, and ſeeing thoſe of Quality become equal with them in the danger they were to overcome, perform'd incredible things. In concluſion, in ſpight of all the valour of Horatius and the brave perſons that accompani'd him, Aronces defeated them, and forc'd them to betake themſelves to a retreat. Whereupon the Cavalry which were become Foot, in a moment, reſuming their Horſes, purſu'd the Romans very neer to the City. Yet this retreat was made ſomewhat orderly; nevertheleſs it caus'd terrour and confuſion in Rome; and had not the Conſuls acted with prudence and authority, the affrighted people had ſhut up the gates againſt the Roman Troops, for fear leaſt the Conquerors ſhould have enter'd together with the Conquered. The great number of the wounded which were brought back all bloody, further augmented the fear amongſt the people: and if the love of Liberty had not been ſtrongly impreſs'd in their hearts, they had certainly enclin'd to a ſurrender. Nevertheleſs, in the midſt of the great tumult, no Roman was heard to propoſe the receiving of Tarquin in order to peace. On the contrary, their firſt fear turning into fury nothing was heard but imprecations againſt him, and the fierce Tullia; and the moſt deſpairing amongſt them them said aloud, that they ought rather to set fire on the City speedily, than deliver up themselves; that it was better to perish quickly and generously by the flames, than slowly and shamefuly by famine. At length the disorder became so great, that the like was never seen. There was a universal consternation in the streets and publick places. Artemidorus being brought in as the other wounded were, occasion'd more rumors still, because he was a person of very high Quality, and extraordinary valour. The wound he had received was so dangerous, that the Chirurgions would not promise for his life. Whereupon all his friends were extreamely troubled, and Berelisa and Clidamira taking no care but for the preservation of this Prince, employ'd themselves in performing all services he needed in this condition. As for Themistus and Horatius, their wounds were so little dangerous, that they were not necessitated to keep the chamber. Clelia had very different sentiments in so great a disorder; for she lov'd her Country, she pity'd all its calamities, and hated Tarquin: but for that she affected not Horatius, and lov'd Aronces, it was something troublesome to her not to rejoyce that the latter had overcome the other. But judging this secret joy criminal, she soon chang'd it into a lawful sorrow. Just Gods! (said she to her self, sighing) wherefore doe you permit me the use of hatred and affection; since my fortune is dispos'd in such sort, that I can neither love nor hate without a crime, nor grieve nor rejoyce innocently? If I hate Horatius, I am unworthy to be a Roman, since he is a Roman that has sav'd Rome, that dayly hazards his life to defend it, and comes from shedding his own blood for the safety of my Country. On the other side, if I love Aronces, I love a Prince that besieges Rome, whose valour is employ'd to subject it to the Tyrant, or reduce it to distruction. But again, if I love Horatius, I am perfidious, unfaithful, unworthy to live: and if I hate Aronces, I am perjur'd, and the most ungrateful person in the world. What then shall I do, unfortunate as I am? (proceeded she) I will submit my self to the will of the Gods (added this admirable Lady) and without arguing so much upon events, or desiring to foresee what is to come, I will have respect towards my Father, pity for my Country, esteem for Horatius, affection and fidelity to Aronces, and inocence in all my actions. In the mean time the Consuls and the Senate were in a very great perplexity; for what course soever they could take, all things necessary for the subsistence of the people became so dear, that this farther increas'd the repinings of the multitude. The Enemies who were advertis'd of this disorder, taking advantage of it, streightned the City more than before, so that nothing at all enter'd into it. They dar'd not so much as drive the little remainder of Cattle in Rome, out of the walls of the City to feed; and all the Inhabitants were in extreme desperation. All sorts of divertisements were laid aside, even Lovers scarce spoke any longer love to their Mistresses; conversation was alike every where; and Amilcar and Anacreon who could not live without joy, profess'd they were more likely to dy of discontent than famine, if the state of things did not suddenly change. Nothing was seen every day but Funerals, either of those that had been wounded in the late fight, or whom the necessity of Fate cut off. There was a mortal paleness in most faces, and the fear of famine anticipating sad effects, caus'd the people to believe they suffer'd the misery already which they did but apprehend. Things being in this condition, that which more exasperated the peoples minds was, that they understood the fierce and cruel Tullia was arriv'd in the Camp of Porsenna, and demanded to live at a Castle, near that wherein Galerita was, till the end of the siege. But Mutius who had long sought to signalize himself by some eminent service to his Country, and to compel Valeria to esteem him above his Rivals, went to wait upon her one morning; and saluting her with a countenance that discover'd he had some grand design in his mind, Suffer me, Madam, (said he to her) to take leave of you alone, and to reveal a secret to you of highest importance. I have long agoe known that the passion I have for you is displeasing to you, and that of four Lovers which adore you, at present Herminius is the only affected, Æmilius the pity, Spurius the hate, and you are insensible towards me. Nevertheless, Madam, in spight of my unhappiness, I have taken a fancie to have a share in your compassion, since I can have none in your affection. Prepare your self therefore, Madam, to bestow a few tears upon me, when you shall understand my death: for I assure you, you have more interest than my Country in the Design which I have laid to deliver it. I cannot speak more clearly to you, time will inform you further, and let you know that bidding you adieu this day, I believe 'tis the last time I ever shall do so: but least your answer should weaken my resolution (added he) I chuse rather humbly to take leave without expecting it. And accordingly without giving her time to answer a word, he went forthwith to the Senate, having first intimated to the Consuls he had something of importance to acquaint them with. When he came before the Assembly, beginning to speak with a heroical stoutness and a firm voice, My Lords (said he) I come to desire two favours of you: the first, that you would permit me to goe out of the City disguised in a Tuscan habit; the other, that you would not require me to declare what way I intend to attempt the deliverance of Rome. Secrecie is so absolutely necessary to the execution of my design, that I ought not to impart it to a great Assembly; and withal I have so high an esteem of your vertue in general, that I conceive I should doe you injury, if I offer'd to select any particular person of the company with whom to intrust it. Let it suffice that I assure you it is great, and may prove happy; and moreover, that if I dye, I shall account my life very gloriously bestow'd, since I shall loose it in recovering Liberty to my Country. Mutius having done speaking, the Senate deliberated upon what he had said; and tho there was little probability to think a single man could effect the raising of the Siege, nevertheless matters were in so bad a condition, that knowing him for a person of illustrious extraction, high courage, very zealous for Liberty, of a resolute minde, and much affected with a powerful desire of glory, they granted him what he requested. Upon which without loss of time, that very evening he disguis'd himself like a plain Tuscan Soldier, and taking advantage of the darkest time of the night to pass out of the City into the Enemies Camp, went forth of Rome with a Ponyard hidden in his cloaths, none besides himself knowing the great design, which affection to his Country, and love of the vertuous daughter of Publicola had together excited him to. Mutius's Nurse having been a Tuscan-woman, he spoke Tuscan well enough not to fear being discover'd by his language. So he pass'd

over the Tyber at midnight, and was so fortunate as to arrive at Porsenna's Quarter without being stopt. When he was there, he thrust himself into the company of a great number of Souldiers, whom he beheld gather'd together before a Tribunal rais'd only two steps high, upon which stood a man of good aspect, giving orders necessary for the pay of the Souldiers, and who seem'd to have all the marks of Royaltie; for he had a robe of purple on, and guards about him. Mutius approacht as neer him as he desir'd; for appearing to have no arms, and being clad in a Tuscan garb, no body had any distrust of him. So he approacht the Tribunal, and apprehending the person upon it was Porsenna, not daring to inquire for fear of being discover'd, and doubting he should not find another opportunity so favorable to his purpose, on a sudden considering this man as the Enemy of Rome, the Protector of Tarquin, and finally as a Prince whose death was necessary for the deliverance of his Country, in a moment he divides the press, draws his Ponyard, falls upon him, and sheaths it in his heart, with such speed, that it was not seen till he had drawn it all bloody out of the body of him whom he took for Porsenna. This desperate act so surpris'd all that beheld it, that he that committed it might perhaps have sav'd himself in spight of those that encompass'd him, if Porsenna coming at that time forth of his Tent, which was hard by, and understanding the matter, had not commanded his guards to bring the man before him either alive or dead. And accordingly, Mutius, tho he easily enough escap'd with his Ponyard in his hand out of the throng of the terrifi'd Soldiers who beheld his fact, was constrain'd to yeild himself to be conducted before Porsenna by the guards he had sent to take him. This Prince was at that time before his Tent, where he beheld the preparations of a Sacrifice which he caus'd to be offer'd to the Gods every morning, and had standing about him Aronces, Telanus, Lucilius, Theanor, and diverse other persons of Quality. Mutius's Ponyard wherewith he had committed that bold act being wrested from him, he appear'd without arms before Porsenna, but with a countenance full of fierceness, that spoke his regret for having fail'd in his enterprise, but no fear of the death which he could not but believe was prepar'd for him. Assoon as he was come before the King, the enraged Prince frowning upon him, Who are you? (said he to him) whence come you? tell me, who sent you? who put you upon this? who are your Complices? and whether your aim was only against him you have slain, or you intended to take away my life too? I am a Roman Citizen (answer'd he fiercely) my extraction is noble, I am call'd Mutius, and the action I have newly done may prove to you that I want not courage. Considering you as the most dangerous Enemy of Rome, I resolv'd to take away your life; but to the end you may not think your self safe, when you have put me to death, know, I am not the only person that has layd this design, but there are three hundred of us that have sworn your destruction, of whom I am the most inconsiderable in greatness of courage. The lot is fallen upon me first, but I hope some of the rest will be more fortunate than I have been, and that by your death all the Romans shall be reveng'd for the wrong you commit in protecting an infamous Tyrant. But wherefore (repli'd Porsenna) have not the three hundred Conspirators you speak of, rather desig'nd to assassinate Tarquin than me? Because (answer'd Mutius) if the Tyrant were dead, your party would rather become stronger than weaker thereby; but if you were remov'd out of the world, Tarquin's party would be destroy'd. Porsenna being then more incens'd against Mutius, and desiring to know the names of those, he said, had conjur'd against his life, commanded his guards to compel him by force to discover what he desir'd to understand. But Mutius, to hinder them from executing his order, stept suddenly towards the fire that was prepar'd for the Sacrifice, and putting his hand into the midst of the flames, See (said he to him without changing his countenance) by the stedfastness I have to endure the rigour of the fire, how little they fear that ardently love glory, and judge by what I doe, whether I am likely to tell by force of torments what you desire to know of me. Mutius spoke this with so undaunted and bold an aspect, and beheld his hand burn with so calm a countenance, that Porsenna and all about him were so astonish'd with this action, that they expresst their amazement in shouts which they were unable to contain. Porsenna himself advanc'd towards Mutius, and commanded his guards to withdraw his hand out of the fire. That which you doe against your self (said the King to him then, beholding him with admiration) is far greater than what you design'd to doe against me; and if I had a Subject that had done as much for my service, there is no reward so high, but the greatness of his courage ought to expect it from me. Yet it were more noble, my Lord, (answer'd Aronces) to esteem greatness of courage in the person of an enemy than of a Subject. I grant it (reply'd Porsenna) and to evidence to you that I am of that mind, I give Mutius his life. I thank you for it in his name, my Lord (answer'd Aronces generously) for he seems to me so fierce as not to care for having a good render'd to him which he was willing to loose; and I thank you in my own, for having given me so great an example to follow. 'Tis true, my Lord (said Mutius) life is very indifferent to me: but for that 'tis an obligation, that the King is pleas'd to give me a thing which he believes ought to be acceptable to me, I will testifie my gratitude to him, by telling him once again, that his life cannot be in safety unless he give peace to Rome, and desert the interest of Tarquin, who is too unjust to prosper long. For, in brief, I am the least courageous of the three hundred that have sworn his destruction. Ah! Mutius (cry'd Porsenna) if I am so hated by three hundred such brave men as you are, that they resolve to destroy my life, an Army of a hundred thousand men could not preserve it; and to testifie to you how highly I esteem your courage, I will adde liberty to the life which I have already granted you. Since that is a thousand times dearer to me than life (answer'd he) I thank you for it, my Lord: but I cannot dissemble my sentiments; know, that as great a benefit as it is, I cannot accept it, if it be on condition to cease being your Enemy, in case you continue to be one to Rome. For inasmuch as I can never cease to be a Romane, so I can never dispense with hating those that would subdue my Country. Therefore doe not grant me liberty, if you intend thereby to ingage me in your interests. For, 'tis certain (added he fiercely) I can never be absolv'd from the Oath I have made with those three hundred Romans, who have sworn your ruine. Porsenna being still more astonish'd at the boldness of Mutius, commanded he should be led into a Tent, that his hand should be dress't, that he should be treated very well, and secur'd till further Order. After which Tarquin being arriv'd, express'd to Porsenna very much animosity against Mutius, and ask'd him what punishments he determin'd to inflict upon him. You ought rather to ask (answer'd Porsenna) what way I can secure my self from those three hundred resolute persons, who for your interests have conspir'd against my life onely. That which I speak, my Lord (reply'd Tarquin) agrees with what you say: for is there any other means to avoid the effect of that Conspiracie, but by striking a terror into the Complices by the dreadful punishments you shall cause Mutius to endure? But what can a man be made to suffer (said Porsenna) that comes in a manner to seek a certain death, that comes with a Ponyard onely, into the midst of an Army to kill me; that endures the fire without changing countenance, and will not accept either of life or liberty on condition to cease being my Enemy? Voluntary punishments (answer'd Tarquin) are no punishments at all: but if you force Mutius to suffer, you will see him change his language; especially if the torments you put him to, be long and often repeated. For when all is done (added the cruel Tyrant) fear is the surest guard of Kings in such cases. For my part (said Aronces, who could not endure Porsenna should hear the Tyrant's Counsels) I conceive that in stead of seeking which way the King may be secur'd from so many generous Enemies, it would be the best and surest course to seek the means to have no occasion to be secur'd from them. But how can that be? (said Tarquin roughly.) The matter would be very easie (answer'd Aronces generously) if the King would but make Friends of his Enemies. That Counsel (reply'd the Tyrant fiercely) must be extended further, and it should have been added also, that 'tis requisite for the King of Hetruria to make Enemies of his Friends. The Counsel of Aronces (said Porsenna, not permitting Tarquin to continue his discourse) is worthy of himself and of me; and when my friends betake themselves to consider only their own interests without considering mine, it will concern me a little if they become my Enemies; I shall then be more strong by having fastned generous Enemies to my Interests, than by losing self-ended Friends, who care only for their own. Aronces, Lucilius, Telanus, Theanor, and all the other Commanders that were present, having by a confus'd noise, testifi'd their approbation of what Porsenna spoke; Tarquin became extremely amaz'd and perplex'd: yet being a Prince whom Policie had taught to conform himself readily according to the most unexpected events, he made no long hesitation, but addressing to the King, My Lord (said he) to testifie to you that I have regarded only the preservation of your life, I without passion receive what you spoke last, and also advise you to clemencie, tho according to my judgement, that vertue ought to be practis'd but seldome, when a Prince intends to make himself fear'd and respected. Pardon Mutius therefore since you have such a desire, but doe not loose the opportunity of taking Rome, which it cannot avoid, if you will wait but a small time longer. It will not cost you the life of one of your Soldiers; famine is ready to destroy three hundred thousand men, and force them to yeild without conditions, or make a great bonfire of their City, to avoid falling into your power. Every one has his Maxims and his reasons (answered Porsenna) and the business is important enough to be consider'd of at leasure. In the mean time (added the Prince) 'tis best to cause the Sacrifice which is prepar'd to be offer'd to the Gods in thankfulness to them for my deliverance from the danger intended to me, and to ask Counsel of them, which they alone can give me. Tarquin durst not contradict Porsenna; but in stead of being present at the Sacrifice, he withdrew, and went to consult with the cruel Tullia what was fitting to be done. Assoon as he was gone, Aronces causing all his Friends to be assistant, continued the King his Father in the generous sentiments he had possess'd him with: but for that this Prince was scrupulous to make an absolute resolution, he required two dayes to consider. In the mean time, by reason of those three hundred Romans Mutius spoke of, the Kings guard's were doubled, none were suffer'd to come neer his person without first knowing what they were; all that approacht him were searcht, for fear they might have Ponyards hidden about them, as Mutius had, and so great care was taken for the guarding of this Prince, that he judg'd this inquietude worse than death. In the evening he went to the Castle where Galerita and the Princess of the Leontines were, who understanding what had hapn'd, and desiring to incline him to peace, commended him much for having given Mutius his life, and caus'd him to be advis'd by his principal Ministers, to send to offer peace to Rome. At first he refus'd it, alledging, that having undertaken the Protection of Tarquin, honour would not suffer him to desert him; adding also, that it might be thought the fear of being assassinated had induc'd him to take this resolution, tho it was principally because the action of Mutius recalling into his memory all the great exploits that had been done since the War, by Brutus, Publicola, Herminius, Horatius, and all the other Romans, he began to know that Rome was protected by the Gods, and Tarquin abandon'd by them. Wherefore having some kind of remorse for having protected a Prince so unjust, against People of so eminent vertue, he would willingly have granted peace to Rome, if he had thought it consistent with his honour. His mind being thus dispos'd, he understood that Mutius's act render'd the valour of the Romans so formidable to his Soldiers, that forgetting the last advantage they obtein'd, a pannick fear seiz'd upon their minds in such sort, that at the least noise their Sentinels heard, they imagin'd they beheld the three hundred companions of Mutius coming to fall upon them. Porsenna understood at the same time, that Tarquin had drawn all his own Soldiers to his Quarter, which was on the other side the River; that he had had consultations with the fierce Tullia, that he had sent privily to the Cities of Cere, Cume, and Tarquinia, and lastly, that Tullia was coming towards his Castle. Wherefore the proceeding of Tarquin incensing him further, he was easily brought to have such sentiments as Aronces desir'd he should. But for that Galerita fear'd the subtlety of Tullia, she took upon her self to receive her, whilst the King going another way return'd to the Camp. When that cruel Queen arriv'd, she was receiv'd by Galerita with the civility due to her condition. She seem'd surpris'd not finding the King there, with whom she desir'd to speak: but having a bold spirit, not easie to be daunted, she discours'd with Galerita as a person ingag'd in her interests would have done. She conjur'd her to hinder Porsenna from deserting the Siege of Rome; for in fine (said she to her) should Porsenna desire to keep his Conquest, I should con-

conſent to it, and ingage my ſelf to cauſe Tarquin to conſent alſo: there being nothing which I would not rather chuſe, than to ſee Rome in liberty. But whereas it may be (added ſhe) that the King of Hetruria deſires not to uſurp the State of a Prince, whoſe Protection he hath undertaken; when Rome ſhall be taken, I offer to take my Daughter from Mamilius, and to give her to Aronces, and afterwards to bring it about, that Sextus ſhall be contented to Reign in Tarquinia. For my part, Madam, (anſwer'd Galerita) I have nothing to ſay to the propoſals you make to me, but only that 'tis eaſie for you to judge that the Romans will never ſuffer Tarquin to be King of Rome, that 'tis abſolutely impoſſible to eſtabliſh him, by reaſon of the horrible hatred they bear againſt him; and conſequently Porſenna being unable to make war advantageouſly for Tarquin, may make peace honourably for him. Nevertheleſs, I know (added this wiſe Princeſs) the King will make what inſtance he can in favour of your intereſts: but however I am of opinion, it is not to cauſe the deſtruction of a great City and of a great Army, for a thing that is well known can never be brought to paſs; eſpecially (continu'd the Princeſs) when it is attempted in behalf of a Prince who conſiders only his own grandeur, and takes no care for the intereſts of thoſe that hazard all for his. Tullia had much ado to reſtrain from returning Galerita a ſharp anſwer; but for that ſhe would not make an abſolute breach, to the end ſhe might have more opportunity to prejudice Aronces and Clelia, ſhe diſſembled her reſentment, and told the Queen that it was neceſſary for her to go and ſatisfie the King of Hetruria, that he ſhould not think ſtrange that Tarquin ſtaid at his Quarters till he had made his reſolutions, for fear leſt his Enemies ſhould induce him as well to deliver him up to the Romans, as to abandon the ſiege of Rome. And ſo taking leave of Galerita, ſhe went forthwith to the Princeſs of the Leontines, and handſomely intimated to her, that if ſhe could bring it ſo to paſs, that Porſenna took Rome and reeſtabliſht Tarquin, ſhe would cauſe her to be married to Prince Titus; after which ſhe returned to her Chariot. Which ſhe had no ſooner done, but ſhe was informed that the Souldiers that ſaw her paſs along murmur'd openly in the Camp, becauſe their courage was imploy'd to replace a Woman upon the Throne, who had driven her Chariot over the body of her Father, and who ought rather to think of rendring an account to the Gods of all her crimes, than Reigning in a City where ſo many brave people were. This plain advice, which ſhe receiv'd by the Captain of her Guards, caus'd her to change her reſolution. So that inſtead of going to find Porſenna, ſhe return'd to Tarquin's quarter, and endeavour'd to perſwade him to ſurpriſe the Kings of Hetruria's Camp by night; or ſince he could not take Rome, to imploy ſome correſpondents ſhe had in the City to ſet it on fire. In the mean time the proceedings of Tarquin having exaſperated Porſenna, the ſiege being not likely to go on well longer between two divided Camps, and Mutius's courage, together with Aronces's counſel having prevail'd upon the heart of the King of Hetruria, he ſent Mutius back again to Rome by Lucilius, who had order to offer the Romans peace upon reaſonable conditions. Telanus alſo accompani'd Lucilius to negotiate this grand affair. Their inſtructions were; firſt to demand once more the reſtoration of Tarquin, yet without much inſiſting upon an Article which was known could never be granted: Secondly to obtain at leaſt, that all he had by Succeſſion from the firſt Tarquin, and all he had gotten ſince, ſhould be deliver'd to him: and thirdly that a ſmall Territory near the Veientines ſhould be reſtor'd to Porſenna, the Romans having uſurpt it from him ever ſince the laſt War. Upon theſe Conditions they were to offer up the Janiculum, and withdraw the Army out of the Roman Territories. Moreover, to the end all acts of hoſtility might ſooner ceaſe, he enjoyn'd the Ambaſſadors to demand twenty Virgins of Quality for Hoſtages, and twenty Youths of Condition, till the perfect concluſion of the peace: refuſing abſolutely to yield up the Janiculum or withdraw his Army without this condition. Lucilius and Telanus being well inſtructed what they ſhould do, departed with Mutius, whoſe heart was poſſeſs'd with extream joy to ſee his deſign ſo happily ſucceed, and that his Lie was as ſerviceable to the deliverance of Rome as his valour: for it was not true, that three hundred Romans had ſworn the death of Porſenna, and he ſpoke in this manner only to induce the King to raiſe his Siege. As for Aronces he was ſo joyful with the hope of ſeeing Peace, that he could not contain from going to declare it to the Princeſs of the Leontines, and the generous Melintha. He was alſo much pleas'd that he could ſend that old Man to Rome, whom Galerita promis'd him to procure deliver'd, and Plotina ſo ardently wiſht to ſee, to the end ſhe might learn her extraction, of which ſhe was ſtill ignorant. Wherefore to make uſe of this favourable opportunity of giving Clelia intelligence of himſelf, he writ to her by Telanus, and to Artemidorus, Herminius and Octavius, and ſeveral other friends, to oblige them to be diligent in promoting the peace. When Lucilius and Telanus approacht the Walls, and the people beheld them coming with Palms in their hands to ſignifie their bringing Propoſitions of Peace, they ſent forth ſhouts of joy, they run haſtily to the gate at which they were to enter, and expreſs'd ſuch earneſtneſs to know what they had to ſay, that 'twas eaſie to judge they would be favourably heard. So they were immediately conducted before the Senate, to whom Lucilius preſented Mutius; after which, relating in few words what had paſs'd, and had handſomly magnifi'd Porſenna's generoſity, who was capable not only to give life and liberty to a man that had reſolv'd upon his death, but alſo to ſend to offer peace at a time when he might hope a happy event of the War; he dextrouſly diſpos'd the minds of the Senators to hear the Propoſitions he had to make. Yet he was ſtopt at the firſt Article which he ſpoke of the reeſtabliſhment of Tarquin, and the Senate all with one voice ſaid that death being eligible before ſervitude, no peace was to be hop'd, if it could not be made otherwiſe. Whereupon Lucilius having order not to inſiſt upon that Article, he ſaid that according to his inſtructions, that at leaſt it was fit to reſtore the Tarquins what belong'd to them as ordinary Citizens; ſo that this qualification calming their minds they agreed the reſtitution of what could be yet found had belong'd to them, not as if juſtice requir'd it, but only in conſideration that Porſenna had reſtor'd Mutius. After which Lucilius demanded that a ſmall compaſs of Territory which had been uſurp'd from Porſenna's Dominions ſhould be reſtor'd to him; that twenty Virgins of Quality, and twenty youths of condition ſhould be deliver'd to him in hoſtage; and told them then, that his Maſter would withdraw his Forces out of Janiculum, open the paſſages, free the River, and cauſe all acts of hoſtility to ceaſe, without ingaging more in the affairs of Tarquin. Lucilius having lay'd open his King's demands, did not long withdraw, but all thoſe that compos'd the Senate unanimouſly declar'd, they found no difficulty in granting what Porſenna required. Yet there were ſome that ſcrupled the Article concerning Hoſtages; but Porſenna underſtanding how important that peace was, and that they who ſtuck at it could not but have ſome ſecret inclination for Tarquin (becauſe having no children themſelves, they were unconcern'd in this Article) he oppos'd his judgment; No, no, (ſaid he haſtily) we ought not to ſtick at a juſt thing; for it is equitable that Porſenna, reſtoring the Janiculum before the final execution of the Treaty that is to be made, have Hoſtages for ſecurity; and it is not to be fear'd, that a Prince who ſends back an Enemy whom he might with juſtice retain, will keep back Hoſtages, which he cannot withhold without violating the Publick-Faith. But how is it intended (anſwer'd a Senator roughly that was on the contrary opinion) that thoſe twenty Virgins of Quality ſhall be choſen out? To teſtifie to the Publick (reply'd Publicola) that I have no intention to except my own daughter from the general rule, and that all that is mine is the commonwealth's, my advice is, that the choice be made by order of Lot without any deceit, and that all the names of Youths of Quality in general be put into one Urne, and thoſe of Virgins of condition in another; and that in the middle of the Temple of Janus, which ought to be ſhut up aſſoon as theſe Hoſtages ſhall be delivered, a young Child ſhall draw twenty of theſe Tickets which ſhall be well mingled before hand, after which without any conteſt they whoſe names ſhall be found in the twenty Tickets, to be ſent to Porſenna. Publicola's opinion ſeeming juſt and generous, they who had offered to obſtruct the peace, durſt not contradict it. But before they broke up, the Senate Voted to give Mutius the Meadow in which he had done that great action of enduring the fire with ſuch extroardinary conſtancy. And accordingly that peice of Land was from that time called, The Mutian-Meadows, and he himſelf was term'd Mutius Scevola by reaſon of his burnt hand. After this reſult had been taken, it was ſignifi'd to Lucilius and Telanus, who nevertheleſs could not return till the day following, becauſe the Senate would not abſolutely conclude the buſineſs without the ſuffrages of the people. 'Tis true, it was eaſie to judge they would approve the deliberations that were made, for they had ſuffered far more than thoſe of the better Quality. Telanus after he came out of the Senate delivered Aronce's Letters to Clelia, and the reſt he writ to; he intended alſo to carry the old man who accompanied him to Plotina; but he requeſted him to leave him at Clelius's houſe. However Telanus deſir'd at leaſt to ſignifie to that fair Virgin, of whom he was ſtill amorous, that Aronces had kept his word which he had paſs'd; and to that purpoſe he went to wait upon her, where he found good company; for Valeria, Bereliſa, Anacreon, Amilcar, Herminius, Acriſius, and Spurius were with her, as alſo Octavius and Horatius. The action of Mutius, and the Peace being two matters new and important, they were talked of alone in all companies, every one magnifying or diminiſhing the merit of Mutius's act, according to their own judgements or inclinations. For that Telanus was eſteemed by all the World, he was received with joy; he was askt tidings concerning Aronces, he was thanked for the peace as if he had made it, and a thouſand careſſes were made to him, For my part (ſaid Plotina pleaſantly) I believe Bereliſa, Clidamira and my ſelf ſee Telanus again with more joy than Valeria; for being they are not of Rome, and I think my ſelf no Roman, (tho I know not preciſely what I am) we are not in the ſame fear that ſhe is of going as Hoſtage to Porſenna's Camp. That which you do not fear (anſwered Telanus) is that which diſcontents me; for I ſhould be ſufficiently joyful that you were in a place where I could render you any ſervice. 'Tis true (ſaid Valeria) with a melancholy aſpect) my joy for the peace is not abſolutely pure, and fear leſt the Lot fall upon me, ſufficiently diſturbs me. Confeſs the truth (ſaid Bereliſa to her with a low voice) 'tis not that alone that cauſes the ſadneſs in your eies; but your fear leſt Mutius's action which produces peace to Rome, cauſe Publicola to change his mind, and be prejudicial to Herminius, occaſions your diſcontent. 'Tis true (reply'd Valeria bluſhing) my Father is ſo accuſtomed to Sacrifice all things to the Publick-good, that I cannot but fear becoming one of the Victims of the Peace. Whilſt Bereliſa and Valeria were ſpeaking low, Plotina not being able to contain from turning the moſt ſerious matters to raillery: for my part (ſaid ſhe) I confeſs I have at preſent the greateſt ardency in the world to know who were the three hundred men which 'tis ſaid Mutius affirmed had conſpir'd to kill Porſenna. I know at leaſt I am none of them (anſwer'd Herminius). I ſhould be very ſorry to be ſuſpected for one (added Horatius) I am of your mind (purſu'd Octavius.) Anacreon and I (ſaid Amilcar) being not born at Rome, we have no concernment in it, ſince Mutius ſaid they were three hundred young Romans who had conſpir'd againſt Porſenna's life. As for me (ſaid Spurius) whereas Mutius and I have not the ſame intimacy as heretofore, it cannot be believ'd that he communicated his deſign to me. And for my part (added Acriſius) I have ſeveral reaſons for which I cannot be accuſed for one; as firſt, I was not born in Rome: Secondly, —— Oh! I beſeech you (interrupted Plotina laughing, and knowing how much Acriſius affected to ſpeak) ſtop there, for I hate nothing more than thoſe people who in a great company where every one has right to ſay ſomething, begin to ſpeak with Firſt, and to proceed to Secondly, and Thirdly, and I am ready to dye with fear, leſt they ſhould go on till they come to Fiftiethly. All the company laughing at the manner in which Plotina interrupted Acriſius, he was a little abaſhed; but yet he was conſtrained to bear the railery whether he would or no, for fear of offending Plotina, of whom he was highly enamoured. However, this fair Virgin that ſhe might not give him leiſure to be angry, chang'd the diſcourſe, and beholding all thoſe that had ſpoken, But according as you all ſpeak (ſaid ſhe) it might ſeem an injury to you to accuſe you of being any of thoſe three hundred Conſpirators. To ſave you the trouble of ſearching for ſo great a number of them (ſaid Telanus then) I ſhall aſſure you I believe Mutius was the ſole perſon, and made uſe of that untruth to induce Porſenna to what he deſir'd; for by the way as he came hither, he ſpoke certain things which ſuffer me not to doubt of it at all. If it be ſo ſaid Plotina) I think this unhappy adventure ought to reconcile Herminius to lying. 'Tis ſo far from it (anſwer'd he) that I ſhall hate it the more, for tho I am zealous for my Country, yet I confeſs I ſhould not like to deliver deliver it either by a Lye or an Aſſaſſination; and if I were to chuſe either Horatius's action or that of Mutius, I ſhould not deliberate a moment, notwithſtanding the ſucceſs of the laſt is far more conſiderable than of the former. But that it may not be thought I ſpeak as a Rival or as an envious perſon, I ſhall commend Mutius for the conſtancy wherewith he endur'd the torment of the flames that burnt his hand, and for his courage in attempting a thing in which it is probable he would periſh: but as for the Lye and Aſſaſſination, I confeſs to you, I cannot find any thing in them that does not claſh with my inclination. For according to my judgement, to do an action perfectly Heroical, not onely the motive to it ought to be juſt, but likewiſe the means noble and innocent. Indeed (added Valeria) ſuppoſe an indifferent cauſe in the action of Mutius, he will be the greateſt Criminal of all mankind, and the moſt inconſiderate; and he can not be commended ſaving for a happy raſhneſs. Should you ſpeak this at preſent in the Court of the Capitol (anſwer'd Plotina) the people would look upon you as an Enemy of Rome. Nevertheleſs Valeria has reaſon (reply'd Octavius). But however (ſaid Amilcar) 'tis good there be Heroes of all ſorts, that is, ſuch as are ſcrupulous ſcarce of any thing, raſh and Lyers; for in brief, without Mutius you had had no peace: wherefore I conclude, that the Lye he made uſe of, be put in the rank of thoſe innocent Lies of which we ſpoke ſo much here one day. It will be enough (anſwer'd Herminius to put it in the rank of happy Lies. In truth (ſaid Plotina then) I perceive there are ſcarce any pleaſures how great ſoever, but are mix'd with ſome ſorrow. Peace which is ſo great a good, perhaps will ſhortly cauſe ſeveral diſpleaſures to me: for I apprehend Bereliſa, Clidamira, and Anacreon will ſpeedily go from us: and beſides, I am in great fear leſt the Lot which is to appoint thoſe twenty Virgins of Quality that are to be given in Hoſtage, ſhould cruelly deprive me of all thoſe I love beſt. As Plotina had done ſpeaking, Clelia enter'd, who came to ſeek Valeria there. A little while after Ceſonia brought Clelius into Plotina's chamber, with the ſame old man whom ſhe had ſeen once before, and who was to inform her of her true extraction. Aſſoon as ſhe beheld him, ſhe chang'd colour, out of fear it might be leſs honourable than ſhe imagin'd. But ſhe was not long in this incertainty; for Clelius in the midſt of the company embrac'd her very affectionately, and preſenting her to Horatius, You know, generous Horatius (ſaid he to him) I have treated you as one reſolv'd to give you my daughter at the end of the War, but in the mean time before I make that promiſe good, I muſt give you a ſiſter, who is a perſon unqueſtionably worthy of that Relation. Receive therefore Plotina as a generous brother ought to receive her. But Moreover (added he, turning towards Clelia) I muſt give my daughter as well as Horatius a ſiſter; and therefore (proceeded he, directing his ſpeech to Clelia) embrace Plotina as a perſon united to you by blood: and you, Octavius (added he) do the ſame. The diſcourſe of Clelius ſo amaz'd all the Company, and chiefly Clelia, Horatius, Octavius, and Plotina, that they beheld one another ſilently, without making the civilities to one another which this diſcovery requir'd. But at length Plotina began to ſpeak, and addreſſing to Clelius, It is ſo little advantagious to you, my Lord (ſaid ſhe) to give ſuch a perſon as I am, ſiſter to Clelia, that I doubt not you are my Father, ſince you profeſs it your ſelf: but I confeſs I do not apprehend how I can be ſiſter both to Horatius and Clelia. Since 'tis a thing which muſt become publick (reply'd Clelius) it is not unfit to begin the publiſhing of it before ſuch a Company as this is. For my part (ſaid Horatius) I am ſo impatient to know how it comes that I have the happineſs to be Plotina's Brother, and brother to a daughter of Clelius, and a ſiſter of Clelia, that you cannot more ſenſibly oblige me than by declaring to me what I vehemently deſire to underſtand. Know then (anſwer'd Clelius) that you were ſon of a woman of very great wit and vertue, for whom I had almoſt from my childhood the moſt reſpectful affection that ever was, and whoſe memory is ſtill extreme dear to me. You know ſhe loſt her Huſband during her baniſhment; that I was exil'd as well as ſhe, that I have been ſo thrice in my life by the cruel Tarquin. During this baniſhment I became more charm'd with her conſtancy; and whereas melancholy had rendred her health very infirm, ſhe fear'd to leave you without a careful guardian. Wherefore this conſideration rather than that of the affection I had for her, oblig'd her to marry me ſecretly, as you may know of an ancient Prieſt ſtill living, who is at preſent here amongſt the Salians; for you were not then with her. Our marriage was thought fit to be conceal'd, becauſe if Tarquin had known it, it had been impoſſible for us to hope ever to return to Rome, ſince hating us ſeverally, he would have hated us more if he had underſtood our intereſts were united. During this ſecret Marriage, and whilſt we were at Ardea, Plotina came into the world, and we conceal'd her birth. But eight daies after, her mother and yours dy'd; and this prudent old man whom you ſee, being our intimate Friend, took care of Plotina, whom he cauſ'd for ſome time after to paſs for his own daughter, and that eaſily enough; becauſe having one near of the ſame age that dy'd in the Country, he conceal'd her death, and ſubſtituted Plotina in her ſtead, without my knowing any thing of it, becauſe I continued not long in that place. Your Mother before her death writ a ſcroll with her own hand that ſhe left a daughter, and oblig'd me to deliver that writing to the Grand Veſtal, who dy'd ſome daies ſince, and was her intimate friend, to the end it might remain in her hands as an indubitable teſtimony of the birth of Plotina. Shortly after I was oblig'd to depart from Ardea, and came back to Rome, where for the intereſt of my affairs I married Sulpicia; ſince which, you know I was compell'd to fly and go ſeek a Sanctuary at Carthage. At my departure I writ to that Friend I had at Ardea, but I had no anſwer from him. When I return'd, I inquir'd of him, and was inform'd it was not known what was become of him ſince the War Tarquin made againſt the Tuſcans. I underſtood indeed he left a daughter, but for that it was after my departure that his dy'd, I did not imagine it was mine. Nevertheleſs the Gods have been pleas'd that this prudent old man whom you behold, became firſt a priſoner of War, and afterwards a priſoner of State for a great many years, without being known where he was: and the ſame Gods have permitted that by Aronces's means he underſtood tidings of me, came hither firſt with that Prince, and has at length been ſet at liberty by his procurement, to come and oblige the wife Octavia, who is at this day chief of the Veſtals, to cauſe the writing to be ſought out which was entruſted with her predeceſſor, who at her death intended intended certainly to ſpeak concerning Plotina when ſhe began to declare a thing which ſhe did not finiſh, as all the world knows. Thus there is no doubt but Plotina is your ſiſter; you know your Mothers writing, ſince you cannot but have many things by you written by her hand. The quality and vertue of him that brought up Plotina is not unknown to any, and I conceive you are ſufficiently perſwaded of my honeſty not to doubt of what I ſay. In the mean time I declare to you, I do not intend Plotina ſhould diminiſh any thing of your eſtate, I charge my ſelf with her potion; and this ſage old man before you, deſirous not to ceaſe altogether to be her father, tells me, he gives her all he has. Clelius ſpoke this with an air that took away all ground to doubt of what he ſaid; and moreover Horatius was ſo joyful to find he had a ſiſter that was able to do him good offices with Clelia, that he was wholly diſpos'd to believe himſelf her brother. Plotina was alſo very much ſatiſfied to underſtand ſhe was a Roman, daughter of Clelius, and ſiſter of Octavius and Clelia. Not but that I could have wiſh'd (ſaid ſhe, ſmiling) I had not underſtood this till four daies hence, to the end my name might not be put amongſt thoſe which are to be drawn by Lot to give Hoſtages to Porſenna The caſe is now otherwiſe, daughter (anſwer'd Clelius) and it concerns you it were not; but I hope the Gods will exempt you from that trouble, as well as Clelia, who I ardently wiſh prove not one of the number of the Hoſtages. After this, Octavius made a complement to Plotina, Clelia did the ſame, and, in brief, all congratulated her for the diſcovery. Amilcar in particular us'd a thouſand pleaſant expreſſions to her, whilſt Clelius and the old man of Ardea drawing Horatius aſide, ſhew'd him his Mothers Letter to the Grand Veſtal, and ſo manifeſted the buſineſs to him, that he could not doubt of ſo advantageous a truth. Indeed he did no longer doubt at all, but that now he had cauſe to redouble his hopes. The end of the War was near, he knew Porſenna had not changed his mind concerning Aronces's love; he underſtood Clelius was already his Father-in-law, that he had a ſiſter who was an intimate friend to Clelia, and was ſiſter alſo to that fair Virgin as well as to himſelf. Wherefore he abandon'd his heart to joy, and teſtifi'd it both by his actions and words. As for Clelia tho ſhe had a great affection for Plotina, yet ſhe was inwardly troubled at this adventure; becauſe ſhe perceived Horatius had ſtill more power in the mind of Clelius, and fear'd leſt knowing her ſelf ſiſter to Horatius, ſhe ſhould engage in his intereſt. But that lovely Virgin made not that uſe of her affinity; but on the contrary obſerving part of Clelia's thoughts in her eies, ſhe handſomely ſeparated her from the reſt of the Company, and embracing her with tenderneſs, I beſeech you, my dear ſiſter (ſaid ſhe with a low voice) do not look coldly upon me as a ſiſter of Horatius that intends to undertake his intereſts againſt you; for I declare to you, that by becoming his ſiſter, I do not ceaſe to be Aronces's friend, and that I will not employ the right given me by nature of ſpeaking freely to him, onely to tell him that ſince he cannot be lov'd by you, he ought not to ſeek his own happineſs with the prejudice of yours; and I ingage my ſelf alſo to tell my Father whatever you dare not. And now after this, love me as before, and if poſſible a little more. I had long ſince ſo great an affection for you (anſwer'd Clelia) that it would be hard for me to augment it: but after what you have ſaid, I aſſure you, my dear ſiſter, that if I cannot add to my affection, I will encreaſe my eſteem, and will ſerve you in reference to Sulpicia as ardently as you ſhall me in reſpect of Horatius. As Clelia ended theſe words, Horatius approacht the two fair Virgins, and looking upon Plotina, Well my dear ſiſter (ſaid he to her) will you not aſſiſt me to overcome the obſtinate conſtancy of Clelia? No, brother (anſwer'd ſhe) but to give you the Counſel of a good ſiſter, I will adviſe you to endeavour to overcome your ſelf. She would have proceeded, but Amilcar imagining he ſhould do a pleaſure both to Clelia and Plotina by inſinuating himſelf into the converſation of Horatius, went to them, and ſo did Anacreon; whilſt Clelius was manifeſting to Ceſonia, Bereliſa, and Clidamira the adventure he had related. Plotina not having chang'd her humour with her condition, ſmil'd after having mus'd a little while, and addreſſing to Clelia, I aſſure you (ſaid ſhe to her) I gain an advantage this day above you, which I much fear will be much diſadvantageous to me in Amilcar's opinion: for at the ſame time I know I am your elder ſiſter, as being of the firſt Marriage; I alſo learn that I am at leaſt four or five years older than I thought my looking-glaſs intimated to me, and I almoſt believ'd it, that I was only nineteen years of age; but I conceive by what Clelius has related, I am twenty four. Oh! amiable Plotina (anſwer'd Amilcar) you will never be above ſeventeen to me; for as long as a woman pleaſes me I account her young. And on the contrary, I know ſome Virgins of fifteen years, who ſeem to me above an Age old, becauſe they do not pleaſe me. Moreover, to ſpeak the truth of things, twenty four years are oftentimes the age of perfect beauty, and in which reaſon and beauty may moſt frequently be found together: for uſually when reaſon comes, beauty departs: but at that time they are exactly together. Nevertheleſs, there is no general rule; for ſome women are more beautiful in the midſt of their lives than in the prime of their youth; others too, more fools at the end of their daies than at the beginning of their lives; and there are ſome in whom reaſon is found from their very Childhood. For my part (ſaid Plotina.) I am of this latter ſort, and I do not remember that I ever was without reaſon: for from my tendereſt youth, I knew I ſhould one day be no longer young. I know above a hundred women (ſaid Amilcar) that are not of your mind. You have reaſon (repli'd ſhe) but I wonder all the fair ones do not foreſee the end of their beauty. Yet I know ſome as well as you, that believe they ſhall never be above eighteen as long as they live; altho 'tis eaſie enough to judge time paſſes away very ſwiftly. Methinks, 'tis but a moment ſince I was a child; and if I ſhould conſider the future in the ſame manner as I do the time paſs'd, I ſhould think I ſhould ſoon ceaſe to be young. Believe me, amiable Plotina (ſaid Amilcar) the paſs'd and the future are not alike regarded. But how can that be which you ſay? (demanded Plotina) We ſee things paſs'd clearly (anſwer'd Amilcar) but there is ſo great obſcurity in the future, that the imagination not being able to penetrate into it, deceives it ſelf, and believes that that which it does not ſee, is very remote; ſo that whereas people always love to beguile themſelves to their own advantage, they look upon old age as ſo remote, and flatter themſelves ſo pleaſingly, that they do not fear even the things which muſt undoubtedly happen. That which further has perſwaded me (reply'd Plotina)

me) that I had use of Reason betimes, is, that from my first youth I extremely hated sadness, and lov'd every thing that was capable to please me. That sentiment is so natural (said Clelia) that I conceive you ought not to boast of it, and on the contrary I apprehend it to be the practice of reason oftentimes to accustome ones self to sadness, and to refuse delightful things. If what you say be true (answer'd Plotina) I shall never be wise as long as I live; for I cannot much refuse that which pleases me, nor accustome my self to that which does not. After this Clelius calling Clelia commanded her to go and prepare Sulspicia to receive her Sister, assuring her he had acquainted her with the matter before he came. Then he requested Cesonia that she would please to lead Plotina to his house; and accordingly that amiable Lady accompani'd with Berelisa, Cledamira, and Plotina, and conducted by Clelius, went to Sulspicia's house, where Clelia was arriv'd before. But altho Sulspicia very much respected her husband, and esteemed Plotina infinitely, and altho Clelia had inform'd her of the generous and noble mind of this fair Virgin: yet it was easie to observe that she had a secret regret in the botome of her heart, to see that Clelius had heretofore married a Person whom she hated, and had a daughter by her. Nevertheless she receiv'd very civilly all that Plotina spoke at her arrival at her house, and this interview pass'd as it ought among persons of honour and prudence. Moreover, he that had been instrumental to the owning of Plotina, continu'd also at Clelius's house, who to testifie more favour to Horatius, took Plotina by the hand, and beholding Clelia with authority in his countenance, 'Tis your part now (said he to Plotina) to promote the happiness of your brother, and to induce your sister to obey me willingly when the Peace shall be concluded. After which he left these two fair Virgins, without giving them leave to answer. The next morning the people being assembled confirm'd the Senates Votes with a thousand acclamations: which gave Lucilius and Telanus all the contentment they could desire. The people also would not consent that both of them should return to Porsenna; and therefore it was resolv'd that Lucilius should go to the Camp, and Telanus should stay at Rome to be present at the choice which was to be made of the Hostages by Lot. The multitude, on which the hardship of the Siege had fallen, being impatient to see the passages open, and the Janiculum restor'd into the power of the Romans, according to the conclusion of the Treaty, there was necessity of making haste, for fear of some sedition. Wherefore the Consuls caus'd notice to be given to all women of quality to bring their Daughters to the Temple of Janus. Things standing thus, Horatius being led by his passion, and forgetting what he one day promis'd Clelia, went to visit her Father, and addressing to him, My Lord (said he) I come to make a Proposal to you, which I know indeed contains something that may displease you; but being I act for your interest, and the quiet of my whole life, you ought to pardon me. You know (added he) that you have promis'd Clelia to me at the end of the War; and that lots are to be drawn for the Hostages which Porsenna demands. Now if it pleases fortune to chuse Clelia, she will not be long in your power, since the little Territory which is to be render'd to the King of Hetruria will not be soon restor'd; for besides that such like Articles are never perform'd speedily, Policy also requires, that Porsenna's party be not strengthned till Tarquin be absolutely discarded by him. Therefore, my Lord, to prevent Clelia's going to a place whither you would be sorry she should goe, cause her to change her condition; for if I marry her to day, she will not be to morrow expos'd to the inconvenience of the Lot, since it concerns only Virgins, and wives are exempted from it. I wish with all my heart (answer'd Clelius) I could grant that which you desire; but I cannot do it with honour: for it would clearly appear that I hastned the match on purpose not to expose my daughter to the hazard of being given in Hostages, which were unworthy of a true Roman. But hoping I shall be more happy than to become oblig'd to let her goe into Porsenna's hands, I promise to make her your wife assoon as the Treaty shall be accomplisht. And so let us speak no more of this matter; for I will not be liable to the reproach of intending to effect an especial priviledge to my self to exempt my daughter from a troublesome chance in which all others of her condition are concern'd. In fine, the business was perform'd the very next morning, and some Romane Ladies desirous out of generosity to testifie their willingness to sacrifice all for their Country, brought their daughters tho sick to the Temple of Janus, for fear of being suspected of intending to exempt them from this ceremonie. The generous Racilia led thither the fair Hermilia her niece, whose countenance expresst all the grief she resented for the death of her illustrious brother and her Lover; and her sorrow renewing more in this occasion, appear'd so affecting an object, that it touch'd the hearts of all that beheld her. Indeed she was not the only person that appear'd sad; for the Lot being promiscuously contingent to all, there was none but fear'd it might fall upon her self, and accounted it a hard fate to goe to the Camp. Clelia, for her part, was not a little apprehensive of being under Porsenna's power, Valeria fear'd to be remov'd from Horatius, Plotina to leave Rome, and her Friend, and all in general, to goe alone into the hands of an Enemy Prince. But all these fair Victims being at length ranked in the middle of the Temple of Janus, which was enlightned with a hundred magnificent Lamps, the Grand Vestal came, follow'd with three of her companions to render the ceremony more solemn, and that with such majesty and grace, that she drew the eyes of the whole Assembly upon her. The Consuls plac'd themselves beneath her in this place. But Clelia transcended all the other fair ones in beauty; Valeria, tho less fair, yet did not seem much less amiable; Hermilia, notwithstanding her sadness, wholly gain'd the heart of Octavius; Colatinia also appear'd very fair to all that beheld her, and Plotina with her free, natural, and pleasant aspect and the amiable freshness of her countenance, augmented the love of Amilcar, Telanus, Acrisius, and Damon too, who presently departed. Valeria likewise increased the passion of Herminius, Æmilius, Spurius, and Mutius.

But to be brief, the Priest having taken the names of all the Virgins of Quality, whose number was very great, put them into a large Urne, and having mingled them together, plac'd it at the foot of the Altar: after which offering a Sacrifice only of Incense and Flowers, the Grand Vestal in the name of all the fair Virgins tender'd their acquiescence to the Gods, to the end that all submitting themselves to the Orders of Lot, all might have a share in the merit of the action, and in the Liberty of Rome. Octavia perform'd this with so noble an air, that she excited

the admiration of all the Spectators. This being done, a young childe approaching to the Urne wherein all the names were confusedly mingled, drew forth twenty of them one after another. The first was that of Plotina, who seem'd not to be discover'd for a Romane, but only that she might be presently given in Hostage. The second was of a sister of Flavia; the third of a niece of Spurius, who was very fair; the fourth of Hermilia, who could not hear her self nam'd without tears in her eyes; the fifth, of Valeria, who blusht when she heard her name; the sixth, of a daughter of the second Consul; the seventh, of Colatina; the eighth, of a Cousin of Solomina; and the ninth, of a niece of Clelius. After this ten more were drawn. So that there remaining onely one more to be drawn, it was thought Clelia would have escap'd. But at length the twentieth Ticket being drawn and open'd, Clelia's name was found in it. Clelius was very much troubled at it, but he conceal'd his discontent; which Horatius was not able to doe, but it was apparent enough in his eyes that he was extremely afflicted for Clelia's going to Porsenna's Camp, because he fear'd her vertue would mollifie the King's mind; or if it did not, she would not be well treated. Octavius's heart was mov'd to see Hermilia, so afflicted as she was, go into a Victorious Army which would alwayes bring into her memory the death both of her Brother and her Lover. As for Mutius, he was not very sorry that Valeria was to goe to Porsenna, by whom he hop'd to be protected, tho he had intended an attempt upon his life; but Herminius and Æmilius were so afflicted at it, that their sorrow serv'd to comfort Spurius for that grief he would have resented if he had been ignorant of their affliction. As for Amilcar, perceiving no very great sadness in Plotina's eyes, and being free to see her in Porsenna's Camp as well as at Rome, he thought to himself this change of life would give him a new affection without being oblig'd to change his Mistress. Telanus was very glad of this adventure; but Acrisius, Sicinius, and Damon much afflicted. As for Clelia, she did not certainly know what sentiments she ought to have: by reason of her natural modesty she could not but regret at her going to Porsenna's Camp; but otherwise her interests were so intricate, that she could not well disintangle them. She was not sorry to be remov'd from Horatius, and glad to think she should see Aronces: but she was to leave Sulpicia, and goe into the power of Porsenna, with whom she conceiv'd Tarquin and Sextus were not likely to make a total breach, and who she knew well did not approve the love Aronces had for her. Yet it was a consolation to her to have Valeria, Plotina, and Hermilia for her companions: but for all this, she was very sad as well as the rest of her Friends. All the influence the Publick interest had in the minds of these fair Virgins, only caus'd them to constrain themselves as much as they could, that they might not seem much afflicted for a thing that conduc'd to confirm the peace. Assoon as their names were drawn, crowns of flowers were put upon their heads, and they were oblig'd to thank the Gods for chusing them to establish the liberty of Rome. Moreover, the names of twenty young youths of Quality were drawn by Lots; after which it was resolv'd to send the Hostages assoon as Lucilius was return'd, and Porsenna had confirm'd the Articles of Peace carry'd to him; and every one departed home. Then the fair Virgins prepared for their departure, and receiv'd the Adieus of their Lovers and Friends of both Sexes. Horatius express'd himself to Clelia in the most pathetical words the most violent love could dictate, and the most nice jealousie suggest to him. Mutius spoke to Valeria with more fiercenes's than ordinary, and like a man that thought nothing could be refus'd him after having procur'd peace to Rome. I know well, cruel Valeria (said he to her) that you look upon what I have done for Rome, as if I had done it against you; but perhaps you will change your thoughts during your absence; in the mean time you must permit me to hope that Publicola, who is more sensible of the Publick-good than you, will thank me for what I have done for it, and be unwilling you should render me miserable. If my Father could render you happy (answer'd she) without violating his own word, and forcing my will, without doubt he would doe it; and were it in my power to hinder you from being miserable, I would doe it out of gratitude. But, Mutius, you require a thing absolutely impossible, therefore preserve no ill-grounded hope in your breast; Herminius is the only man in the world that I can love; and if I could cease to be his, I ought then to favour Æmilius, and not you. Ah! cruel Valeria (cry'd Mutius) consider what the Lover you despise is capable of doing, and fear lest he act that against his own Enemies which he has done against the Enemies of Rome. As you pretend to have perform'd a brave action (answer'd she) so there is reason to believe you will not blemish it by an ignoble one; and besides, to tell you freely, threatnings never cause any fear in me. You intend then (added he) that I must dye with despair, and burn eternally without hoping a moment of release in my torments. You can endure the fire so constantly (reply'd she with a little too sharp raillery) that you are less to be pityed than another. But, in brief, Mutius (added she) content your self with the glory you have acquired, doe not blemish it with unjust menaces, addict your self rather to ambition than love, and leave me in quiet. I shall obey you, Madam (said he to her) and if I cannot leave you in quiet as you desire, I shall employ the same hand against my self that has lately given peace to Rome. Since I am alwayes alike equitable (answer'd Valeria) I oppose that which you intend to doe against your self, as I would oppose that which you should offer to attempt against another. No, no, Madam (said he to her) I have nothing to doe with your equity; and when the fancie takes me, I shall know well how to doe my self justice. In this manner Mutius parted from Valeria. Æmilius bid her Adieu like an unhappy Lover that dar'd not hope any thing, Spurius like a man that never despair'd of any thing, but alwayes believ'd what could not be obtain'd by merit or force, might be by subtlety. As for Octavius, his farewell to Hermilia was so respectful a declaration of Love, that this fair Virgin, as sad as she was, could not be offended at it. Sicinius following his own humor, bid Plotina Adieu in two words; Acrisius on the contrary employ'd a thousand in saying almost nothing to her. Damon who knew of the Dialogue Amilcar made while he was sick, spoke to her more against his Rival than of his own passion; and as for Amilcar, he told her he would conduct her to the Camp, and assist Telanus to convoy her. Colatina had no Lover at Rome whom she regretted, and so was not troubled to bid adieu to any but her friends. Berelisa and Clidamira were much afflicted to see all these fair persons depart depart, and so was Anacreon. Indeed Artemidorus's sickness most of all took up their care, they went to visit him very frequently, sometimes with Sulpicia, Berelisa, or Cesonia, but with this advantage to Berelisa, that the Prince notwithstanding his weakness, observed this fair Virgin was more troubled for his wounds than Clidamira. He perceiv'd her more sad and dejected, and beheld in the other more pretence than true sorrow.

Lucilius being at length return'd, and having brought back the confirmation of the Peace, notwithstanding the negotiations of Tarquin and Tullia to break it, preparation was made to send away the Hostages. Accordingly the next morning all the young Youths that were to be given in Hostage, were led to the foot of the Janiculum, and the twenty fair Virgins conducted by their relations were put into the hands of the Consuls, who having caus'd magnificent Chariots to be prepar'd for them, caus'd them to be convey'd by Horatius, Octavius, and Herminius with the Troops that accompani'd them to the foot of the Janiculum. By the way as they went, all the people made a thousand vows for their preservation; and being come to that place, Lucilius and Telanus sent Porsenna's Orders to cause the passages to be quitted, and did the like to those that kept the Janiculum. Whereupon the forces that kept this place began to draw off towards the King of Hetruria's Camp, at the same time that those which follow'd Horatius, Octavius, and Herminius possess'd themselves of the Post which the other abandon'd. Then the twenty Youths and the twenty fair Virgins, being put under the power of Lucilius and Telanus, began to march to a place where the Forces of Porsenna that relinquisht the Janiculum made a halt till these Hostages were arriv'd. Horatius separating himself from the Roman Troops, approacht to the Chariot wherein Clelia was; so did Herminius to that of Valeria, Octavius to that of Hermilia, and the other Lovers that follow'd, to the Chariots wherein the persons they lov'd were. But Amilcar follow'd Lucilius and Telanus, and was alwaies near the Chariot of Clelia, wherein Plotina was. But for that there needed a good time for Porsenna's Forces to break up their Camp, and the Romans to take possession of the Post they deserted, all the Chariots wherein the Virgins were, stay'd in a Meadow at the head of those Troops, who put themselves in Battalia as they descended. In the mean time the fair Virgins discours'd together amongst themselves, or with Amilcar, who sometimes went to one and sometimes to another. They had purpos'd to be negligently enough attir'd, but they were enjoin'd to adorn themselves, to the end they might draw more respect, and be more fitting to be presented to the King of Hetruria, with whom it was not doubted but Galerita and the Princess of the Leontines would be, when they should be presented to him, so that they never seem'd more fair than now. Clelia, Valeria, and Plotina were in the same Chariot; Hermilia and Colatina in another, every one having follow'd their own inclination. Amilcar being near Clelia, Valeria, and Plotina, told them he had a great advantage in being an African at this time; for I may now accompany you throughout (said he) whereas, if I were a Roman, I durst not follow you this day, because the Roman gravity would not permit me to go into the Enemies Camp till matters were compleatly pacifi'd. But since I take special priviledges to my self wherever I am, I go boldly to Porsenna, as if I were an Hostage. In good earnest (answer'd Plotina) you are so more than you imagine; for to speak sincerely, as often as you give your heart to any fair one, 'tis alwaies on condition that she shall restore it to you. Ah! perverse Plotina (cry'd he) if you were as long in Porsenna's hands, as my heart shall be in yours, you would never return to Rome. I assure you, (said she to him) that tho I hope restitution will shortly be made to Porsenna of that little corner of Territory that has been heretofore usurp'd from him, and consequently the Treaty being accomplisht, he will soon remit us back to Rome, yet I would not swear your heart should not go out of my power before I go out of that of Porsenna. But however that be (continued she) 'tis not the thing in Question at present, and only tell me, whether you know a man on Horse-back whom I see coming here, who methinks has a very blockish aspect, and is follow'd by five or six others that appear not much wiser. Clelia and Valeria turning their heads on that side, perciev'd it was the infamous Sextus, who led by his own inclination, which alwaies carri'd him where women were, came insolently from his Quarter to see who they were that Lot had chosen out. For tho Tarquin was much discontented with Porsenna, yet he did not manifest it, and forbore to break wholly with him, hoping alwaies something would happen to disturb the Peace. Assoon as Clelia and Valeria knew Sextus, they gave a great shreek, and turn'd away their eies. But Telanus who was in the head of the Forces, whil'st Lucilius gave Orders in other places, encouraged them a little, judging it was not in Sextus's power to attempt any thing against them. Whereupon they took heart a little, and were contented to salute him with a sullen and cold aspect, which made it apparent that if he had not been sort of the King, they would not have render'd him that civility. On the other side, Sextus who never consider'd any thing besides his own pleasure, judg'd Clelia so fair at this instant, that his old passion reviv'd in his heart for this excellent person. He beheld her with agitation of mind; and approaching to her Chariot with earnestness, he address'd his speech to Amilcar with the same cheerfulness he could have done at the time when he was in Rome. I confess (said he to Amilcar) I was in an error when heretofore I preferr'd brown beauties before the fair, since 'tis certain I never saw nor never shall see any person so beautiful as Clelia. This speech of Sextus minding Clelia and Valeria of the Lamentable death of Lucretia (because it was in maintaining the beauty of that vertuous woman that he had spoken against the fair) they blusht with indignation, and Clelia speaking to him, No, no, my Lord (said she) do not give your self the trouble to commend me, but know there is no surer way to make me displeasing to my self, than to signifie to me that I please you. Therefore, if you believe me, depart from hence; besides (added she) I conceive 'tis no great pleasure to you to see the Janiculum delivered to the Romans. Your aspect, Madam (reply'd Sextus) makes them that behold it, unmindful of their own felicities. But, my Lord (interrupted Amilcar) I know not whether it be not a new unhappiness to you, to see Clelia according to the present posture of affairs; and therefore, I think it would be good you satisfi'd her desire. Go, my Lord, go (interrupted Valeria, who could not contain her self) go hide your crimes in some place so remote from Rome, that you may never there meet a friend of Lucretia. But to what place soever you go, remember there is not a moment wherein a hundred thousand persons do not hate you. I should laugh at their hatred (answer'd he, without being mov'd) were I lov'd but by one person. If you desire to be so by any one (reply'd Valeria) go into some place where you are not known, and where you may change all your inclinations; for if you do not, you will be driven out every where, as you are from Rome: and remember, 'tis the most faithful friend of Lucretia that foretels you this day, you will alwaies be as unfortunate as you are criminal. Since there are pleasures in all places (reply'd he) I make no great reckoning of banishment. Pleasures (said Plotina) are not many to those that are exil'd. Not to such as are covetous and ambitious (answer'd he) but they are to be found every where by those that seek after them, and prefer them above all things. Whilst Sextus was speaking thus, Amilcar made a sign to Telanus of the disgust his presence gave to these fair Virgins; wherefore to deliver them from it, he commanded the Chariots to advance; for just about that time also all the forces of the Janiculum were arriv'd. So Telanus causing the Chariots to be drawn into the midst of them, Sextus was constrain'd to return to his own Quarter. But before he parted from Clelia's Chariot, Know (said he to her with unparallel'd boldness) I lose not the hope to be happy; and having lost Rome for Lucretia, I should be still ready to lose a hundred Kingdomes for you, if I had them. After this, Lucilius coming up to joyn with Telanus, the whole body marcht towards the Quarter of Porsenna. Where when the fair Virgins were arriv'd, Lucilius went to know the King's pleasure concerning presenting them before him. But Porsenna having understood Clelia was amongst them, would not see them, and sent to seek the Prince his son, to the end he might not entertain them, giving order they should be put into tents, serv'd well, and guarded diligently. Nevertheless Aronces who had been advertis'd by Telanus that Clelia was amongst the Hostages, us'd his interest with the Princess of the Leontines to oblige Galerita to come that day to the Camp; and he caus'd such diligent notice to be given him when the Chariots would arrive, that he was precisely at the place were they made a halt, whilst Lucilius went to receive Porsenna's Orders. He was habited this day more splendidly than ordinary, tho in a military attire. His Horse was of a dapple-gray, his Feathers were white, Isabella, black, and sky-colour, he had a scarf of the same colours buckled upon his shoulder with the muzzle of a golden Lyon inrich'd with great Diamonds. The guard of his Sword was of the same; and in short, his garb was so magnificent, that he drew the eyes of all. He was also lookt upon very favourably by Clelia, who made it very apparent that the sight of the person lov'd embellishes, at the first appearance after absence; for assoon as Clelia perceiv'd Aronces, her eyes became more sparkling, her complexion had a fuller tincture of carnation, joy augmented the gracefulness of her mouth, and all the charms of her countenance became thereby the more inevitable. Aronces on his part, could not at that moment reflect on all the consequences that might follow upon this interview, but so gave up himself to joy, that alighting from his Horse, he went directly to Clelia, who descended from her Chariot, together with her Companions; and it hapned to be in a place where she could do it conveniently, for there was a large and thick-spread tree about ten paces from her Chariot. Ah! Madam (said he to her, after having saluted her and those that follow'd her) is it lawful for me to rejoice to see you in a place where I am not Master? yet you would forbid me in vain to do so, for 'tis impossible for me to see you without resenting a pleasure which I am unable to express. That which I have to see you, my Lord (answer'd she) teaches me sufficiently, that the first sentiments of the heart are not in a peoples disposing according as the condition of their fortune requires; for tho I am alwaies very unhappy, yet I am extream joyful that I can also tell you I am alwaies the same, provided you be not changed. Ah! Madam (cry'd Aronces) that which you say is not obliging, and you have too little esteem of me, if you do not repent of it. After this, Clelia told Aronces that Plotina was her sister, and that tho Horatius was her brother, yet was she alwaies his friend: so that there was a very sweet and ingenious conversation among these amiable persons. As they were in it, Lucilius came to bring Porsenna's Orders; but they so strict, that out of friendship he counsel'd the Prince not to oppose them, nor provoke the King. This Order sensibly afflicted Aronces, Clelia, her Companions, and Amilcar, who was come to them; but yet it was necessary to obey it. So Clelia, Valeria, and Plotina re-entered into their Chariot, after Aronces accompani'd by Amilcar had told the admirable person he lov'd, that she ought to fear nothing, and that he would dye rather than be wanting in fidelity to her. Aronces being mounted on Horse-back, and the Chariots beginning to march in order to conduct the fair Virgins to the Tents which were appointed for them, they beheld a Troop of Ladies appear on Horse-back, in very great gallantry, and following a stately Chariot that went very slowly, which was the Queen of Hetruria, and with her Melinthe, and a very fair and amiable person nam'd Herfilia. She that rid in the head of these Ladies was the Princess of the Leontines, her Horse being white with a black star in the forehead; her attire was of a flying stuff, silver and blue, and the shape of it very agreeable and advantageous; she wore hanging at a rich scarf that was fastned with a knot of Diamonds, a little Bow of Ebony garnisht with gold, and a Quiver of the same adorn'd with jewels. Her hair curl'd in half rings was carelessly spread upon her shoulders. So that having upon her head a great Plume of Feathers, the colours of which were pleasing and well suted, and the order irregular (as I may so speak) made an agreeable confusion, this Princess never appear'd more beautiful than she did this day. She was follow'd by Aurelisa, Terentia, and Amielea, and several other Ladies very handsome and gallantly clothed. Assoon as Aronces beheld this fair Troop, he left Clelia and went to meet the Queen of Hetruria and the Princess of the Leontines, to the end to desire their protection of that excellent Virgin. In the mean time the Chariots of the twenty fair Romans, whom Lot had chosen for Hostages, turning to the right hand towards the Tyber, were not so distant but Clelia could discern the magnificent garb of the Princess of the Leontines, and with what a respectful gesture Aronces saluted her; for indeed out of his desire to induce her to protect Clelia, he approacht to her with extraordinary respect. Upon which Clelia having her heart inflam'd with new affection towards Aronces, whom she lately saw, and affected with discontent occasion'd mon'd by the rigorous order of Porſenna, her mind became ſo troubled, that ſhe could not hinder her ſelf from giving ſome ſigns of her inquietude. She chang'd colour ſeveral times, ſhe had her head alwayes turn'd toward the ſide where the Princeſs of the Leontines was, as long as ſhe was in ſight, and moreover ſhe ſigh'd very heavily. But that which compleated her anxiety, was, that putting forth her head; ſhe heard one of thoſe that guarded her, ſaying to another as they beheld Aronces, See, our Prince there is much taken up with his new Miſtreſs. Theſe words were no ſooner underſtood by Clelia, but jealouſie as ſuddenly ſeiz'd upon her heart, as an hour before Love did upon that of Sextus. But whilſt this ſecret trouble was exciting in her breaſt, Plotina and Valeria were reaſoning concerning Porſenna's Order. Nevertheleſs the change hapned in Clelia's fair eyes did not eſcape their obſervation; whereupon Valeria addreſſing to this admirable perſon, Whence ariſes this new ſadneſs? (ſaid ſhe) and what thought has come in your minde? Tho Porſena's Order be ſomething ſevere, yet we are delivered from an unpleaſing ceremony, in that we ſhall not be preſented to him. Therefore ſince I believe he dares not violate the Law of Nations, nor treat you ill, I ſee no cauſe for the exceſſive melancholy that appears in your eyes. For my part (ſaid Plotina) I am of Valeria's mind; and therefore let me intreat you, my dear ſiſter, not to abandon your ſelf to ſadneſs. When the heart is poſſeſs'd with jealouſie (anſwer'd ſhe bluſhing) it is not poſſible but that it ſhould alſo be abandon'd to ſadneſs. But how can you become jealous in ſo ſhort a time? (ſaid Plotina). Clelia ſeeing her ſelf urg'd by her friends, told them what ſhe heard, and what ſhe obſerv'd. But do you not know (ſaid Valeria) Aronces ſuffers it to be believ'd that he is amorous of the Princeſs of the Leontines to the end Porſenna might not propound to him the marriage of the Prince of Ceres daughter? I know it (anſwer'd Clelia) but I know too that the Princeſs of the Leontines, is infinitely charming, that I am unfortunat, and that it is not impoſſible but that Aronces conceiving he cannot marry me, has ſuffer'd his heart to be toucht with the beauty of that Princeſs; for, for my own part, I find that were I a man, I could not chuſe but love her. Ah! my dear ſiſter (cry'd Plotina) you think you ſhould love this Princeſs if you were a man, only becauſe you have at preſent a great diſpoſition not to love her. That is, in brief, the jealouſie which will cauſe you to hate her, makes her appear more lovely than really ſhe is, tho ſhe is ſo in a high degree. But however, you are unjuſt; for after all Aronces has done for you, you ſuſpect him upon too light an occaſion. No, no, (reply'd Valeria) blame not Clelia ſo much; for when a perſon loves ardently and is unfortunate, it is very eaſie for jealouſie to ariſe without cauſe; and certainly only ſuch as know not how to love, are wholly free from jealouſie. Theſe fair Virgins ſpoke many things more to this purpoſe, till they arriv'd at the Tents prepar'd for them, where they were receiv'd with magnificence and reſpect. Lucilius and Telanus caus'd them to be attended with all imaginable care, and omitted nothing that might ſerve to evidence themſelves the moſt honorable perſons in the World. Nevertheleſs at the ſame time, not daring to diſobey Porſenna's Order, they caus'd them to be guarded diligently. This King (imagining there had been ſome deceit in the choice of the Hoſtages, and that Clelia was purpoſely ſent to his Camp out of hope to mollifie him, and to augment Aronces's love by her preſence) was much diſpleas'd about it, both against the Romans and againſt Aronces, whom he ſuſpected to have had ſome influence in the buſineſs. Yet ſeeing him arrive with the Princeſs of the Leontines, he knew not what to think of it. But Galerita and the Princeſs being much ſolicitous to ſerve Aronces, aſſoon as they came to Porſenna's preſence, they declar'd the joy they reſented in ſeeing the peace ſo well advanc'd, and askt him wherefore he did not ſee the Hoſtages. Becauſe (anſwer'd he) the perſon is ſent amongſt them who of all the world undoubtedly hates me moſt. And therefore (added he, looking upon Aronces) I abſolutely forbid you to ſee her, or have any correſpondence with her. My Lord (ſaid the dejected Prince) the order you have given for the guarding of the fair Romans, is ſo ſtrict, that it will be no merit to obey you; but if it be lawfull for me to anſwer ſomething that is contrary to your ſentiments, I ſhall beſeech you to conſider that nothing ought to be more ſacred than the perſons of Hoſtages. I grant it (reply'd Porſenna) and 'tis to that end that I require they be diligently guarded. Aronces judging then that Galerita and the Princeſs of the Leontines would doe him more ſervice if himſelf were not preſent than if he were, he withdrew, and left them in effect the liberty to protect himſelf in protecting Clelia. Yet they durſt not ſpeak to Porſenna concerning that admirable Lady in particular, but only of her and all her Companions in general. At firſt the King of Hetruria would not allow that any perſons ſhould ſee them: but the two Princeſſes ſo earneſtly repreſented to him that that would cauſe an ill rumor in Rome, as if they were kept Priſoners, that he yeilded to their Counſel, being contented only to prohibit the Prince his ſon the liberty of ſeeing them; but he granted the Princeſſes permiſſion to goe and viſit them. In the mean time the Prince Titus who alwayes lov'd Colatina paſſionately, went from Tarquin's Quarter to that of Porſenna, to endeavour to get liberty to ſee her; Sextus who was become violently amorous of Clelia, went thither too with the ſame purpoſe: and the fierce Tullia, whoſe mind was alwayes bent to doe miſchief to ſome or other, and to make all things ſubſervient to her revenge, or ambition, deviſ'd in her mind (ſo fertile in inventions of wickedneſs) what ſhe ſhould doe to hinder the accompliſhment of the peace, or at leaſt to torment Clelia. Tarquin for his part, in the mideſt of his misfortunes had his thoughts imploy'd upon Clelia, and was ſomething pleas'd, to hear Aronces was deny'd liberty to viſit her. The day after the fair Romans came to Porſenna's Camp, the Queen of Hetruria and the Princeſs of the Leontines went to ſee them; but by the way they met with Sextus, and could not hinder him from accompanying them, tho they urg'd him as much as they could to forbear. As for the Prince Titus, he was ſo belov'd by both parties, that they did not ſcruple to take him into this viſit; and the curioſity to ſee theſe twenty fair Romans being almoſt general, the Princeſſes were accompany'd by the generous Melintha, the amiable Herſilia, Amielea, Aureliſa, Terentia, and ſeveral men of Quality. The Roman Ladies having been advertis'd by Lucilius and Telanus of the viſit they were to receive, they adorned themſelves more ſpeedily this day; and Clelia out of a jealous conceit, and to pleaſe the Queen of Hetruria, omitted nothing that conduc'd to make her appear amiable. Only Hermilia was in a negligent dreſs, which teſtifi'd ſhe did not care to please: yet being fair, young, and tall, she did not cease to be very graceful. It may be said, there was never a more glorious sight, than when these twenty fair Virgins went to receive the Queen of Hetruria at the entry of their Tents. For the Lot had so happily chosen them out, that there was not one of them but was extremely handsome and agreeable. Valeria, Clelia, and Platina being in the front of this fair Company, the first as being daughter of the first Consul spoke thus in the name of all her Companions, when she saluted Galerita. Had my Companions and my self had liberty to doe our duty, Madam (said she very gracefully) we should have had the honour to have gone and saluted your Majesty assoon as we saw you arrive in the Camp: But, Madam, since we are not in our own power, no doubt you are so equitable as not to accuse us of being deficient in the respect we owe you. The Queen of Hetruria very civilly receiv'd that which Valeria spoke to her, and also made an answer to it; but it was almost without thinking what she was doing; for the Princess of the Leontines having before caus'd her to take notice of Clelia, she beheld her with so great admiration that she could not refrain from giving advantageous signs of what she thought of her. Assoon as she had done answering Valeria, she turned her self towards the Princess of the Leontines, and speaking to her, Report is injurious to Clelia's beauty (said she) for certainly it transcends all the praises that are publish'd of it, and I believe it can never be sufficiently extoll'd. Galerita had scarce spoke this, but all that accompani'd her, perceiving it was free for them to speak what they thought, commended Clelia so highly, that she blusht at it; whereby modesty imbellishing her more, she confirm'd all the applauses that were given her. After which Galerita, having commended all these fair Virgins in general, separated Clelia from the rest, and talkt with her for some time, whilst the Princess of the Leontines, Melintha Horsilia, and the other Ladies were speaking to Valeria, Platina, and their companions. As for Prince Titus, he entertain'd Colatina, whom he had not seen since his leaving Rome; but Sextus was wholly silent, and only beheld Clelia so attentively, that it was easie to perceive that he had not lov'd the unfortunate Lucretia more ardently. Amilcar, who had follow'd the Queen of Hetruria, joyn'd in the discourse with the Princess of the Leontines and Platina; Telanus did the like; Aurelisa and Torentia admir'd these fair Romans; and Valeria and her companions returning them commendations for those they gave, this first conversation pass'd in reciprocal civilities. But Clelia spoke so handsomely to Galerita, that she was as much charm'd with her wit, as her beauty; yet she would not mention any thing to her concerning Aronces, but assur'd her in general, she would protect her in all things, and omit no opportunity to doe her good offices. After which turning her self towards the other Romane Ladies, the Princess of the Leontines approacht to Clelia, with intention to assure her she would serve her with all her heart, and give her an account of the sentiments Aronces had for her. But Sextus coming to her at the same moment, it was impossible for her to execute her purpose; besides, that Clelia appear'd to her with so cold an aspect, that this did sufficiently amuse her. Nevertheless, soon after she thought Sextus's presence caus'd that coldness of hers, so that hoping to see her often, she was not very earnest to discourse with her apart. On the contrary believing she should doe her a pleasure in taking off Sextus, she pretended to have something to say to this Prince, and accordingly whisper'd a little to him; but presently after, the Queen of Hetruria being retir'd, she could doe no more but tell Clelia, she would see her again speedily. Notwithstanding she spoke this with a very obliging air, yet the secret jealousie this fair Virgin had in her breast caus'd her to answer her with some coldness, tho with sufficient civility. The Queen of Hetruria as she return'd spoke of nothing but the beauty of Clelia, and the charms of her mind. Sextus seem'd so transported with it, that he could not refrain from speaking things which made it apparent he was deeply enamour'd of her; and all that accompani'd Galerita were so taken with her, that they contended who should extol her most. Her companions were also much Commended, and tho fair Ladies love not very much to applaud those that own that advantageous quality, yet Aurelisa, Torentia, and all the rest acknowledg'd nothing could be seen so handsome as Clelia, and that next her, Valeria, Platina, Hermilia, and Colatina were the most charming persons in the world. When Galerita arriv'd at her Tent, she understood that the cruel Tullia was in private conference with Porsenna, and she was told of it by Aronces, who was extremely troubled at it. And so was she too; for she knew well of what dangerous artifices this person was capable. But to comfort him, she talk'd with him so advantageously of Clelia, that it gave him satisfaction in some measure. You have reason, Aronces (said Galerita to him) to prefer Clelia above all the rest of the world; for being noble, vertuous, ingenious, and the greatest beauty that ever liv'd, and having an affection for you, I conceive nothing is to be desir'd for your happiness but the consent of Porsenna. Ah! Madam (cry'd Aronces) that consent is hard to be obtain'd. I confess it (answer'd the Queen) but nevertheless I am perswaded, if the King saw Clelia, it would be more easie to prevail with him; and I purpose to continue some dayes in the Camp, that I may endeavour to bring him to resolve upon it. Aronces thanked Galerita for this design of hers, and afterwards requested the Princess of the Leontines, to assist her in moving Porsenna to see Clelia. As he left the Queen, he saw his Father the King, who seem'd to be sufficiently pensive; he understood by some of the Officers that were faithful to him, that when Tullia departed from Porsenna, he told her, he would keep his word, provided she kept hers; and that this Princess went away with an aspect sufficiently satisfi'd. But the unfortunate Aronces not being able to see Clelia, writ to her in the most passionate manner in the world, and oblig'd Titus, Telanus, and Amilcar to tell her a hundred things every day in his name. At the same time, liberty of intercourse between Rome and the Camp being ratifi'd, excepting for such Romans as had follow'd Tarquin, the Princess of the Leontines went to see the Prince her Brother, who was a little recover'd; and Herminius, Horatius, Octavius, Æmilius, Xenocrates, Anacreon, and many others caus'd themselves to be presented to Porsenna, to the end they might have liberty to visit the twenty fair Virgins that were given as Hostages. By this means the conversation became very delightful both at the Tents of the Queen of Hetruria, the Princess of the Leontines, and those in which the fair fair Romans were. As for Mutius, his mind was so incensed with the last conversation he had with Valeria, that he would not go thither; and he was observ'd to avoid almost all the world, and to be discontented and pensive, tho the glory he had acquir'd ought to have afforded him very great satisfaction. About this time the Prince of Messene found himself reduc'd to extremity; but at his death he caus'd Iberniſtus to be advertis'd that he might go and receive the recompence of his fidelity, and that some daies before he had stopt a man that had order to deliver a Letter to him from the Prince of Syracusa, and another from the Princess Lindamira, which inform'd him that he might return. And accordingly Iberniſtus understanding this agreeable news, and seeing the War ended, hasted himself to depart assoon as the wound in his arm should be cured. The Prince of Messene's death, and the happiness of his Rival, serving then for discourse to all the world, it hapned that Clelia and Plotina observing Zenocrates very melancholy, the latter askt him if he had any particular interest in that adventure. Alass! Madam (answer'd he, sighing) I am concern'd onely with my own miseries, of which both the felicity and misfortunes of others do alike reduce the remembrance in my mind. Yet some troublesome thing must needs have befallen you within this little while (said Clelia) for the bare remembrance of remote unhappinesses does not produce the melancholy which I perceive in your eies. 'Tis easie to appear sad (reply'd Zenocrates) when greater are apprehended to come. But Valeria interrupting this discourse by speaking something apart to Clelia, Plotina continu'd, and so urg'd Zenocrates to tell her the cause of his discontent, that he confest to her he was extremely jealous, but would not discover to her who was the person he lov'd. After which Plotina told Clelia what Zenocrates had confest to her. An hour after the Princess of the Leontines being arriv'd, Clelia heard Amiclea say to Zenocrates, as she pass'd by him, You are to blame, and more than you can imagine. She also observ'd that the Princess of the Leontines blusht as she lookt upon Zenocrates, and that Zenocrates's dejectedness increas'd by beholding the Princess. So that comparing all these circumstances, she conjectur'd that Zenocrates lov'd the Princess, and that Aronces was the cause of his jealousie. Which thought so augmented her own, that she was forc'd to pretend her self a little indispos'd, for fear lest the alteration of her humour should be taken notice of. Nevertheless she had so great curiosity to know perfectly the Adventures of the Princess of the Leontines, that she requested Plotina and Valeria to ingage her to relate them; and these two fair Ladies acted with such address, after Zenocrates was gone, that they prevail'd with her to grant that which Clelia desir'd. That which you request of me (said this charming Princess to them) is harder to grant you than you imagine; but I cannot refuse a thing that is possible, to three such amiable persons as you: moreover, to speak freely, I foresee that within a few daies, that will be known which I have hitherto so carefully conceal'd. However (added she) Amiclea must relate to you what you desire to know; for I confess to you that I should not be able to tell you divers things, the bare remembrance of which makes me blush, tho they be not criminal. Clelia, Valeria, and Plotina, having consented to what she desir'd, she went away, and left Amiclea with these three fair Virgins, who being alone in their Court, beseech'd her to give them a full Relation of all that concern'd the Princess of the Leontines. And thereupon according to the order she had receiv'd from her, she began to speak in this manner.

The HISTORY of the Princess LYSIMENA.

IF you did not know the Princess of the Leontines, I should begin her History with her Elogium, thereby to interess you in her misfortunes; but since you are not ignorant that she is very beautiful and very amiable, that she is a person of extraordinary wit and merit, and that nevertheless her vertue surpasses all her charms; it remains only that I acquaint you with her infelicities, to the end to excite your compassion to her, and to relate her Adventures to you, thereby to encrease your admiration of her. I will not take much pains to describe to you how the Court of Leontium stood when we were there; I shall onely tell you by the way, that there was none more delightful in all Sicily, tho (as you know) there be a great number there, and it be at this day one of the places most fam'd for splendor and politeness in the world. The Country being very handsome and fertile, the air agreeable, and liberty sufficient, it is undoubtedly extreme pleasant living there. But it must be confess'd, that during the first years of the Princess Lysimena's life, the Court of Leontium was more delightful than it can be at this day. For when the principal Persons of a Court have well-temper'd minds, their example renders all their inferiors more civilis'd and vertuous. The late Prince of Leontium was certainly a very accomplisht Prince; and the Princess of Leontium, his wife, was indu'd with all the Qualities that can cause a Person of Honour to be admir'd. Moreover, it may be assur'd that the Princess Lysimena resembles her as much, as Artemidorus does the late Prince, his Father. He that reigns at this day, has unquestionably some Qualities that ought to be commended; for he is indu'd with wit and courage: but he is naturally distrustful, excessively jealous of his Authority, when he need not, and besides has some inclinations to cruelty. But to return to the Princess Lysimena, you shall know, that she from her infancy was very amiable, & that at twelve years old she was the greatest ornament of the Court. It was believ'd at that time, that she had but one Brother; for you must know, Artemidorus at the age of ten years was taken by Pyrates, as the Prince of the Leontium sent him to Greece under the conduct of a wise Governor called Cleanthus, to be brought up there till he should come to the age of eighteen years; after which no tidings had been heard of him. So that when the Prince his Father dy'd, Lysimena remain'd under the Authority of the Prince of Leontium her Brother, who Reigns at this day. Whilst the Princess her mother was alive, she was not without some consolation; besides, being then but sixteen years old, grief more easily wore out of her mind, and she became capable of all the joy that can be found in a splendid Court by a Person that holds the chief rank there in all things, and sees her self as much superior to all about her both in beauty, wit, and Quality. The Princess Lysimena has always had the advantage to be free from one of those defects which are sufficiently common in those of her rank; for she had never any of that intolerable pride, through which such as are possess'd with it, think they do too much honour to those that serve them, when they only take notice of the respect they bear to them; who despise all that are not of a very considerable rank; who are not oblig'd by any thing whatsoever, who will be lov'd without loving again; who scorn gratitude, who will be yielded to in every thing, who understand nothing of liberality, and who have not so much as the art to chuse their own pleasures well. On the contrary, I can assure you she has alwaies very well known how to discern the truth of all things, she has lov'd those that lov'd her person more than such as respected her condition, and has been as diligent to render her self worthy to be lov'd, as if her birth and beauty had afforded her no advantage. And to speak truth, the diligence she has us'd has admirably succeeded. I was some years elder than the Princess; but she attaining to an early prudence, lov'd rather to converse with such as exceeded her in age, than such as were younger: so that my mother being very much belov'd by the late Princess of Leontium, I went frequently to the Palace, where I had the good fortune to be chosen amongst a hundred more amiable Virgins than my self, to be the Princess favourite. At that time a very near Kinsman of the Prince of Syracusa who dwelt at Leontium, became extreme amorous of Lysimena; his name was Meleontus, and he a is person of undoubted courage, wit, and magnificence; but he is naturally distrustful: and tho he be very noble, yet he is so little master of himself when he is in choler that he is at such times capable of many things which he would not have done when his choler is pass'd. Moreover, Meleontus is a very goodly Person, and has a kind of noble boldness in the air of his countenance, which sutes both with his Quality and humour. Being usually a partaker in all the pleasures of the Prince, he had the freedome to see the Princess Lysimena, very often. Whereby it is to be wondred, if seeing a most amiable person every day, he could not hinder himself from loving her. Besides, to speak truth, it was so much the mode to love Lysimena, that it was said at Court, She had not one slave that was not amorous of her. It was discover'd that a Painter, as he drew her Picture, became her Lover; and one of the Gardeners of the Palace, to whom she had spoken very often (because she much delights in flowers) lost his reason through the excess of love he had for her. Moreover, it was for this cause that she was styl'd so as she is at this day; for a certain person saying one day pleasantly, that to distinguish her from the Princess her Mother, who was call'd the Princess of Leontium, she ought to be term'd the Princess of the Leontines, since she reign'd in the hearts of all the Prince her Brothers Subjects; the conceit was taken up, and she came by degrees to be generally styl'd so. Nevertheless, this universal love caus'd her to be hated and envy'd by several beauties: Clidamira who you know, was certainly a little envious at her, but amongst others there was a woman of Quality, that thought her self more beautiful than Lysimena, who proceeded so far to wish her as much mischief as if the Princess had undone her in her fortune, tho she was guilty of no other crime but being as amiable as you see. This woman, who is call'd Amerintha, is indeed very fair, and has no common temper of mind, as you shall know in the sequel of my discourse. Meleontus having been her servant for some time, and afterwards forsaking her to adore Lysimena, she thereupon began to hate the Princess (as I told you) altho she dissembled it as much as she could. In the mean time Meleontus omitted nothing which he judg'd might serve to make his passion known to Lysimena, who had no inclination at all towards him. But because the Prince her Brother did not disapprove this affection, she durst not treat him unkindly: but her particular humor was so averse from all Courtship, that upon all occasions she commended Friendship above Love, maintaining that there is nothing more delightful than to have Friends, and nothing more troublesome than to have Lovers, whether they be lov'd again or no. And accordingly she was very severe to the former, and very gentle at the latter. Zenocrates was at this time at Leontium, where having been very amorous of an amiable Lady nam'd Andromira, his love at length turn'd into friendship. Which, besides, was a friendship without ardour, and not much pleasing; so that he said sometimes laughing, That there is far more pleasure in having a Friend of a Lady that had alwaies been a Friend, than in having one that had been considered as a Mistress, and is no longer lookt upon but as a Friend. Andromira being a little related to me, I frequently reproacht Zenocrates with his change, and this is no unusual subject of our conversation. If you did not know him, I should tell you of the goodliness of his personage, the vivacity of his wit, and all the good qualities he is indu'd with; but it will be sufficient to let you know that he is of a very noble extraction, that he is Originally a Greek, tho he was born at a City call'd Herbesa, which was his Father's, and is not far from Leontium; I shall add further, that he was at that time of great esteem in this Court. That which hapned between him and Andromira being a very rare case, all the world talk'd of it, and Lysimena making advantage of it in reference to her own sentiments, said, it was easie to perceive thereby the expedience of returning to Friendship. For my part (said I to her one day in the presence of Meleontus and Zenocrates) I do not conceive how any one is capable of Friendship towards another that has been lov'd; for if I had once had an affection for a man, I think I could not desist from it without hating him, or at least without having an indifference for him, which could never become Friendship. I am of Amicles's mind (said Meleontus) and I do not think it possible for me ever to be a Friend to my Mistress. For my part (said Lysimena) Friendship is so high in my esteem, that I account it good at all times. But how is it possible (said Meleontus) for Love to become Friendship? What becomes of the desires, impatiencies, melancholies, fears, transports, little and great pleasures, suspitions, hope, jealousie, and all the other passions that are inseparable from Love? In truth (said Zenocrates) I cannot tell you what is become of all these, but I know at present I have the greatest tranquillity of the world in reference to Andromira, and that she cannot give me either great trouble or great pleasure. I behold her without desires or without hopes, I should serve her if it were in my power, I esteem her, I love her, and I visit her also very often: but for the most part, our conversation is but luke-warm, and our Friendship has nothing in it that affords much inquietude or great delight. But did you ever love that person? (said Meleontus). More than you can imagine (answer'd Zenocrates). I can witness (reply'd I) that he has made very amorous Verses upon her, and I have seen him inquieted, jealous, and much solicitous concerning her. But that which I admire

most (said Lysimena) is, that Andromira should be capable of returning to Friendship as well as he. Ah! Madam (said Meleontus) Zenocrates must needs have lov'd but weakly when he was amorous, since he could become a Friend of a Lover; however, I am well assur'd (said he with a lower voice) I finde I shall never have any Friendship for the admirable Lysimena. That which you speak is so disobliging to me (answer'd the Princess) that you deserve I should give you a sharp answer. That which I said is so true and so passionate, Madam (reply'd he) that I cannot believe it possible for you to be so unjust as to hate me for it. After this other Ladies being arriv'd, the discourse was changed. Nevertheless, from that day Meleontus became more confident to speak to Lysimena concerning his Love, altho she always forbid him, and Zenocrates became so intimate a friend to her, that no man in the Court was so high in her favour, nor had so much liberty to see her. For Zenocrates had in a short time got such a reputation of being inconstant, that not fearing he would become her Lover, she was joyful that he was her Friend. We oftentimes reproacht him that he had only the beginnings of love; and he was so expert at raillery thereupon, that it render'd our conversation very delightful. Meleontus's love in the mean time augmented to the highest degree he was capable of, he being a person more inclin'd to this passion than to Friendship. These two persons were often together, and seem'd to be considerably intimate, tho indeed they communicated nothing of importance one to another; for Zenocrates loves not to declare his secrets, and Meleontus is so distrustful, that he car'd not to put confidence in him, especially in what concern'd Lysimena. 'Tis true, he had no great secrets to tell of in this respect, for tho he had the most violent passion for the Princess, that ever was, yet she answer'd it so little, that she afforded him no great matter for secrecie. Nevertheless, he was not discourag'd; for tho the Princess of Leontium did not much approve his pretensions to the Princess her daughter, yet the Prince her Son so upheld him in them, that he was not destitute of hope. In the mean time there were made continual feasts, at which Zenocrates was always present as Lysimena's friend. This Quality was no doubt very advantageous to him and gave him many occasions of conversing with her, which otherwise he could not have had, if his inconstancie had not secur'd him from being apprehended by Lysimena as a man that was amorous of her. So that by degrees she came to have a very dear friendship for Zenocrates; who one the other side lov'd her no doubt as much as he could, and often told her, that he lov'd her more than four of his Mistresses. Thus Lysimena taking much delight in the amity of such an agreeable Friend, and (if I dare say it) in mine, dayly confirm'd her self in the opinion she then had, That Love is less sweet than Friendship. Zenocrates in the mean time was better treated as her Friend, than Meleontus was as her Lover. Andromira was sometimes present in their conversations, and one day the Princess ask'd her, whether Zenocrates were a more agreeable Friend than a Lover. In truth, Madam (answer'd Andromira, smiling) I cannot well resolve your Question; all that I can tell you, is, that when our affection was a little more tender than friendship, we had more pain and more pleasure; but at this day when it has chang'd its nature, we doe not divert our selves much in our familiarity. That answer of Andromira, to Lysimena seem'd to her so remarkable, that being alone the next day in her Closet, she made a description of that person's sentiments, she painted her out to the life, and did me the favour to shew me what she writ upon this subject, which was extremely pleasant. For without pencil or colours, she made so exact a picture of Andromira, that none could but know it. At first the Princess would have conceal'd this Portraiture; but telling Zenocrates of it, and Zenocrates not being able to hide a thing made for the honour of the Princess's wit, told it to the Prince, the Prince to Meleontus, and Meleontus to the whole Court. Upon which, as all the world is full of imitators, good or bad, in a few dayes all the men of the Court became Painters, and all the women made their own Pourtraits, without considering that it is very difficult to speak handsomely of ones self: for if a person set forth his own commendations, he becomes ridiculous and insufferable; if he blame himself justly, he would doe better to amend his faults than publish them; and if he speak neither good nor ill of himself he is sufficiently tedious.

But in brief, a Constellation stronger than Reason put all the World into this vein. The most excusable were such as overcommended themselves, for they delineated themselves according to their self-conceit; and the most faulty were such as made Satyrical Pourtraitures against persons whose goodness and vertue ought to have exempted them from envy. Tho indeed the Authors injur'd themselves, by describing themselves amongst all the worthy persons, and did no hurt to those they intended to injure. Upon this occasion all discourses were only concerning Pourtraitures, every one had some in their Pockets, and the end of the Composers was only to give Copies from one to another. One day, amongst an honourable Company, at the Palace of the Princess of Leontium where Lysimena was at that time, arose a discourse concerning the Portraitures in fashion. For my part (said Meleontus) I like not this ardency of doing that always which others doe, and that because some one person has made a handsome Portrait, therefore all the world should betake themselves to make bad. In truth (added I) I believe there is not a person at Leontium that has a Looking glass, but has made their own picture, excepting my self who could never resolve to speak either good or ill in my own behalf. After this, Lysimena ask'd if there were any new Portraiture, and Zenocrates told her two were made of the same person by no ordinary invention; which the Princess desiring to see, Zenocrates who had them, gave them to her to read, telling her, the first of them seem'd to be made by some Lover or some friend of Amerintha. I easily believe (answer'd Lysimena) it might be made by a Lover, but as for a Friend, I doubt it: for Amerintha loves not to have Friends, and I am perswaded few people have many, against their own wills. After this Lysimena began to read that which follows.

The Portraiture of AMERINTHA.

AMerintha is of a tall and handsome stature, of a good aspect, and has all the lustre of a great Beauty: her eyes are sparkling and sweet, they excite love, fear, and hope all at the same time. They are the fairest azure in the World, and

and her hair is of the most goodly flaxen that ever was seen. She has a little mouth, ruddy and smiling, and a thousand charms in the air of her countenance. Her complexion is clear even to admiration, and she has such an agreeable mind, in which sweetness and confidence, modesty and gallantry, chearfulness and sometimes pensiveness appear together. She is obliging and civil; she speaks well, she has a good grace, she pleases all that see her; and whoever is not in love the first time he sees her, is incapable of ever being so. Her heart is resolute enough to undertake difficult things without scruple, nothing perplexes or astonishes her; she trusts always either to her beauty or to her address. And indeed she has reason to confide in them, since to this hour she has almost always done whatever she desired to do, nothing being able to resist her; and I believe she will perpetually do her own pleasure.

It must be confess'd (said Lysimena, after she had done reading) that Amerintha has all that this Portraiture attributes to her. I acknowledge it (answer'd Meleontus) but she has some things that are not expres'd in it. Nevertheless (added I) there is none but would know her by this description. If it be so (said Zenocrates) you will not judge the other Portrait made of her to be very like. There are Pictures sometimes (answer'd Lysimena) that doe not resemble one another, and yet are very like the persons for whom they were made: but to judge whether this be so, let us see it. After which she began to read the Second.

AMerintha is a Person (you think perhaps I am going to say Wonderful, but it is more just to say) Incomprehensible; and no doubt you will agree with me by that time I have made her Picture. Her beauty is gay, her Complexion pale, her Eyes sufficiently terrible, and her words pass through one of the handsomest mouths in the World. Her Hair is fair, and the air of her whole Person noble enough: but her Hands are not made to catch Hearts, for they are so deform'd, that she always hides them in a corner of a great veil she wears, for fear she should shew them either to her Lovers or herself. Nor are her Arms more handsome; her neck too is sufficiently ill shap'd: and for my part, I confess my imagination perswades me that all which I do not see, more resembles that which displeases me than that which seems agreeable to me. But which is strange, that which is handsome in this Person serves only to injure her; since she does not attract Lovers but to make her self enemies; and it may be said she never causes her self to be lov'd, but the better to render her self hated. For they that do not love her, admire her more than they that do; because as soon as any one has had time enough to know her, he finds that she loves none but her self, that her heart is full of dissimulation, and that she uses a certain false goodness only the better to deceive such as she desires to destroy, that her Wit only serves her to frame intrigues, and to perplex all those she calls friends; that her confidence is seldome employ'd but to performe actions worthy to be repented of; that she does Civilities to none but those from whom she knows she shall receive greater; that she imployes craft in all things, and understands not true Prudence. She is expert enough in disguising truth, tho on some occasions she has been liable to conviction of falshood; she loves liberality in another, and never practises it; she would have it believ'd that she knows how to love, tho she never lov'd any. In the mean time she does many things which nothing but love seems to be able to cause them to do who mit absolutely possesseth. But lastly, the greatest truth that can be said of her, is, that no other Person ever excited so much love and hatred, or attracted so many praises and reproaches: and that which troubles her most of all, is, that all Persons begin with admiration, and alwaies end with contempt.

Ah! Zenocrates (said Lysimena) if there were any stranger here, I would say this does not much resemble Amerintha; but since I conceive none can contradict what is here said of her, I must acknowledge this second Portraiture resembles Amerintha as much as the first; for tho one extols her, and the other blames her, yet both are like her. The first would seem admirably well made to a man that had seen her but eight dayes; and the latter to those that have lov'd her a long time. He that made this Picture (answer'd Zenocrates) calls these Pourtraits, two-fac'd Pourtraits; because in the one he speaks all the good, and in the other all the evil. This malitious invention has no doubt some wit in it (reply'd Lysimena) but for that it may prejudice virtuous persons, I will not commend it. Not but that Amerintha deserves her picture should be made in such manner, that it may please every one; but however, 'tis better to conceal the defects of others, than to discover them, altho it be never so ingeniously done. That which you say, is very generous, Madam (answer'd I) but above all things it behoves not to reproach any person for want of Beauty, or for bad fortune, unless people desire to be accounted malitious or scurrilous; and if it be lawful to speak disadvantageous truths, it ought to be against such as are wicked, back-biters, slanderers, cheaters, envious at others glory; because sometimes well drawing the Character of a bad man, vice may be render'd odious. But withall, these descriptions ought to be general, and not to point at any one in particular, unless it be necessary to make perfidious persons known, for fear they deceive such as are not so. For as in certain places of great Rivers, Marks are set up, to advertise such as pass that way, of Rocks hid under the water, which might occasion Shipwrack; so sometimes dangerous persons may be made known, to the end the virtuous may more easily avoid them. That which you say is extreme reasonable (reply'd Zenocrates) and whereas so many unprofitable Pourtraitures are made, I wish some were compos'd that might be of good use. I would have an envious man painted forth, that so envy might be hated; a detractor, to the end to cause detraction to be detested; a deceiver, that perfidiouſneſs might be render'd odious; and in like manner many other evil qualities. But as for an inconſtant perſon (interrupted Lyſimena ſmiling) you ſay nothing of him. Tho I am perhaps leſs ſuch than I am taken to be (anſwer'd he) yet I ſhall not at preſent offer to ſay I am not ſuch at all; but only, that for the moſt part inconſtant perſons are rather reckon'd amongſt the giddy-brain'd, than the wicked; and for that reaſon I did not think to mention them in this occaſion. But as for Amerintha's two-fac'd Portrait, it was compos'd by one that deſires not to make a ſecret of it; all the Court has ſeen it, and many have ſince attempted the like. Nevertheleſs, the Princeſs ſo openly profeſt her ſelf an Enemy to all that made ſuch kinde of things, that in a very few dayes none dar'd to write in that manner; and this is a great inſtance, that 'tis extremely important for perſons of the principal rank in Courts never to approve of thoſe that wound the reputation of others. And it concerns them ſufficiently; for, by not permitting the glory of their inferiors to be blemiſht, they preſerve their own, and place a Bar between calumny and themſelves. Yet this diſcourſe of Lyſimena did not hinder but that Amerintha underſtanding by Andromira (who told her of it unwittingly) that her Portraiture had been read in the Princeſſes lodgings, was extremely inrag'd at it, and deſign'd to doe her ſome miſchief, tho in truth ſhe had no cauſe to complain of Lyſimena. But diſſimulation being neceſſary to all ſuch as would doe an injury, ſhe made no ſhew of any diſguſt at all; but contrarily ſhe viſited Lyſimena more frequently, ſhe ſought my friendſhip and abſolutely gain'd that of a Virgin who at that time belong'd to the Princeſs of the Leontines. In the mean time Meleontus was infinitly amorous of Lyſimena, and Zenocrates thinking himſelf her friend, was her Lover; tho indeed he ſhortly perceiv'd that he deceiv'd himſelf. As for the Princeſs, ſhe thought nothing of it, and was ſo pleas'd with his friendſhip, that ſhe boaſted of it to all the World. But as one day ſhe was ſpeaking of it to him, he found himſelf ſufficiently perplex'd. For you muſt know, Zenocrates having deſerted all his Miſtreſſes for ſome time before, ſeem'd to have nothing elſe to doe, but to render his devoirs to Lyſimena. Upon which the Princeſs not deſiring that her friendſhip ſhould reſtrain him; told him one day pleaſantly, that ſhe in no manner pretended to ingroſs him; and tho ſhe ſometimes jeſted with him about his inconſtancie, yet ſhe would not hinder him from having ſome of thoſe half Miſtreſſes, who without poſſeſſing his whole heart, might afford him divertiſement, and occaſion him to write pleaſant Letters, and delightful Verſes. Zenocrates bluſht at this ſpeech of Lyſimena, and was much puzzled how to anſwer to it. For according to the thoughts he then had, he lookt upon the permiſſion the Princeſs gave him, as the moſt cruel in the World. Yet he durſt not give her any ſign of his paſſion, of which he ſaw well ſhe had not the leaſt ſuſpition; nor was he willing to ſpeak any thing that altogether oppos'd her Counſel. But anſwering ambiguouſly to that which ſhe ſaid to him, The Friendſhip wherewith you honour me, Madam (ſaid he to her) muſt needs be very weak, ſince inſtead of correcting my faults, you adviſe me to abandon my ſelf to them. You have a hundred times reproacht me for my beginnings of Love, but I ſee now you would have me have three or four Miſtreſſes at once? Is it, Madam (added he) becauſe my frequent converſe is diſtaſteful to you? In no wiſe (anſwer'd ſhe ſmiling) but 'tis only becauſe I have an extreme fear leſt Friendſhip ſhould become faſtidious to you. As Zenocrates was going to reply, Meleontus enter'd; whereupon not being able to hide his diſcompoſedneſs of mind, he withdrew ſufficiently penſive. Meleontus had opportunity ſo ſeldome to ſpeak to the Princeſs apart, that he would not loſe this; and aſſoon as Zenocrates was gone forth, he began to ſpeak to her of his paſſion. I know well Madam (ſaid he to her) that I am going to diſpleaſe you; but I know alſo, that if I do not ſpeak to you of my love, I muſt needs loſe either my life or my reaſon. Not but that I am perſwaded (added he without giving her leiſure to interrupt him) that you know I love you as much as I am able to love. All my looks, my words, and my actions declare it to you; the Prince likewiſe being my Protector, ſpeakes to you to my advantage; and your own merit being favourable to me in this caſe, does not permit you to doubt of my paſſion. Yes, Madam, not ſo much but your looking-glaſs tells you I adore you; but however, I will declare it to your ſelf, at the hazard of ſeeing as much anger in your eyes, as there is love in my heart. I know well, Meleontus (anſwer'd Lyſimena) that the Prince my Brother ſpeaking to me in your favour, and approving your affection for me, I ought not to anſwer you ſharply, and that I cannot be offended at what you tell me, without offending him. Therefore I will anſwer you like a good friend, rather than as an incenſed Miſtreſs. I tell you then, with much ſincerity, I find no diſpoſition in my heart ever to love any perſon; and if I did, it would not be your ſelf. Not but that if the Prince my Brother went about to conſtrain me to marry you, I ſhould be capable to obey him, rather than to make a great noiſe in the world: but Meleontus, you would be more unhappy thereby, and I ſhould be more miſerable too; for, certainly, the love you have for me would ſoon be chang'd into averſion, when you obſerv'd the indifferencie I have for you turn'd into hatred. For, indeed, if after what I have ſaid to you, you ſhould oblige the Prince my Brother to force my will. I ſhould believe I had cauſe to hate you. Ah! Madam (cry'd Meleontus) what you ſay is extreme rigorous to me to hear, and ſufficient to induce me to reſolve to be reveng'd upon you, by marrying you againſt your will. For, altho, Madam, I ſhould be enforc'd to hate you after having marry'd you, yet I ſhould be more happy than I am in loving you without being lov'd, or hoping to be ſo by you. Hatred has its pleaſures as well as Love; there is contempt and revenge in it: whereas when a perſon loves, tho he be ill-treated, nevertheleſs he cannot refrain from adoring the perſon by whom he his ſo receiv'd. But, Madam, let us not proceed to ſuch hard extremities; doe juſtice to my love, ſuffer your ſelf to be prevail'd upon by my conſtancie; and I aſſure you, aſſoon as you reſolve to pity my unhappineſs, you will account me leſs worthy of hatred than you doe, and your ſelf leſs unhappy.

Lyſimena was going to anſwer, when the Prince of Leontium enter'd, who obſerving Meleontus's diſſatisfaction in his countenance, drew the Princeſs aſide, and told her ſo earneſtly, that ſhe would diſoblige him if ſhe did not regard Meleontus as a man deſerving to pretend to marry her, that ſhe was extremely afflicted at it. Nevertheleſs, ſhe ingag'd her ſelf to nothing, and yet did not abſolutely tell the Prince, ſhe was incapable to obey him. In the mean time, the fair and dangerous Amarintha, being incenſed in her mind againſt Lyſimena, both becauſe ſhe had drawn away Meleontus from her, and becauſe ſhe believ'd ſhe had took pleaſure in reading that humorous Portraiture at her chamber, diligently ſet her ſelf to obſerve her. Whereby, having a cunning wit, ſhe came to know that the Princeſs had a very great averſion for Meleontus, and as violent an inclination for Zenocrates. Wherefore imploying both theſe paſſions for her revenge, ſhe endeavour'd to cauſe Meleontus to marry Lyſimena, and to cauſe her ſelf to be lov'd by Zenocrates, onely to the end to hinder the Princeſs from being lov'd by him. And indeed, within a ſhort time her revenge became more eaſie, becauſe the Prince fell in love with her. This induc'd her to give over the deſign of getting Zenocrates for her Lover; and ſhe did all ſhe could to augment the Prince's paſſion, that ſhe might conſequently more eaſily obtain the end ſhe propos'd to her ſelf. And tho ſhe hated Meleontus as well as Lyſimena, yet out of a malicious craft, ſhe acted as if ſhe deſir'd to render him happy, with a ſecret intention to make him miſerable. For being perſwaded Lyſimena hated him, and had a very tender affection for Zenocrates, ſhe well ſaw, that ſhe could do nothing more diſadvantageous either for him or for her, than to oblige the Prince to force Lyſimena to marry Meleontus, tho the paſſion he had in his Soul ſuggeſted to him, that a greater felicity could not befal him. To this purpoſe a great reconciliation was made between Meleontus and Amarintha, who paſs'd mutual promiſes to ſerve one another in all things. Zenocrates all this while was very amorous of Lyſimena, but dar'd not intimate the leaſt ſign of it to her; and having experienc'd that in loving Amerintha his love turn'd into friendſhip, he found that in loving Lyſimena, his friendſhip was become love. As for the Princeſs, ſhe ſtill thought her affection to Zenocrates was only friendſhip; ſo that ſhe imparted all her diſcontents to him as well as to me: by which means he had the ſatisfaction to know that ſhe had a great averſion for his Rival, but the grief too, to underſtand that the Prince highly promoted his intereſts, and to obſerve the intimacy between Meleontus and Amarintha, whom the Prince was paſſionately enamour'd of. Amarintha's purpoſe on the other ſide being onely to torment Meleontus, ſhe told him, ſhe believ'd Zenocrates was in love with Lyſimena, and that Lyſimena took no notice of his boldneſs. But all the Court talks of it (added ſhe maliciouſly) and I doubt not but 'tis very important to advertiſe her of it. Nevertheleſs, becauſe ſhe would receive this intelligence very ill, if I gave it her, I ſhall not meddle with the buſineſs. Amerintha had no ſooner ſpoke this, but Meleontus wonder'd he had not ſuſpected Zenocrates of loving Lyſimena; and as jealouſie takes things alwaies in the extremity, he believ'd at the ſame time that poſſibly Lyſimena was in love with Zenocrates. Which thought taking deep impreſſion in his mind, he reſolv'd to be ſatisfied in the matter, thank'd Amerintha for the information ſhe gave him, tho it render'd him more unhappy. Within a few days after, he went to the Princeſs, finding her alone, I know not, Madam (ſaid he to her) how you will receive a matter which I have to tell you, but I know the reſpect alone I have to your glory, induces me to advertiſe you, that Zenocrates deports himſelf in ſuch a manner, that it is believ'd he is extremely amorous of you, and that you cannot but perceive it. Becauſe you believe jealouſie is an indubitable proof of love (anſwer'd Lyſimena with a cold aſpect) no queſtion you would make a Rival to your ſelf, on purpoſe to have a pretext to act like a jealous Lover. But, Meleontus, have not recourſe to ſuch an extravagant device; for I have but too certain a belief that you love me: but to my unhappineſs, the knowledg I have of your affection cannot produce the like in me; ſince to tell you ſincerely (added ſhe) I have done all I could to love you, but in vain. However, for what concerns Zenocrates, I anſwer you, that he is no more but my friend, and as long as he comports himſelf only as ſuch, I will not be brought to treat him ill as a lover. The Princeſs had ſcarce ended theſe words, but Zenocrates enter'd: aſſoon as he appear'd, Lyſimena bluſh'd; of which Zenocrates not knowing the cauſe, the inquietude it gave him caus'd him to do the like. But he ſoon recover'd himſelf, and adverti's'd Meleontus that the Prince enquir'd for him; ſo that this Favourite was conſtrain'd to leave his Rival with his Miſtreſs. Aſſoon as he was gone, Zenocrates percieving ſome diſcontent in the fair eyes of Lyſimena, conjur'd her to tell him what ſhe had in her mind. In truth, Zenocrates (ſaid ſhe to him) I wiſh you knew, but I think I have not the power to tell you. It muſt be ſome ſtrange thing then (anſwer'd he) and I fear (added this ſecret Lover) 'tis ſome artifice of Amerintha. I do not doubt (reply'd Lyſimena.) But I beſeech you, Madam (ſaid Zenocrates, who is naturally very curious) tell me whether I am concern'd in that which you wiſh I knew. You are as much as my ſelf (anſwer'd Lyſimena). 'Tis then ſome horrid wickedneſs I am accuſed of (reply'd he) if it be, I conjure you, Madam, to believe that I am perfectly innocent. I believe ſo (anſwer'd ſhe) and to teſtifie ſo much to you (proceeded the Princeſs, bluſhing) I will at this inſtant reſolve to acquaint you with what Meelontus has told me. I ſhall be oblig'd to you for it, Madam (reply'd Zenocrates) ſpeak therefore I conjure you, and tell me exactly all that Meleontus ſaid to you againſt me. He told me (anſwer'd Lyſimena, not imagining really that Zenocrates was in love with her) that all the Court believes you have an affection for me, and that I underſtand it without taking it ill. I leave you to judge (added ſhe) whether this be well-pleaſing to me to hear. Ah! Madam (cry'd he) I am unhappy. No, no, Zenocrates (anſwer'd Lyſimena) do not fear that this accident ſhall deprive you of my friendſhip; for tho I am much troubled at the rumour, yet I will not puniſh you for a crime which you have not committed. Alaſs! Madam (repli'd he) you ill interpret my words. For, in brief (added he out of a tranſport of love) that which cauſes me to account my ſelf unhappy, is, that the whole Court knowes I almoſt dye for love of you, and you alone are ignorant of it. Yes, Divine Princeſs (proceeded Zenocrates with the moſt paſſionate looks in the World) I have not power to tell you that I do not love. I acknowledge, that without this occaſion, perhaps I ſhould never have told you that I love you, and I had almoſt reſolv'd to dye without giving you any teſtimonies of my affection; but finding a neceſſity upon me to declare my ſelf exactly, I am too ſincere, Madam, to offer to excuſe my ſelf of a crime, which I eſteem glorious to commit. For in truth, Madam, the ſeemingly inconſtant Zenocrates is the moſt faithful Lover that ever liv'd; and moreover, you might have obſerv'd that for ſome time ago I have chang'd my manner of acting.

But

But Zenocrates (answer'd the Princess much surpriz'd) you do not consider what you speak; for if you perswade me that you are amorous of me, you hazard the losing of my friendship. Should you deprive me of your Friendship, Madam (reply'd he) you would take nothing from me that could render me happy. No, Madam, that friendship as precious as it is, can no longer content me; I am a rash person, and have desires more ambitious. Nevertheless, I promise you to keep them secret for fear of offending you. But is it possible, Zenocrates (interrupted the Princess) that there should be any truth in your words, and that you will force me to banish you? I permit you still to contradict your self (added she) for I have so tender a friendship for you, that I will do all things to preserve it. Were I assur'd to dye at this very moment (answer'd Zenocrates) I could not resolve to contradict the most certain truth in the world. But, Madam, I conjure you by that Friendship wherewith you have honor'd me, have pity upon an unhappy Friend that has lov'd you in spight of himself, that has receiv'd love into his heart under the appearances of friendship; and do not destroy him, for perhaps you would regret him after you had destroy'd him (added he sighing). But Zenocrates (reply'd Lysimena.) what can I do for you in this case without acting against my self? Is it not true, Madam (said he) that if you had not discover'd I lov'd the Princess of Syracusa, or some other person that probably could not render me happy, you would have pity'd me, comforted me, and given me Counsel? I confess it (answer'd Lysimena). Then I beseech you (reply'd he) comfort me, and counsel the unhappy Zenocrates. He desires no more of you, he has really ceas'd being your Friend, to become your Lover; but being thereby more unhappy, does not he deserve your compassion? I know I have told you, your friendship could render me happy no longer; but however, in the deplorable condition I am, become at least my Friend, tho I am no longer yours. I promise you, Madam, to do exactly what ever you please; you shall be Mistress of all my actions, looks, and words. Suffer me therefore to love you as I am able to love you, and love me also as you ——— But what say I? (added he). No, no, Madam, I know not what I would say; and should I have said it, I should have repented of it the next moment. Hate me then, and banish me; for I see but too well, that I can never be happy. No doubt you deserve never to be so (said Lysimena) but the interest of my Honour, requires me not to make any stir in the world, that might be to my disadvantage; therefore, Zenocrates since you desire me to act like a friend still, I counsel you to cure your self, to become inconstant again, and to get a new Mistress to morrow, to whom you may be so diligent a servant as to extinguish the unpleasing rumour Meleontus has told me of. Moreover, I forbid you ever to speak to me of your love, as you tender the enjoying the liberty to see me. But yet once more, Zenocrates, resume your accustomed manner of acting, be a servant to all the Beauties, one after another, till you find your self perfectly cured. Zenocrates endeavour'd at first to oppose this advice of Lysimena; but the Princess becoming angry, and speaking to him with an air that intimated there was no other course to be taken but obedience, he crav'd her pardon for having resisted her, he submitted absolutely to her pleasure, and he engag'd never to speak to her of his passion, to be cur'd of it, and to appear a Lover of some fair one of the Court. And accordingly within a few daies after, Zenocrates accustom'd himself to visit a Kinswoman of Clidamira, who is sufficiently fair. But for that he would not have the Princess suspect him of being become amourous of this Lady, he shortly after deserted her for another, and that other for a third. And thus he seem'd inconstant in the eyes of all the Court, that he might seem constant in those of Lysimena, to whom he sufficiently testifi'd by his looks, that his heart was not chang'd in reference to her, and that his constancy was imputable to her as the cause. In the mean time he suffer'd more than can be imagin'd; for he talk'd eternally of love to women whom he did not affect, and never spoke of it to the person whom alone he could love. When he made Verses, he avoyded putting any thing into them, that might particularly suite to the person for whom he pretended to compose them, because he would have the Princess attribute them all to her self. And indeed he contriv'd them so ingeniously, that without any ones observance he alwaies accommodated them to the Princess, who having such a wit as she has, understood well enough what Zenocrates desir'd she should. But being very prudent too, she took no notice to him of any thing.

In the mean time Amerintha (who made poyson of all occurrences) perceiving she had no longer any ground to tell Meleontus that Zenocrates was amourous of Lysimena, made divers railleries upon her, believing that Zenocrates had given over loving her as well as his other Mistresses. 'Tis true, all the world had so great respect for Lysimena, that her raillerios were ill taken, and serv'd onely to manifest her malice. As for Meleontus, he no longer knew whom to accuse as the cause of Lysimena's aversion, and continued to serve her out with much assiduousness, omitting nothing that might please her. His magnificence was conspicuous in all things, she had more divertisement than she desir'd, and he visited her continually: but being of a violent and unequal temper, he sometimes spoke to her with extraordinary submissiveness, and sometimes imperiously, relying upon the Prince's favour, who still continued his Courtship to Amerintha, tho she was not much more faithful to him than another; for an humoursome woman can never be determin'd to any person, how much soever it concerns her to be so.

But the Princess having honoured me already with a tender affection, made me privy to all that befel her; she declar'd to me her aversion for Meleontus and Zenocrates's love to her self, with the new cause of his inconstancy. About this time Zenocrates finding scarce any Lady in the Court to whom he had not made some professions of devotion, was a little longer servant to a Kinswoman of Amerintha than he had been to all others. Which Lysimena observing, spoke to me one day concerning it, after a manner that evidenc'd to me she had a greater kindness for him than she imagin'd. But before I tell you what she said to me thereupon, I must describe the place to you, where she spoke of it, because 'tis something pertinent to my discourse, and because I naturally love Gardens so well, that I cannot resolve to mention them meerly by the way. Wherefore as I willingly use to make some stay in traversing a Garden, so my mind as readily stays to describe a handsome place when I have occasion to speak something of any such. Know then, that there's a man at Leontium called Adimantus, who is lookt upon as a very happy man. His Lineage is noble; when he was young he was handſome, and well-ſhap'd, dextrous at all things, very prudent in all affairs he takes in hand; at preſent he is of a great age, but has a comely ſtature ſtill, and a very noble and becoming aſpect. He has riches even in abundance, as perfect health as a young man, inclinations to love pleaſures, and wherewith to enjoy them, a Wife handſome and prudent, many good and ingenious children, and amongſt the reſt an elder Son, who is known and eſteem'd by the whole Court. He has likewiſe a Daughter, whom I account handſomer than Amerintha, tho Amerintha is one of the handſomeſt perſons in the world, but with this difference, that ſhe I ſpeak of has as much wiſdome as beauty, and the other yields in vertue almoſt to thoſe that have the leaſt; Moreover, Adimantus is happy too in the Wives of his Children, and I know one of them that has a pretty agreeable and delicate air which renders her infinitely lovely. But Adimantus being a prudent man in his pleaſures, he took care in the beginning of his life to chuſe ſuch as might laſt him till death. To which purpoſe beyond one of the Suburbs of Leontium, he has a garden that is one of the moſt handſome and delightful in the World, and it is made uſe of to walk in by all people of Quality in Leontium, of either Sex; for Adimantus, who is of a magnificent inclination, permits free entrance to all Perſons of Condition. The way that leads to it is plain and not long; there are certain Walks before the Gate, the Architecture of which is not curious, but ſufficiently handſome. The firſt entrance is into a fair Court, which has in the upper end a large Baluſtrade of Iron, beyond which is ſeen a ſpacious and ſtately Garden-Plot, with a goodly fountain in the middle, and beyond that a long Walk, which endeth in a great Arch'd-Porch, where there is a gate made with grates. Through which one may ſee another Walk which reaches to a little Terraſs, from whence is a proſpect of all the Country about, and of part of Leontium at a diſtance. But the better to deſcribe this excellent place, you muſt know, that on the right and left ſides of the Gate that enters into the Court, there are two other grated ones, which open into two Courts ſeparated from the firſt. On each ſide are Pavilions both alike, of handſome ſtructure, the apartments of which are no leſs comely than convenient. The firſt Baluſtrade I ſpoke of, being paſs'd, and two little green plats incloſ'd with ſmall pillars of Marble being croſs'd, upon which are ſeen ſundry Garden-plots with emboſted and carved work, you enter into a ſpatious Plot bordered about with Pyramidal Cypreſſes, and having a fountain in the midſt. Which being paſs'd over into a Walk beyond, there is a concourſe of eight large and very pleaſant Walks, and there is one that lies on the left hand, the whole length of the Garden, which is admirably handſome. But to the end Adimantus might leave more freedome to thoſe that walk there, and have more himſelf; you muſt know, he has ſeveral Walks that are only for his own uſe. Beyond the Grated gate which is at the end of the great Walk, there is the Terraſs I ſpoke of, very pleaſant Vines, and a handſome Orchard. On the other ſide there is alſo another ſpacious Orchard, which is onely for himſelf; there is a particular Garden for Orange-trees, wherein are ſeen the rareſt Flowers and Plants in the World. So that in all ſeaſons, admirable Fruits and Flowers are found in this delicious place: many times there is Muſick there, and almoſt continually good Company. But to come to the place which belongs to my Story, you muſt know, that deſcending from this fair Garden, there is a long walk encloſs'd with quickſets which has two Banquetting-Houſes at the two ends, on the one ſide whereof along the wall, and on the other ſide along the Hedge, are the goodlieſt Fruit-trees that ever were ſeen. The Pavilion that is toward the Terraſs ſerves only for ſhelter from the Sun and the rain, or to repoſe upon the Seats that are in it, as well as in the other two Pavilions that are in the ſame row. But as for that which is on the ſide towards the entrance, 'tis the moſt lovely Cabinet that ever I beheld. For, conceive, Madam, that it is ſquare, made with a round lover roof, pav'd with Marble, having a Baluſtrade round about it, a Fountain ſpurting out in the midſt, which falls into a Baſon of Jaſper; and that the ſide oppoſite to the Gate that opens to the end of the Walk has a great Looking-glaſs which augments the repreſentations, multiplies the Fountain, and cauſes the Walk to be ſeen in what place ſoever one ſtands. So that ſitting in this place, one may muſe very agreeably at the purling noiſe and coolneſs of the water, which alſo makes divers agreeable and diverting Figures when you pleaſe. In this place it was that the Princeſs Lyſimena going to ſit one day, commanded me to follow her, whilſt all the reſt that attended her remain'd in the walk. The Princeſs was ſometimes weary with walking, and at firſt intended only to enter in and ſit down a while in this Cabinet. As for me, I plac'd my ſelf at her feet upon a ſquare ſtone which I found there by chance. She had not long been there, but ſhe began to ſpeak to me concerning Zenocrates, and ask me if I believ'd he was become conſtant, and lov'd Andromira's Kinſwoman in good earneſt. But, Madam (ſaid I to her) you are not ſufficiently conſiderate in ſpeaking as you do; for if Zenocrates were become conſtant, to her you ſpeak of, he muſt neceſſarily be inconſtant to you. Ah! Amicles (anſwer'd ſhe bluſhing) it cannot be call'd inconſtancy when a perſon alters his mind towards one that is not willing to be lov'd. For my part (ſaid I to her ſmiling) I conceive that he that ceaſes to love one that is not willing to be hated, he may alwaies be call'd inconſtant. If your opinion be true (anſwer'd ſhe, bluſhing again) then Zenocrates is really inconſtant; for I confeſs I would not that he ſhould hate me. Then you are willing, Madam (reply'd I) that he ſhould love you; for not to flatter your ſelf, you muſt not think to be eternally lov'd without your conſenting to it, and perhaps not without loving too. But, Amicles (ſaid Lyſimena) the inclination I have for Zenocrates is certainly no more but Friendſhip. For my part, Madam (anſwer'd I ſmiling) I have thought long ſince, that when one has Friendſhip for an agreeable Lover, it wants not much to turn it into Love. For, confeſs the truth, Madam; you would not like that Zenocrates ſhould have a violent paſſion, for any other. I acknowledge it (reply'd the Princeſs)

cess) but tis only because I think a great Friendship cannot consist at the same time in the heart with an ardent Love. But, Madam (said I) that which you say does not well suite with the case of Zenocrates, for you know he is possess'd with Love. Sincerely (answer'd Lysimena, turning away her head a little) I will not name his affection so; and besides, if he continues so diligent a Courtship to Andromira's Kinswoman, I believe in a short time he will have neither Love nor Friendship for any other person, and She will wholly engross his heart. 'Tis no: (added she) that this ought very much to displease me, for I would not have given the least hope to Zenocrates, but out of a humor I am not Mistress of, I could be willing he would alwayes consider me more than all the rest of the World. As the Princess was speaking this, she lift up her head, thinking she heard some noise about the pav'd steps which lie round about the Cabinet. And it happened that she saw Zenocrates leaning upon the Balustrade, who being there when we enter'd into the Cabinet, durst not shew himself, because the Princess immediately began to speak of him. Lysimena perceiving him, made a great shreek, which causing me to look on that side her eyes turn'd, I beheld Zenocrates almost as much surpris'd as Lysimena. Yet he recollected himself in a little space, and descending with extreme diligence, came to cast himself upon his knees before the Princess, before she could resolve what to doe: I beseech you, Madam (said he to her) pardon me a crime which Chance and Love have caus'd me to commit; I would not speak in these terms before Amiclea, If I had not understood from your own mouth and hers, that you have told her something concerning the passion which I have for you, and the indifference which you have towards me. Zenocrates (answer'd Lysimena hastily) you are not indifferent to me, for I had a Friendship for you a quarter of an hour agoe, but at present I find that I am going to hate you horribly. Was there ever any boldness equal to yours (proceeded she) to dare to hear what I speak in secret to Amiclea? Alas! Madam (reply'd Zenocrates) if you knew how it came to pass, you will find that I am innocent. I conceive, Madam (said I to the Princess) no person ought to be condemn'd without being first heard, and therefore you may please to give Zenocrates the hearing. If I thought he could justifie himself (answer'd Lysimena) I would forbid him to speak; but being perswaded, the more he speaks, the more criminal he will appear, I permit him to say what he will. I shall tell you then Madam (said he to her) that I am an unfortunate person. That's not the thing I would have you tell me (interrupted she) but only what you came hither for. I came hither to entertain my self, with thinking upon you, Madam (reply'd Zenocrates) at a time wherein I could not be with you with liberty to entertain you alone. But to think of me (said the Princess) it was not necessary for you to be alone. I acknowledge it, Madam (answer'd he) but having purposed to write something in my Tablets, with intention to cause you to read it, I made choice of the place of greatest solitude; and if you please to see whether I speak true, give your self the trouble to read what I was writing when you came hither. At first the Princess refus'd to read what Zenocrates had written, but at last she took the Tablets, and therein found these words:

Will you never go farther than Friendship, incomparable Lysimena? and those fair eyes which have excited so great Love in me, will they never behold me with compassion? I have promis'd you, Madam, not to speak of Love to you, but I have not promis'd you, not to write to you of it; and indeed tho I had sworn it, the torments which I suffer would dispense with me for my Oaths. Consider therefore seriously, Madam, what you would have become of me, for ——

The Princess blusht as she read what I have repeated to you; after which, beginning to speak, If you think to justifie your self by this (said she to Zenocrates) you are extremely deceiv'd. I pretend only (answer'd he) to prove to you that I came hither for no other reason but to meditate of you. But when you saw me (said she) Why did not you come down? Why did you not go forth? Or at least; why did not you shew your self? When I saw you, Madam (answer'd he) I thought of no more but seeing you; but presently after I heard my self nam'd, and Love making me curious, I hearkn'd what you said concerning me; and after that, respect caus'd me to stay where I was; and the fear to displease you, constrain'd me not to change my place. This, Madam, is the cause of my Crime; nevertheless, I am sufficiently punished for my rash curiosity, for I have heard nothing that I can draw to my advantage. Ha! Zenocrates (reply'd she) you are better pleas'd with me than you signifie, but I am so angry both with my self and you, that I will punish both of us alike; and therefore I resolve to deprive my self of a Friend, and you of a Mistress. Goe, leave Leontium for some time (said she to him) goe to Herbesa, whither your affairs call you; and if it be true that Andromira's Kinswoman has not laid very powerful chains upon you, every place will afford you objects of consolation. Ah! Madam (cry'd he) you are too cruel: No, no, you shall never banish me so easily; and as for the reproaches you make me, I will soon put an end to them; I will never more see the person you speak of; and if it be still your pleasure that I should counterfeit being a Lover to hide the passion I have for you, I promise you never to serve one and the same person above eight dayes, but to appear so inconstant for the future, that your self shall never have reason to doubt of my constancie. Yet Zenocrates could not prevail at all with this discourse, nor make his peace all that day. Lysimena went away without granting him pardon, and we left Zenocrates in that place so pale, sad, and so afflicted, that I was moved with his discontent. And so was Lysimena too as well as I, and more; but she endeavour'd to hide her sentiments from me, and counterfeited pleasantness the rest of the day. Nevertheless, Zenocrates made good his word, he gave over courting Andromira's kinswoman, and seem'd so chang'd, that he was constrain'd to pretend he was sick. But, in fine what cannot the constancie of a deserving person doe, when he knows well how to improve all opportunities fortune presents him with, and the aversion his Mistress has for his Rival? Lysimena at length found that she lov'd Zenocrates more than she thought she did; she permitted him to adore her, and acknowledg'd to him that if her fortune would permit it, she should account her self happy in being able to make him so. Moreover, she had this advantage, that the Princess her Mother favour'd Zenocrates. Yet

after all, she took from him all hope of being happy, and promis'd him only to continue her resistance to the Prince her Brother, when he interceded for Meleontus. After this Zenocrate's life was pleasant enough, for tho he was not permitted to hope, yet he did not cease to doe so. But to the end not to give occasion to Meleontus or Amerintha to trouble their innocent affection, he still seem'd the most inconstant man in the world, and he counterfeited so exquisitely, that the two persons who had such extraordinary subtilety in the discerning the most ingenious artifices, were deceiv'd in this occasion. But that which was remarkable in this Adventure was, that the Princess her self was many times deceiv'd, by believing that Zenocrates was really inconstant. 'Tis true, 'twas easie for him to justifie himself; for he offer'd Lysimena to visite none but her self, to converse with no other, and to renounce all the rest of the world, and all kind of interests and considerations, if she requir'd it. So that notwithstanding the disgust Meleontus's love gave her, Lysimena injoy'd some agreeable moments. The Princess her Mother hated Meleontus and loved Zenocrates. She found in this agreeable Lover, submissiveness, respect, wit, and constancie; and to render all this more sweet, their affection was so secret, that none of the Court imagin'd there was any thing more than a bare friendship between them. Yet oftentimes they had little Quarrels, not only because Lysimena suspected he took delight in being inconstant and counterfeiting too well; but also because Zenocrates, being naturally a little subject to distrust, he had now and then a causeless fear that Lysimena would at length suffer her heart to be touch'd with Meleontus's passion. But however, these small fallings out serving only to invigorate the dearness of their affection, they were not much to be pity'd. Yet the Princess did not tell Zenocrates she lov'd him, but so agreeably suffer'd him to love her, that he told it to himself. As for Meleontus, he made many splendid and costly entertainments; but Zenocrates with less shew made gallantries that more affected Lysimena's heart. I remember one day amongst the rest, Zenocrates bethought himself of a thing sufficiently gallant, which I shall tell you by and by; but first you must know there was at that time a man of Quality of Syracusa at Leontium, a great Friend of the Princess, and that deservedly, being a person of no ordinary merit.

I beseech you, dear Amicles (interrupted Plotina) make us know a man whom you believe worthy to be Lysimena's Friend; for, for my part, I love much to judge of people by their Friends. I am much of Plotina's humor in this (said Valeria) and I know Clelia is so too.

Since 'tis so (said Amicles) it will be easie for me to satisfie you; besides, I must confess to you, it was hard for me to resolve to mention this illustrious friend of Lysimena without commending him. Know then, Theander is a man of Quality, whose Character is so particular, that 'tis not easie to describe it well. He is tall, of a goodly shape and noble Port; his aspect is extreme graceful, and there is a certain air in his whole Person, that denotes part of his nature, and promises with sincerity, and goodness. He has a large rising Nose, his Visage is somewhat long, his Eyes are sufficiently little, but so sweet and smiling, that 'tis easily seen his heart is sensible of pleasures. His action is careless enough; his hair is of a good length; and sometimes he uses so sprightly a silence, that 'tis manifest he hears nothing but what he understands most throughly, and of which many times he is able to speak better than those he hears. And indeed, Theander has a great natural wit, which he has so carefully improv'd, that there are scarce any Sciences in nature he is not capable of. When he is amongst some of the Disciples of the wise Thales, Democritus, Hippocrates, or Phythagoras, he makes it known that he is perfectly skill'd in all the Secrets of Nature, and that Philosophy has nothing conceal'd from him. If he be amongst such as love polite learning, and especially Poetry, he is of so exquisite a judgement, that (as I have heard from intelligent Persons) he understands all the excellencies and all the defects of Homer and Hesiod; and if he should undertake to compose an Heroick Poem, he would doe it according to all the rules that the most accurate Masters have given for such works. He is a curious examiner of all the graces of Poetry, and accurate as to the defects that are found in most Verses; yet his Criticalness is without inhumanity: he excuses small faults in handsome Compositures, and never condemns any thing unjustly. He speaks with facility and exactness, and when he pleases, he writes Letters of a certain pleasing strain, peculiar to himself. Moreover, Theander is grave and something melancholy; but his melancholy is serene, and easily admits of joy. For he loves pleasures and seeks them; but he seeks them without ostentation, he loves to chuse them his own way, and not to divert himself with the multitude. He has a sincere and upright heart, a firm and generous Soul; he looks upon ambition as a passion which he has overcome, and the Victory over which has establisht the quiet of his life. By this means he is free from the cares that possess such as desire to advance their fortunes; he is content with his own, which indeed is sufficiently good, and he enjoys it peaceably in the midst of the tumult of a great Court, where he is not interessed in any thing that might disturb his pleasures. Furthermore, Theander is indued with an heroical Courage, whereof he has given very eminent proofs in several occasions; he hath been seen to break through an Enemy Army, that he might put himself into a Besieged place, and at another time to pass almost alone through an Enemy Country to get to an Army, and be present at some dangerous enterprise. But the Valour of Theander has alwayes been without vanity, and he has more car'd to assure himself of his own heart, than to attract applauses which he values not. His indifference in respect of this kind of glory is so much the more commendable, in that his heart is not otherwise indifferent. For he loves his friends very tenderly and generously, and is much lov'd by them; and that which is very glorious to him, he has a great number of illustrious ones. But besides, Theander has the best temper'd mind in the world, and as he is not capable to regulate his own sentiments by those of others, so he does not oblige others to follow his: By meanes of which candor, he has friends whose Maxims are absolutely contrary to his, with whom nevertheless, he converses with great kindness. His Soul is indu'd with sweetness, equity, tenderness, and humanity. He is much mov'd with worth and vertue; he loves liberty above all things, and places supreme felicity in contentment, Of which never to endanger the loss, he has renounc'd the love of all that is troublesome and painful. He loves handsome Objects in general, but no particular one is able to confine him so far as to render him unhappy; so that love is rather ther a naked delight in his heart, than a paſſion. A young Shepherdeſs pleaſes him with her graceful ſimplicity, more than a Princeſs with exceſſive magnificence. Novelty likewiſe has ſome influence upon him, and variety in certain things, as much delights his Eyes, as it does all the World in the Flowers of a Meadow. He loves alſo to be fully inform'd of certain weakneſſes of which the Wiſeſt are ſometimes capable, and ſometimes he makes to himſelf pleaſures of curioſitie, which are not common to all the World. The famous Rhodopis has had nothing ſo private in her life, but he knows it; and drawing divertiſement out of the follies of others, he his much delighted to underſtand them. As for women, in reference to his Friendſhip, he finds few worthy of it; but when he meets with any one of a prudent and agreeable wit, and of a firm and free heart, he places her in the rank of his Friends; being far from their injuſtice who believe it is impoſſible there ſhould be any woman capable of a rational converſe. Theander was never dazled with Grandeur, and he knows ſo well how to abſtract things from that which is extrinſecal to them, that nothing ever deceives him. He has alſo a facility peculiar to himſelf, for he is often ſeen to walk alone, becauſe he has lent out his Equipage. Yet he does not lend out theſe kind of things out of the thought to be repai'd in the ſame nature, for many times he does it to perſons that are unable to render him the like office. Moreover, he has a little Galliot upon a river that runs at the foot of a houſe of his upon the Bank of Himera, which ſerves his own conveniencie leſs than that of others; for even to ſtrangers that deſire it, he willingly lends it, provided they be fair; and ſo it goes to and fro continually without being almoſt ever imploy'd in his own ſervice. Nor is it material whether ſuch ſtrangers be Perſons of Quality, or no: Beauty is ſufficient in this caſe; and be they but only young, yet the Galliote ſhall not be deny'd them. In a word, Theander is indu'd with vertue advantageous both to himſelf and others, which renders him very acceptable, and is undoubtedly very expedient to the felicity of his life; for being free from all the tumultuouſneſs of the world, and the paſſions, he affects nothing but what ſutes with his own Genius, and conſequently finds himſelf leſs expoſs'd than other men to all the misfortunes of life; becauſe vertue alone ſuffices to render him happy; and never ſeeking any good but ſuch as is attainable, he never imploys his time unprofitably to himſelf. Thus you ſee what a Perſon the illuſtrious Friend of Lyſimena is, who was at Leontium when matters ſtood in the poſture I have related. About that time Lyſimena made a ſhort journy of pleaſure to a houſe belonging to the Father of an intimate Friend of Theander, who is a perſon of no ordinary merit. Amerintha was one of the Company, and ſo was Andromira; Meleontus and Zenocrates took care not to fail to be there, and indeed nothing render'd this appointment leſs agreeable to Lyſimena, than the too good Company. For Amerintha's charms, and Meleontus's merit were ſufficiently troubleſome to her. The place deſign'd to goe to, being wonderfully delightful, afforded no ſmall pleaſure at the firſt arrival. For not to mention the fore-Court which is handſome and ſtately, the Arch'd-walk which is on the right ſide of the entrance, and gives an excellent proſpect over a ſpacious part of the Country, till the light loſes it ſelf; the two large Banquetting-houſes, which are at the Corners of the Court; the Statues which ſtand in nieches in ſeveral places of the front of the building, the Symmetry of which is exact, ſtately, and agreeable; the lofty Cupulo that ariſes out of the middle of it; the magnificence of the Porch, with the number of its Pilaſters and Pillars; the ornaments of the Stairs and ſeveral Appartments; the Cabinet out of which are divers handſome proſpects; nor the excellent Pictures which are ſeen in all places; 'tis ſufficient to tell you, that there is a Hall in this ſtately Houſe, whoſe greatneſs, form, carv'd work, Pictures, and Ornaments aſtoniſh all that enter into it, tho the outſide gave them an expectation of ſeeing nothing but what is excellent. It is no improbable conjecture, that this Hall was built by one of thoſe Kings of Ægypt, who erected the famous Pyramids; and indeed the Structure repreſents no ordinary Magnificence. But this is not the only admirable thing in this place; for there is a Garden which is one of the greateſt that ever was ſeen; it is rais'd after the manner of a Terraſs; in the middle is an admirable fountain; and notwithſtanding the place is very high, and diſcovers a great compaſs of the Country, to the great delectation of the ſight, yet 'tis not perceiv'd that there is a River beyond it, tho it ſerves very much to augment the agreeableneſs of the place. On the other ſide of this Garden is ſeen below, a Meadow and a very large Pond; and the Park being very ſpacious, and the wayes of it unequal, the Proſpects of it are alſo very different; ſo that it is very delightful to goe about it in a Chariot. 'Twas to this place (which is called Erycina, becauſe in its raiſed ſituation it ſomething reſembles the Temple that ſtands upon Mount Eryx) that Lyſimena deſir'd to goe: but Meleontus having been the propoſer of the deſign, was the Perſon that gave a magnificent Collation. Yet it was an unhappy time for him, for Lyſimena was more offended when he did things well, than when he did them ill; ſo that this day her mind was in a very bad temper; for all the ſervice was admirable, the Muſick excellent, and Meleontus's deportment all the day both in actions and words very noble and generous. As they were ſitting in the ſtately Porch (which was cooler than any other place) he acquitted himſelf very handſomely of a diſcourſe, which by reaſon of his own concernment in it was not a little perplexing. For after ſeveral things tranſiently ſpoken of, it came to be ask'd, Whether benefits produc'd Friendſhip, rather than Friendſhip it ſelf, or great deſert without benefits. I aſſure you (ſaid Lyſimena thereupon) that benefits alone produce no great dearneſs in the hearts of moſt people; for uſually the remembrance of benefits wears out of their minds, as grief does out of the hearts of afflicted perſons, from whence, every moment ſteals a part. So that time weakens and diminiſhes gratitude, as well as it does affliction. 'Tis true, Madam, in ingrateful minds (anſwer'd Meleontus) but not in ſuch as are generous, which are alwayes grateful. For my part (reply'd Zenocrates) tho I am not ungrateful, and will never be ſo, yet I conceive that if I received benefits from a Perſon without merit, the friendſhip I ſhould bear him would be more in my will than in my heart. But, if benefits without merit (ſaid Amerintha) cannot produce Friendſhip, doe you think that friendſhip without merit can produce a very tender one? and doe you think that deſert alone without friendſhip and benefits is able to beget a great affection? In truth (ſaid Andromira) if friendſhip be not joyn'd with deſert and benefits, thoſe latter will have no great effect. But how can we doe otherwiſe (ſaid Meleontus) than love thoſe that ſerve us and doe us good upon all occaſions? And how can we but love ſuch too (ſaid Amerintha) as love us very ardently? Many times (anſwer'd Zenocrates) they that are ſo officious, doe it out of Vanity, and not out of any honeſt principle; wherefore, provided we publiſh their good deeds and be ready to return the like in caſe of need, I conceive we may diſpenſe with loving them, and yet not be ingrateful. For friendſhip and gratitude are two different things; and I think we ought to have the latter towards all, from whom we receive benefits, and the former only for thoſe that affect our heart either by their deſerts, or their friendſhip, or by reaſon of our own inclination. But will you love People of no merit (ſaid Amerintha) becauſe they love you? and is it not juſt to love thoſe that doe you ſervices? For my part (ſaid Lyſimena) if I were to love people of little merit, I ſhould think my ſelf more oblig'd to love ſuch as lov'd me, than ſuch as ſerv'd me; but to ſpeak ſincerely, Friendſhip not depending upon our Wills, 'tis in vain to diſpute of a thing that is not in our power; and all that can rationally be ſaid in this caſe, is, That deſert alone produces eſteem only, which is alwayes a great diſpoſition to friendſhip; That benefits ought inſenſibly to ingage the receivers to their intereſts from whom they receive them, and at leaſt beget a kind of gratitude in their minds, the effects whereof reſemble thoſe of friendſhip: but as for friendſhip ſingly without deſert and benefit, I conceive 'tis ſufficient to have a complacencie and pity towards ſuch as bear it; for to ingage to love all people without merit, of whom we may be belov'd, would be injurious to our true friends. All which you ſay is extremely ingenious, Madam (anſwer'd Meleontus) but I know ſervices and merit are of no account with you, unleſs your own inclination ſet a value upon them. So that, Madam, for the obtaining of your love, it is neceſſary to ſeek rather to pleaſe you, than to ſerve you; but the miſchief is, 'tis more difficult to be agreeable to you than to render you ſervice. I acknowledge it (reply'd ſhe riſing up) but I conceive all the world is of the ſame mind, and ſo I am not to be blam'd for it. Meleontus was no doubt dejected as he obſerv'd the aſpect wherewith the Princeſs anſwer'd him; but he diſſembled it, tho his diſcontent was extreme violent. Upon which the Princeſs, notwithſtanding her averſion for him, could not but judge that he acted like an honeſt man; which ſhe being vex'd at, and perceiving Zenocrates took no notice of nor determin'd to be melancholy this day as well as her ſelf, the debonair humor of Zenocrates diſguſted her nice mind; ſo that when he approacht to her in the walk to ſpeak to her apart, ſhe frown'd upon him, and told him he lov'd her ſo little, that he was not diſpleas'd to ſee that Meleontus deportment was extraordinary commendable. I confeſs it, Madam (anſwer'd Zenocrates wholly ſurpris'd) that I did not think of being diſcontented, becauſe the Muſick was good, and the Collation magnificent; but I am ſo at preſent with the commendations which you give my Rival. Ha: Zenocrates (ſaid ſhe to him, as ſhe went from him) I will not thank you for the indignation which I have by force excited in your heart. After this ſhe call'd Amerintha, that ſhe might not be alone with him; ſo that the converſation became general all the reſt of the day, Zenocrates not having opportunity to ſpeak one word in private. Lyſimena, to avoy'd it, propos'd it to conſideration, Whether it is more pleaſing to be very lovely without being much lov'd, than to be much lov'd without being amiable. But after every one had ſpoke their Reaſons, it was concluded, That 'tis better to deſerve to be lov'd and not to be ſo, than to be lov'd without deſert; yet it was granted, that whereas uſually people deſire to be lovely, chiefly that they may belov'd, it is more pleaſure to be lov'd than to be barely lovely; becauſe inſtead of receiving of contentment thereby, the lovely perſon is diſguſted with living amongſt people that underſtand not to doe juſtice to deſert. But at length night approaching, preparation was made to return to Leontium. Which returning was with ſufficient melancholy; Lyſimena was penſive, Meleontus dejected, Zenocrates ſad, Amerintha vexed, and they proceeded in the way after a ſilent manner; when by chance a young Hart coming from amongſt the buſhes, a Greyhound that follow'd one of Meleontus Attendants, gave chaſe to him in the plain. Which unexpected Adventure cauſing the Ladies that were on the ſame ſide to give a great cry, Amerintha would oblige Lyſimena who was on the other, to turn her head to ſee the young Hart running ſwiftly upon the Plain. But the Princeſs was in ſo deep a muſe, that not being willing to break it off, ſhe told Amerintha careleſly, ſhe would not ſee the chaſe unleſs it came on her ſide, without taking the pains to turn her ſelf. She had no ſooner ſpoke this, but the young Heart chancing to ſee people coming towards him in the Plain, turn'd ſhort, and paſſing before the heads of the Horſes of Lyſimena's Chariot, came ſo near her, that it ſeem'd to thoſe that heard what ſhe ſaid juſt before, to happen by ſome inchantment. Lyſimena being agreeably ſurpris'd with this Accident, could not hinder her ſelf from taking pleaſure in beholding this caſual divertiſment. But it laſted not long; for by this time it was grown late, ſo that both the Hart and the Dog were ſoon loſt out of ſight. And in fine, the night ſav'd the Young Harts life, and the Dog returned to his Maſter before we got to Leontium. Zenocrates knowing well enough how to improve all occaſions, remember'd he had ſeen at the Houſe of one of his intimate Friends, a Young tame Hart. Wherefore he went and requeſted it, and having caus'd a ſilver collar to be put about its neck engraven with the Characters of the Princeſs, the next day at noon he ſent it to her with the moſt pleaſant Verſes in the world. He feign'd that the young Hart ſpeaking to Lyſimena, told her ingenious things, which bearing a double ſenſe had reference both to the condition of Zenocrates and his unhappineſs in diſpleaſing the Princeſs that day.

But doe not you remember the Verſes upon the young Hart? (interrupted Plotina). If I had remember'd them (anſwered Amiclea) I would have repeated them; but all I can ſay of them is that they began thus,

I, like a young Actæon follow you,
Happy Diana, with too raſh a view.

And after divers ingenious fancies they concluded thus

But if, for having ſeen your charms, I dye;
No ſighs, no tears ſhall wail my deſtiny.

I am very ſorry I cannot recite more of them to you; but I muſt be contented with telling you, that this gallantry extremely pleas'd Lyſimena; ſhe accepted the Hart with pleaſure, pardon'd Zenocrates, and obligingly anſwer'd the Verſes he had made, in the name of the young Hart, which in a ſhort time became one of her chief divertiſements. For ſhe put it into one of the Gardens of the Palace, where it grew ſo familiar and amiable, that almoſt every one made much of it, to pleaſe Lyſimena. And it was ſo proud of the careſſes made to it, that contrary to the Nature of Stags, it became valiant, and was oftentimes ſeen not only to hold the Dogs at Bay, but to go towards them and force them to fly. A few days after this gallantry, Zenocrates made another; the Princeſs having purpoſed to go very early in the morning to offer Sacrifice in a Temple a good diſtance from Leontium, would not be follow'd by any beſides her own Attendants. Zenocrates not being able to indure that the Princeſs ſhould continue from morning to night without hearing of him, gain'd an intereſt in one of her waiting-women, and gave her three Letters to deliver to her at ſeveral hours of the day. And accordingly there being none but this Virgin and I in her Chariot, aſſoon as we were out of the City, ſhe being of a debonair humour, and well belov'd by the Princeſs, gave her the firſt Letter, telling her ſhe receiv'd it a little before they ſet forth. Being Zenocrates us'd to write to her often, ſhe was not ſurpris'd at this firſt Letter, but took it, and opening it, requir'd me to read it at the ſame time with her; and we found it to contain theſe very words:

ZENOCRATES to LYSIMENA.

IT ſeems Madam, you intend to ſpend a whole day without thinking of thoſe that think of none but you, and you believe you cannot be conſtrain'd to think of them whether you will or no. But you ſhall ſee, before the day be paſt, that they who know how to love, find inventions, which indifferent perſons never think of.

After this Letter was read, Lyſimena imagin'd Zenocrates thought it would be ſufficient to oblige her to think of him all the day; but ſhe was much ſurpris'd four hours after, when ſhe ſaw one of her ſlaves (whom this waiting-woman of the Princeſs had ſo inſtructed) deliver her a ſecond Let from Zenocrates. She open'd it with more haſte than the former, and found that in it which I am going to repeat to you.

ZENOCRATES to LYSIMENA.

PErhaps you believe, Madam, it is but four hours ſince you departed from hence, but I ſwear to you I judge them to be four Ages. For a moment of diſcontent, and that cauſed by abſence, ſeems ſo long to a Lover, that he may be allowed to reckon it for more than a year. In the mean time you account moments but for moments, and hours for hours. But if you imploy'd them in thinking of the conſtancy of the inconſtant Zenocrates, it would be ſomething; but you ſeem to mind nothing but Trees, the Meadows, and the Mountains which you ſee, whilſt I am wholly taken up in thinking of your Charms, your Wit, and my own unhappineſs.

Well, Madam, (ſaid I to Lyſimena) what ſay you to Zenocrates's Gallantry? I ſay (anſwer'd ſhe) that he diverts himſelf at my coſt; for I told him yeſterday, I would not remember him all the day, but would only think of the Sacrifice I went to offer. Nevertheleſs, he endeavours to force me to think of him. After which Lyſimena reprov'd the waiting-woman that was with her; but ſhe did it ſo weakly, that it was apparent ſhe was not much ſorry for being deceiv'd. A little while after we arriv'd at the Temple, the Sacrifice was offer'd, and we went to the Prieſts houſe where the Princeſs was to dine; but before that, an unknown perſon, whom the ſame waiting-woman found in that place, deliver'd a third Letter to Lyſimena, who being now accuſtom'd to receive them, took it ſmilingly, and drawing me aſide. It muſt be confeſt (ſaid ſhe) Zenocrates is not too wiſe. You have more reaſon (anſwer'd I) to ſay Zenocrates is an ingenious perſon and of good invention. After this ſhe open'd the third Letter, which, if I am not miſtaken, was in theſe terms.

ZENOCRATES to LYSIMENA.

PErhaps you think, Madam, you are ſo remote from me, that I cannot trouble you, but know, that ſhould you go to the Worlds end, my love would follow you every where; and in whatever part of the Earth you were, I ſhould deviſe ſome invention to make you know that I am the moſt ardent Lover amongſt mankind.

At leaſt (ſaid the Princeſs after ſhe had read the Letter) Zenocrates is the moſt happy, in's having to do with a perſon that is not offended with his follies. After which we ſpoke very obligingly of him for a quarter of an hour, and laught ſufficiently at this Gallantry, which was ſo much the more ingenious, for that Lyſimena durſt not refuſe the Letters that were preſented to her, for fear of cauſing ſuſpition in her attendants; beſides, their affection being only innocent, there was no reaſon for it. At length we departed from the Temple, and put our ſelves upon the way to Leontium. But when we were gone half way, a man on Horſe-back approaching Lyſimena's Chariot, delivered her a fourth Letter; after which he retir'd, and the Princeſs, having open'd it, found it contain theſe words.

ZENOCRATES to LYSIMENA.

IF you believe abſence to be a remedy of love, you are extremely deceived, Madam; for ſince your departure, methinks I love you more by half. Yet I lov'd you yeſterday more than ever any perſon loved, and I am confident I have ſurpaſſed my ſelf alone, in loving you more than I did. You ſee, Madam, that againſt your will you have been conſtrained to think four times this day upon the unhappy Zenocrates. I beſeech you force him no more to have recourſe to the ſame Artifices; think upon him ſometimes voluntarily, that he may be obliged to you for it; and, if it be poſſible, make a pleaſure to your ſelf of the moſt conſtant and reſpectful paſſion that ever was: for tho I can force you to think upon me, yet I find that I cannot conſtrain you to love me, and that without you I ſhall always be the moſt miſerable perſon in the World.

This fourth Letter being read, Zenocrates attain'd the end he propounded to himself: for as long as the reſt of the way laſted, we talk'd of nothing but him; and when we drew near to Leontium, we beheld him coming forth on purpoſe to meet the Princeſs upon one of the handſomeſt Horſes in the World. But he had time onely to make a reverence and ſpeak four or five words to her; becauſe the Prince and Meleontus returning from hunting, appear'd and came to us. Now obſerve how matters ſtood at this time the Prince of Leontium lov'd Amerintha who out of a deſign of intereſt countenanc'd him; Amerintha was officious to ſerve Meleontus to the uttermoſt of her power for the ſame reaſon, and becauſe ſhe knew it was a way to prejudice Lyſimena. Meleontus lov'd without being lov'd again; Zenocrates appear'd inconſtant, that he might be faithful to Lyſimena; and the Princeſs loving Zenocrates more than ſhe imagin'd, very patiently endur'd the pretenſions of Meleontus, but agreeably cheriſh'd the affection of Zenocrates, tho ſhe did no more than ſuffer her ſelf to be lov'd by him in ſecret. At this time, the Princeſs of Leontium, Lyſimena's Mother, went to ſpend a month at a fair houſe of her own in the Country, whither the Prince went ſometimes to viſit her; but no perſons durſt go thither without him, becauſe ſhe had ſignified ſhe would be there in ſolitude. So that Meleontus and Zenocrates did not ſee Lyſimena, but when the Prince went to viſit the Princeſs his Mother. As for me, I had the happineſs to follow Lyſimena in this little journey, which was very agreeable to me, I had more time to converſe with her than at Leontium; and knowing all the ſecrets of her heart, I was her comforter in her diſcontents. Being ſhe knew Amerintha's vigilant ſubtlety, ſhe prohibited Zenocrates to write to her ſo often as he wiſh'd, for fear any of his Letters might be loſt, and cauſe ſome great unhappineſs to them. Whilſt we were in this retirement, the idleneſs of the Country occaſioning the invention of pleaſures which otherwiſe would not be thought of, the Princeſs one evening reſolv'd to go abroad on Horſe-back, followed onely by two of her waiting-women and my ſelf, into a ſpacious Meadow which has a River on one ſide, and a Wood on the other, and ſhe was attended by no more than four or five Slaves. We were no ſooner come into that place, but we beheld ſix Horſemen iſſuing forth of the Wood, who approach'd towards us, and ſeem'd to have a purpoſe to rob the Princeſs of the Jewel ſhe was adorn'd with this day, or elſe to carry her away; for their grim looks caus'd us to believe they had no good deſign. This ſurpriſing ſight aſtoniſht the Princeſs; for having none but Slaves about her, who being without Arms betook themſelves to their heels, ſhe was in great fear leſt ſome hard Adventure ſhould befal her. But at the ſame inſtant we ſaw appear at another place of the Wood, a man on Horſe-back, young and admirably handſome, follow'd by three others that ſeem'd to be his Attendants; he obſerving the aſpect and action of the Robbers, and the air and equipage of the Princeſs, did not demur a moment what to do, but drawing his ſword couragcouſly, caſt himſelf between Lyſimena and the Thieves. This valiant action no doubt ſurpris'd thoſe that intended to ſet upon us, but it did not cauſe them to fly. For being inrag'd at it, they endeavour'd to encompaſs and kill our ſuccourer; but he taught them to their coſt that his valour was more redoubtable than theirs. At firſt they kill'd one of his followers, but a moment after he kill'd two of theirs, wounded three, and beat them back into the Wood. After which coming to Lyſimena with much civility, he offer'd her to accompany her whither ſhe pleas'd. You may judge with how obliging an air, the Princeſs receiv'd this gallant ſtranger. Whoſoever you are (anſwer'd ſhe) I promiſe you my friendſhip as long as I live; for the ſervice you have done me is ſo conſiderable, that I will not expect till I am oblig'd to grant it to you out of the gratitude I have for your merit. That which you ſay, is ſo obliging (reply'd the valiant Stranger) that I account my ſelf too highly rewarded: yet I aſſure you (added he) I have reaſon to hope you will not repent of what you have promis'd me, when you know me more particularly: and I aſſure you too, you ſhall ſoon know there is no vanity in ſpeaking as I do. After this Lyſimena took the way towards the Caſtle, where the Princeſs of Leontium being inform'd of what had paſs'd, receiv'd the Stranger with very high civilities. Aſſoon as ſhe beheld him, ſhe felt an extraordinary commotion in her heart, and lookt upon him with pleaſure and attention; ſhe imagin'd ſhe had formerly ſeen ſome perſon that reſembled him, and could not contain from ſighing as ſhe conſider'd him: I beſeech you (ſaid ſhe to him) generous Stranger, ſatisfie me whence you came. I come at preſent from Phœnicia, Madam (anſwer'd he). But were you born in that Country? (demanded ſhe) and who taught you ſo well the Language of this? That's a ſecret, Madam (anſwer'd he) which I cannot tell but in private, and I am extremely deſirous to inform you of it. Upon which the Princeſs led him into her Cabinet, whilſt Lyſimena went to her Chamber to recover her ſelf a while from the fright ſhe had been in. Aſſoon as the valiant Stranger was there, beholding her with reſpect. Ah! Madam (ſaid he to her) do you not know the unfortunate Artemidorus, whom you gave life to? I was no doubt but a child when the Pyrates carried me away, but I remember ſo accurately all that I ſaw here, that whatever change time has made in my countenance, methinks 'tis eaſie for you to obſerve that I have the honour to be your Son. Ah! Artemidorus (ſaid ſhe, embracing him) my heart knew you ſooner than my eyes; and this very moment wherein I conſider you better, I behold in your Viſage an indubitable proof of your words. If you doubt of it, Madam (ſaid he to her) I ſhall tell you the very words you us'd to me alone in your Cabinet, when I departed with Cleanthus to go into Greece; Go, my Son (ſaid you to me) go learn in a ſtrange Country, how to make your ſelf eſteem'd in your own, when you return to it; and if it be poſſible, do not come back hither, till you can by your merit obſcure that of the moſt worthy perſons you will find here. If I could give you a more preciſe token of what I am, I conceive I ſhould not have caus'd you to remember that generous command you laid upon me, becauſe I confeſs to my ſhame I have not been able to become ſuch as you commanded me to be. Howſoever, I can aſſure you, 'tis no fault of the wiſe Cleanthus, for he has omitted no induſtry to render me worthy to be your ſon. But where is Cleanthus? (ſaid the Princeſs of Leontium) and in what places have you paſs'd your lives? As for Cleanthus (anſwer'd he) I hope he will be here within a ſhort time; and, as for our adventures, I will relate them to you in few words. You know, Madam, we took ſhip to go into Greece, and no doubt doubt you are not ignorant that we were made captive by Pyrates. But you never heard that they sold us to others, who carried us into Phœnicia. For I that was no uncomely person in my childhood, I was bought to be presented to the Queen of that Country. But as for Cleanthus, he was sold to a Priest of the Temple of Neptune at Tire, who soon observing his wisdome and abilities, propos'd to the King of Phœnicia to place him about the young Princes his sons, who are indeed the most goodly and accomplisht Princes in the World. The eldest reigns with all imaginable glory; and the youngest is the ornament and delight of the Court. At first Cleanthus not daring to discover who I was, pretended I was his son; by which means I being restored to his governance, he had as great care of me as of the young Princes, with whom he was plac'd to teach them several accomplishments. Sometime after, thinking he had given sufficient testimonies of his honesty, and perform'd service enough to obtain what he desir'd, he confided in the King, told him my quality, and requested liberty to bring me back hither. But in this occasion the vertue and worth of Cleanthus were an invincible obstacle to his design; for the King of Phœnicia, judg'd him so necessary for the education of the two young Princes, that tho he doubted not the truth of his words, yet he made semblance that he did, and told him at length that however it were, he would not give him the liberty to depart from his Court till the Princes his sons were of age to need no more instructions. The King of Phœnicia sent the Princes his sons, Cleanthus and me to a very fair house, where we liv'd a long time. Afterwards we return'd to Court, but without any liberty, and liv'd there in that manner till the death of the King of Phœnicia. After which the Prince his son who reigns at this day to reward Cleanthus for the services render'd him, gave him leave to bring me back hither on condition that he would return again to him. To which purpose having given us a vessel to return, we made use of it to go into Greece, to the end to follow your intention that I should see that Country. After which being embarqu'd at Corinth, and our ship joyning with another Merchant ship that was bound for the same place with us, it hapned unfortunately one day, that Cleanthus going one morning into that Ship to visit the Commander of it who was sick, a sudden tempest arising, seperated us in such sort, that we could never come together, or so much as see one another more; but I landed at the Port neerest to this place, where I hope Cleanthus too will in a short time arrive. Artemidorus having done speaking the Princess of Leontium made him a thousand caresses: but after this told him it was requisite to defer making this discovery to the Prince his brother until Cleanthus were arriv'd. For whereas (added she) we have different sentiments in many things, I should be glad that your acknowledgement depended not upon my testimony alone, but that Cleanthus who is reputed for a man of eminent honesty, confirm it. As you please, Madam (answer'd Artemidorus) but I remember so many particular things which my brother said to me during my childhood, that I believe he cannot have forgot them all. Believe me, Artemidorus (reply'd the Princess) do not trust to his memory, and let us wait for Cleanthus. But, Madam (said Artemidorus) if Cleanthus had suffer'd shipwrack, it would have been necessary to have dispens'd with his absence. Were that his misfortune hapned (answer'd she) we might then do all that we can do at this day. After this, Artemidorus desir'd permission of the Princess of Leontium, at least to make himself known to Lysimena; and accordingly without more delay the Princess writ three or four lines in her Tablets, which she gave Artemidorus to deliver to her. Upon which he went to find Lysimena, and beseeching her that he might speak to her without being heard by any other, the Princess withdrew into her Cabinet, where he deliver'd the Tablets to her, in which she found these words.

He that you see, is Artemidorus, who you have so often beheld me lament; love him as a good sister ought to love a brother, and discover this great secret to none.

At first Lysimena knew not whether she ought to believe what she read: but Artemidorus spoke to her after a manner so full of tenderness, that on a sudden suffering her self to be convinc'd, she embrac'd the Prince her brother with all the testimonies of joy and dearness imaginable, and express'd her self with so much the greater passion: because at that instant she look'd upon Artemidorus as a Protector that might oppose the violence the Prince her brother intended to use towards her, to constrain her to marry Meleontus. The door of her Cabinet hapning to be open, a Waiting-woman belonging to the Princess whom Meleontus had corrupted, beheld the caresses she made to Artemidorus, which nevertheless she attributed to the service which she had receiv'd from him. After which Artemidorus forbad his attendants to tell his name to any person, and liv'd as a stranger unknown in the Castle. But Lysimena who did me the honour to keep nothing secret from me, told me what had pass'd and ask'd my counsel whether she should write to Zenocrates concerning it. Because I knew Letters are liable to a thousand accidents, I told her that I counsell'd her not only not to write him word of it, but also judge it prudence not to tell him any thing of it, altho he should come thither with the Prince; and that it were better he knew it not, but with others, for fear least not being able to contain from giving some intimation of it, it might prove prejudicial to the owning of Artemidorus. And the Princess was satisfi'd with my advice. In the mean time, the rumour of the accident that had befallen her, and the succour she receiv'd from a stranger, was soon known to all the world. The Prince of Leontium being a little wounded at his last hunting could not make a visit to the Princess his sister upon this occasion, but out of favour to Meleontus, he sent him to do it: so that Zenocrates had the discontent to see his Rival go to visit Lysimena, without daring to follow him. Artemidorus being an extreme goodly personage, Meleontus no sooner beheld him but he was troubled that Lysimena had had a protector of so admirable an aspect. But this first sentiment made no great impression in him, but soon pass'd out of his mind. For he fell to extol Artemidorus, and thanked him in the name of the Prince and his own, for the assistance he had given the Princess. Artemidorus answer'd to all that Meleontus said to him with so noble and gallant an air, that this Lover of Lysimena was astonish'd at it: but he was more so, when having discours'd half a quarter of an hour in a walk of the Garden with the Waiting-woman whom he had gain'd to his interests, he understood by her that since the four days this stranger was in the Castle, he had almost continually have been in particular converse with Lysimena, or with me: she related to him also how she saw the Princess imbrace him with tenderness; and told him she had never seen so great an affection in any person; that as soon as the Princess awaken'd, she sent to know of the stranger's health, that he saw her dress her self, and was in her Chamber till she was ready to go into bed. And indeed, tho I was opinion that it was requisite to use greater dissimulation, yet Lysimena would not believe me, being secure, in that there was none but her own attendants, and those of the Princess of Leontium in the Castle. This discourse produc'd strange sentiments in Meleontus's mind, who knew not what to think of it. However he resolv'd to remove this stranger from Lysimena, and to propound it to the Princess of Leontium to conduct him to the Prince, but she told him she would do it her self when she return'd to Leontium, and that in the mean time, the stranger would expect the arrival of his Attendants and equipage in the Castle. Meleontus press'd her for some time; but perceiving it was to no purpose, he ceas'd his importunity, and return'd back with a great disposition to be jealous. At his return he open'd his heart to Amerintha, who promis'd him to come to us, and to observe all Lysimena's actions so diligently, and those of the stranger too, that she doubted not but to discover the truth. And accordingly Amerintha came to visit the Princess of Leontium upon pretext of the adventure lately befallen Lysimena: but for that some time was needful for attaining the real end she came for, she feign'd her self sick as soon as she arriv'd and stay'd four days with us. During which, having a cunning and malicious wit, she observ'd there was a great friendship between Artemidorus and Lysimena. She perceiv'd their familiarity, correspondence, and something more liberty and equality between them, than ought to be between a stranger and a Princess. Nevertheless Artemidorus very much pleas'd her, and out of a desire that nothing should escape her beauty, she did her utmost to excite him to love: but the heart of Artemidorus was not dispos'd to be wounded by her fair eyes. Besides, this Prince having understood by Lysimena that the Prince of Leontium was extremely amorous of Amerintha, he was careful to defend himself from her charms. Wherefore Amerintha, finding her allurements had not the effect she desired, imagin'd the reason of it to be because he was already amorous of Lysimena. Which exasperating her mind, she observ'd the Princess with more diligence, she put an ill construction upon all that she saw, she believ'd she beheld more than she did; and resolv'd also to report many things which she was sure she had not seen. So that at her return she told Meleontus, she found that the stranger was a very handsome and goodly personage, and was in love with Lysimena; adding moreover that she much fear'd Lysimena was so likewise with him. She related to him that she had discover'd that they were very frequently in private together, that in the morning he had liberty to enter into her Chamber, that he was there very late in the evening, that they understood one another by their looks, that they had a hundred little secrets to communicate between themselves; and she added of her own inventing, that walking in the Garden with them, at the turning of a palisade, she saw the stranger kiss Lysimena's hand, without her being offended at it. You may judge what effect this relation had in the heart of Meleontus. It was such, that jealousie seising upon his mind, and his violent nature being very prone to put him upon attempting the most important things precipitantly, he oblig'd Amerintha to inform the Prince of all that she had told to himself, promising her to do thence forward all that lay in his power to bring her to be Princess of Leontium. Amerintha (who was possess'd with ambition, envy and hatred) easily suffer'd her self to be perswaded, and related to the Prince of Leontium all that she had said to his favourite: which he no sooner heard, but he conceiv'd a violent indignation against Lysimena, and without considering upon the matter resolv'd to go speedily to the Castle where his Mother was, to the end to cause the stranger to remove from thence. And accordingly having consulted with Meleontus, they set forth about break of day, the Prince being then absolutely cur'd. He took only his guards with him and eight or nine men of quality, amongst whom Zenocrates was one, who was not without some inquietude in his breast, for the comely person, wit and valour of the Stranger was highly extoll'd in the Court at that time. But as chance does very extraordinary things when Fate has determin'd to bring some surprising accident to pass; it hapned that the Princess of Leontium was gone that morning to offer a Sacrifice to Diana in a Temple about five or six miles distant from the Castle: Lysimena hapning to be a little indispos'd in the preceding night, did not accompany her, no more did Artemidorus, and I likewise remain'd at home to bear Lysimena company. But almost all the rest of the family follow'd the Princess, and there was very few persons left in the house. As soon as Lysimena was out of bed, her Woman began to attire her head; but the tresses of her hair were scarce undone, when Artemidorus enter'd into her Chamber to shew her a Letter from the wise Cleanthus which he had newly receiv'd, whereby he understood that he would arrive suddenly, and perhaps that very day. The Princess being unwilling to read it before her Woman, she did not continue to dress her head, but went into her Cabinet with Artemidorus. And there passing insensibly to speak of several things, the Princess forgot she was not attir'd, and stay'd discoursing a long time with the Prince her brother. During which, that Waiting-woman who had intelligence with Meleontus, left her companions to wait till the Princess came out of her Cabinet, and went to walk beyond the first Court of the Castle, where there is one of the fairest Walks, that ever was seen. As for me, I was than in my Chamber leaning upon a window that lookt towards one of the handsomest Courts in the World; for 'tis large, square, all pav'd with white Marble, environ'd with stately structures, and has a Pedestal in the middle, upon which are represented the three Graces, holding one another by the hand like Shepherdesses dancing; but made with such exquisite art, that these three Statues are an admirable spectacle in the midst of that fair Court. Having mus'd a while at my Chamber window, as I told you, I retir'd from it, and betook my self to read. In the mean time the Waiting-woman, whom (as I mention'd to you) went to walk beyond this stately Court, was no sooner there but she saw the Prince and Meleontus arrive, the latter of which came directly to her to enquire what the Princess was doing, and to hinder her from going to advertise her of the Prince's coming. The Woman telling him the truth, inform'd him that the Princess of Leontium was gone abroad in the morning, and that the Princess Lysimena, who would not not accompany her, as ſoon as ſhe was out of bed, went with her head half dreſs'd into her Cabinet with Artemidorus, where ſhe believ'd they were ſtill in great familiarity and conference. Meleontus no ſooner heard this, but returning to the Prince and telling him what he had learnt, and animating him againſt his Siſter, without conſidering what hurley-burly he was going to cauſe, or what the conſequences of the courſe he took would be, he commanded his Guards to ſecure all the Gates of the firſt Court. After which the Prince of Leontium enter'd into that ſtately Court, and went directly to the ſtone ſtairs leading into the Caſtle. But for that this could not be done without ſome noiſe, the Princeſs being advertis'd of his arrival, ſpoke to Artemidorus to go forth of her Chamber and meet the Prince, to whom Meleontus (who had ſeen him before) might preſent him. For ſince Clearchus is to arrive ſuddenly (ſaid ſhe) it is not yet fitting to think of making your ſelf known, eſpecially too, the Princeſs my Mother being abſent. Accordingly Artemidorus paſſing through an Anti-chamber went into the Court; but the Prince conjecturing by the place he came out at that the Princeſſe's Waiting-woman had not ly'd, and himſelf having ſeen at the windows of her Cabinet (for Lyſimena's apartment was next the ground) with what haſte ſhe caus'd this man of good perſonage to come forth, he did not doubt but ſhe was very culpable, and that the affection ſhe had for him was criminal. Upon which, without conſidering any thing but his deſire to puniſh the Princeſs and ſatisfie Meleontus; as ſoon as Artemidorus was in the Court, he look'd upon the violent Meleontus, who tranſported with choler, jealouſie and fury, My Lord (ſaid he to the Prince) permit me to puniſh the boldneſs of this Stranger who comes inſolently to affront you. If you knew me well (anſwer'd Artemidorus without being mov'd) you would find it rather belong'd to me to deſire juſtice of the Prince for your inſolence. Whereupon the Prince of Leontium becoming ſuddenly enrag'd, and believing the Stranger intended to counterfeit himſelf a man of quality, that he might ſave his life, roughly commanded his Guards to ſeiſe upon him. After which he went towards the entrance, follow'd by Meleontus, Zenocrates and many others. Artemidorus deſir'd to ſpeak to him, but he was not heard: ſo that ſeeing ſeveral of the Princes Guards with their ſwords drawn about him, he was no longer maſter of his indignation, and could not contain from drawing his ſword, and diſperſing them ſo dextrouſly, that one of the Guards running himſelf upon Artemidorus's ſword, fell down dead immediately. The reſt thereupon making a great cry, and all preſſing hard upon him, he recover'd the Pedeſtal upon which the three Graces ſtood, to the end he might not be ſurrounded or aſſaulted on any ſide but before. The Guards made a great cry again, which cauſing me to give over my reading, I look't out at the window and beheld the moſt ſad ſpectacle in the world, for the pavement of white Marble was ſprinkl'd with bloud in many places, Artemidorus had ſlain two more of the Guards, whoſe bodies lay at the feet of this valiant Prince, who defended himſelf like a Lyon. Preſently after, all the Guards that were left at the Gates, quitted their ſtations to come and revenge the death of their companions. Meleontus, Zenocrates and all the reſt, and the Prince himſelf return'd back to the ſtairs of the enterance, aſtoniſh'd at the valour of this man who defended himſelf ſo couragiouſly, and immediately ſlew a Brother of Meleontus that advanc'd againſt him. Yet it muſt be mention'd to the commendation of Zenocrates, that tho jealouſie was deeply impreſt in his mind, yet he extremely diſapprov'd this violence, and told his ſentiments to the Prince: but he would not hearken to them. All this while whatever Artemidorus, ſaid to make himſelf known, was not regarded; he had no other recourſe but to his own valor: which indeed was ſuch, that none durſt approach him; wherefore ſome of the Guards without the Prince's order ſhot arrows againſt him, and others caſt javelins, tho the Prince and Zenocrates endeavour'd to reſtrain them. As for Meleontus, his fury was ſo impetuous, that he wiſh'd nothing but the death of Artemidorus, believing he was his Rival, and a greater Favourite. For my part, I confeſs to my ſhame, I was in ſo great amazement, and ſeis'd with ſuch exceſſive fright, that I was unable either to ſpeak or ſtir from the place. The Princeſs was more valiant than I; for when ſhe ſaw ſo many ſwords turn'd againſt Artemidorus (who was ſlightly wounded in the left hand) ſo many arrows ſhot at him, and none heard what he ſaid: ſeeing, I ſay that tho by his dexterity, courage and agility, he repell'd all that ſet upon him (who durſt not approach nearer to him than as far as the bodies of thoſe he had ſlain) yet it would be impoſſible for him to avoid being overcome at length; ſhe went forth with extreme diligence as ſoon as ſhe was return'd from her firſt aſtoniſhment, and without conſidering that ſhe had nothing upon her but a plain flying robe of white ſtuffe, that her neck was half naked, her hair looſe, and her arms bare, ſhe paſs'd through the porch into the midſt of all the armed people, endangering her ſelf to be wounded with the arrows and javelins, and by her rare beauty ſhaming the Graces, at the feet of whom Artemidorus defended his life ſo valiantly, ſhe plac'd her ſelf between this valiant Prince and thoſe that aſſaulted him, deſiring by this generous action to cauſe the fight to ceaſe, and to make Artemidorus known to the Prince his Brother. And indeed all the fierce aſſailants ſuſpended their fury at her appearance: but for that this action was interpreted by the Prince, Meleontus and Zenocrates for a great teſtimony of love towards Artemidorus, it produc'd in them very different effects. The Prince redoubling his fury, Infamous Siſter (cry'd he) do you come to defend your unworthy Lover in my ſight? I ſhall puniſh you for your wickedneſs. At which he advanc'd towards her with with his ſword drawn, and had infallibly kill'd her, if the amorus Zenocrates (as jealous as he was) had not out of an exceſs of love caſt himſelf between the Prince and Lyſimena. Artemidorus alſo offer'd to doe the ſame; but at the very moment, Meleontus (whoſe jealouſie and fury was redoubled by the generous action of the Princeſs) took a bow from the hands of an Archer, and ſhot with precipitation: but inſtead of killing Artemidorus as he deſign'd, he wounded Lyſimena dangerouſly in the neck, and the ſame arrow glancing from her unhappily, enter'd into the body of Zenocrates (for Meleontus ſhot from the right ſide to the left) upon which both of them falling down, Lyſimena reſented the moſt violent grief that ever was, for ſhe ſaw her ſelf no longer able to hinder Artemidorus from periſhing by the hands of her Brother: ſhe ſaw her dear Zenocrates wounded for her ſake, and underſtood by ſome words which he ſpoke as he fell, that he ſuſpected her of being unfaithful. On the other ſide, Artemidorus being tranſported with grief to ſee Lyſimena wounded, without caring to defend himſelf, offer'd to lift up the Princeſs: but the jealous Meleontus enrag'd for having wounded his Miſtreſs and Zenocrates

(whom he now conſider'd not as his Rival) inſtead of Artemidorus, did his endeavour to kill this valiant and generous Prince. But at the ſame inſtant the Princeſs of Leontium coming back from the Temple of Diana on the one ſide with all her train, and the wiſe Cleanthus arriving on the other, ſuppreſs'd the fury of the tumult. You may judge how aſtoniſht the Princeſs of Leontium was to find the Prince and Meleontus with their ſwords drawn, ſo many people ſlain, Artemidorus wounded, and Zenocrates and Lyſimena at the point of death, for the loſs of bloud depriv'd them both of ſpeech. As for Cleanthus, as ſoon as he appear'd and beheld this ſtrange ſpectacle, he went directly to the Prince, and ſpeaking to him with the authority of one that had inſtructed him in his youth. How comes it, my Lord (ſaid he to him) that I find you with your arms in your hand againſt the Prince Artemidorus your Brother? Theſe words caus'd the Prince to bluſh, and Meleontus to wax pale, who was approacht whilſt Artemidorus having broken through the throng went to give the Princeſs his Mother an account of what had hapned. The ſpeech of Cleanthus, whom the Prince knew very well, ſtrangely aſtoniſht him; for he was conſcious there was no ground to ſuſpect his probity. Nevertheleſs not being able to reſolve ſuddenly to believe him, How? (ſaid he) is he that I behold my Brother? and is that Brother my Siſter's Lover? No, my Lord (anſwer'd Artemidorus, who led the Princeſs his Mother) and if you would have heard me, you had not done as you have, nor enforc'd me to kill thoſe unhappy perſons whom I I knew not. Ah! my Son (cry'd the Princeſs of Leontium, ſpeaking to the Prince) I cannot but accuſe you of a great crime, and regret my own unhappineſs. However (added ſhe) leave me in peace in this deſert, endeavour to ſave my Daughter's life, and be aſſuredly perſwaded Artemidorus is your Brother. He made himſelf known to me firſt of all; your Siſter underſtood his quality from my mouth; and had it not been that I waited for the arrival of Cleanthus you had been informed of the truth before. Then Cleanthus adding many circumſtances for the conformation of his being Son to the Princeſs of Leontium, the Prince better conſider'd him, & acknowledg'd him to be his brother, and thereupon being much aſhamed of his action, he deſir'd pardon of him for it. My Lord (anſwer'd Artemidorus) I am ready to forget the injury you have done me; but I beſeech you that he who wounded the Princeſs my Siſter, may appear no longer in my ſight; otherwiſe, all the reſpect I bear you cannot hinder me from puniſhing him for ſo deteſtable an action. In the mean time, I being deſcended, approacht to the Princeſs, and fell upon my knees by her, endeavouring to bring her to her ſelf again. Meleontus was at his wits end for what he had done, and came to help me to hold her up; but as I was going to thruſt him away, he heard what Artemidorus ſpoke: upon which his rage being redoubled, You have reaſon, my Lord (ſaid he to him) you have reaſon; and to teſtifie to you that I judge my ſelf as culpable as unhappy, behold what a generous repentance ſhall lead me to. In ſpeaking which, he offer'd to ſtrike a Ponyard into his own heart; but the Prince (who lov'd him much) abating part of his impetuoſity by ſeiſing upon his arm, the Ponyard did not pierce ſo deep as he deſign'd it; but yet it did enough, to cauſe ſome compaſſion even in him whom he had deſir'd to kill.

The Princeſs having caus'd Lyſimena to be carried to a bed, and given order for care to be taken of Zenocrates, and the dead to be remov'd out of the Court, the Prince committed Meleontus to the cuſtody of three or four of his followers, and caus'd him to be conducted into a back Garden-houſe, notwithſtanding all his own reſiſtance; for he was reſolv'd to dy, and would by no means admit of any courſe to preſerve his life. In the mean time, Cleanthus diſcourſing with the Prince, and employing all his prudence to perſwade him that Artemidorus would remember nothing that had paſs'd, reduc'd his mind to a good temper, and counſell'd him to return that evening to Leontium, and to carry thither him that deſigning to kill Artemidorus wounded Lyſimena, till this firſt diſorder were compos'd, and it were ſeen what would become of Lyſimena's and Zenocrates's wounds; for, as for the Prince Artemidorus, that which he had received in his left hand, was very ſlight. So the Prince following the counſels of the wiſe Cleanthus (for whom he ſtill retain'd much reſpect) departed aſſoon as he underſtood Lyſimena was come again from her ſwoon, and caus'd Meleontus to be put into a Chariot, having firſt caus'd his wound to be dreſs'd by force, leaving Cleanthus order to tell the Princeſs his Mother, the Prince Artemidorus and Lyſimena, all that he judg'd conducive to appeaſe their minds; tho to ſpeak truth, this Prince thought himſelf guilty of nothing but precipitancy. And as for the action of Meleontus, he conſider'd it as a violence which love and jealouſie might excuſe. But Meleontus himſelf was more equitable, for he accus'd himſelf in good earneſt. How unhappy am I (ſaid he upon the waies he return'd, to one of his own and my friends, who told me this) and how great a Criminal! I have committed all crimes imaginable, I have raſhly ſuſpected the moſt virtuous Princeſs in the World, I have accus'd her, I have incens'd the Prince's mind againſt her, I have put fury into his heart, and weapons in his hand againſt the Prince his Brother, & the Princeſs his ſiſter; and wretch that I am, after that I had ſeen Artemidorus perform the greateſt actions in the world, I went about to kill him with the ſhot of an Arrow. But moreover, the Gods to puniſh me for it, have permitted that unfortunate Arrow to wound mortally both an innocent friend, and the only perſon for whoſe ſake life could be acceptable to me. And nevertheleſs, they will not let me dye, they force me to live, they keep me too, as if I ſtill deſerv'd, that any care ſhould be taken of my life. But 'tis in vain (added he) that I am watcht, and that every thing which might procure my death is remov'd from me; I need neither ſteel nor poyſon; my grief alone will be ſufficient to diſpatch me. For when I reflect, that I am he who have brought my Princeſs into danger, and that in attempting to kill a man whom I believ'd my Rival, perhaps I have ſlain my Miſtreſs; I reſent a torment a thouſand times more cruel than death, a torment greater than can be apprehended, and which I cannot wholly conceive my ſelf; ſince at the ſame time I am overwhelmed with ſhame, repentance, grief, and abhorrence of my ſelf, as much love as is needful to render my fault for ever unpardonable, and as much rage as is neceſſary to make life odious, and death deſirable every moment. Beſides, what have I to do longer in the World? the Princeſs did not love me, whilſt I did nothing but ſtudied to ſerve her; judge therefore, what ſentiments ſhe will have, if ſhe eſcapes, for a man that would have blemiſhed her honour, taken the Prince Artemidorus's life away after an unworthy manner, and who has endanger'd her own? Had I gone about to kill this Prince, as a man of courage may kill an Enemy, it would be more pardonable, but jealouſie ſo tranſported me, when I beheld Lyſimena hazard her life to ſave that of a man whom I believ'd my Rival, that in that accurſed moment I abandon'd my reaſon, and caſt off all ſenſe of virtue and honour, to mind only a ſpeedy revenge. But alaſs! the Gods have already reveng'd the cauſe of Lyſimena; for I hate my ſelf ſo horribly, that I never had a more ardent affection for her than I have now deteſtation for my ſelf. In this manner reaſoned the unfortunate Meleontes, whilſt the wiſe Cleanthus endeavour'd to pacifie matters at the Caſtle, where he ſtay'd.

Cleanthus (ſaid Plotina interrupting Amiclea) has done me a pleaſure in arriving, and I ſhould be glad to know a perſon who has ſo excellently educated the Prince Artemidorus. For my part (ſaid Clelia) I fancy him to be like one of the Sages that are ſo much ſpoken of. For I have heard him ſo extoll'd by Merigenes, the young King of Phenicia, and the Prince his brother, whom he inſtructed, that I imagine him to be a very excellent perſon.

To teſtifie the ſubmiſſion of my will to yours (anſwer'd Amiclea) I ſhall deſcribe him to you, and indeed I am ſomething of ſuch an humour, that I am loath to paſs over my Friends without commending them a little, when I ſpeak to perſons that do not know them; and I conceive generoſity requires as much from all people, and that there is ſome pleaſure, when we are alone to remember we have done juſtice to our friends when they were mention'd.

I beſeech you (ſaid Plotina) let us ſpeak of Cleanthus, and leave the pleaſures that we find in our ſelvs; for, as for my part, I am perſwaded they are the ſaddeſt pleaſures in the world. Yet they are the moſt ſolid (anſwer'd Clelia). Believe me (added Plotina agreeably) ſolidity is not to be requir'd in pleaſures; 'tis ſufficient if they be ſprightly and jovial, if they dazle reaſon, and follow one after another, if they be various and deceive us, and amuſe us agreeably; and to put the thing in practiſe, after having had the pleaſure to relieve my ſelf from a long ſilence by what I have ſaid, tell us, amiable Amiclea, what a perſon the wiſe Cleanthus is.

Know than (reply'd Amiclea) he whoſe deſcription you deſire, is a man of tranſcendent merit, and his eminent vertue has plac'd him above envy and the envious. His lineage is very good, and it would be eaſie to find wherewith to commend him in many things which are extrinſical to him: but not to ſpeak of ought but himſelf, I ſhall content my ſelf with telling you, that tho Cleanthus be arriv'd to that age, wherein time is wont to efface part of the lineaments that compoſe handſomeneſs in a face, yet he has ſtill a ſerene aſpect full of ſpirit and ſweetneſs which pleaſes infinitely. His eyes partly diſcover his wiſdom and goodneſs; and tho he is not tall, yet he has a good perſonage, and the abſolute air of a Phyloſopher that practices more vertue than he teaches. There appears ſo modeſt a joy in his converſe, ſo prudent a complacency in all his diſcourſe, and a goodneſs ſo real in all his actions, that his converſation begets a love of vertue in all that are capable of it. Moreover, he has been choſen (as I told you before) to inſtruct two of the greateſt-Princes in the World in ſeveral conſiderable kinds of knowledge, beſides the Prince of Leontium and Artemidorus. He has all his life ſo paſſionately lov'd ſtudy, that it may be ſaid, he never ſpent day without learning ſomething: ſo that he has compos'd an infinite number of excellent works, which are indubitable teſtimonies of his knowledge and vertue. For there is ſcarce any thing of which he has not written plauſibly, with intention to profit the publick, and render the Readers of his works, either better or more knowing; which in my judgement is a very great commendation. But tho Cleanthus be very learned, and his works, deſerve to live immortally, yet I admire his vertue more than his knowledge, eſpecially having preſerv'd it immaculate in the midſt of a great Court, where for the moſt part, ſuch as are moſt vertuous find it ſomething difficult to perſiſt exactly in the purity of their own ſentiments. But, as for Cleanthus, nothing changes him, he is ſo ſolidly vertuous: but his vertue is ſociable, far from aſperity or ſavageneſs, which perſwades rather by ſweetneſs than impetuoſity, and which by the calmneſs of his mind renders it ſufficiently manifeſt apparent, that he has been a long and happier Studier of Wiſdom; for he is none of thoſe who know vertue without following it, and teach the vertues which they never practice. On the contrary, Cleanthus ſpeaks more morality by his actions than his diſcourſes, and inſtructs no leſs by his manners than by works. Thus you ſee what a perſon the wiſe Cleanthus is, whoſe preſence calm'd ſo great a tempeſt.

But to proceed, as ſoon as the Princeſs came out of her ſwoon, ſhe thought upon Artemidorus & Zenocrates, and ſeeing me in her chamber with tears in my eies, ſhe call'd me as weak as ſhe was, and (tho her wound ſufficiently pain'd her) ſtretcht forth her hand to me, and graſping mine gently, I beſeech you, my dear Amiclea (ſaid ſhe to me, beholding me wiſhly) tell me whether the tears you ſhed be for Artemidorus, or for the unfortunate Zenocrates. The Prince Artemidorus (anſwer'd I) is ſo little hurt, that he feels no wound but yours! and as for Zenocrates, I know not yet what the Chirurgions ſay of him: ſo that, Madam, my tears are only for your ſelf. Since my life is ſo dear to you (reply'd ſhe with a lower voice) take ſome care of that of Zenocrates, and let me know what condition he is in. Whereupon ſoon after I underſtood that his wound was dangerous indeed, but yet not deſperate. As for the Princeſs, ſhe was in very great danger, becauſe ſhe was taken with a Fever. Zenocrates greateſt affliction was occaſion'd, for that no perſon, except my ſelf, knowing the love he had for Lyſimena, he was told of the danger in which ſhe was. By which means his weakneſs became greater than it would, if he had been ignorant of that of Lyſimena. As for Artemidorus, he had ſo tender a friendſhip for her, that he could not have been much more afflicted if he had been her Lover; and as we are eaſily led to love ſuch as have been willing to ſerve thoſe whom we love, this Prince had likewiſe in a little time a very great friendſhip for Zenocrates, who ſo generouſly oppos'd the violence of the Prince of Leontium, and was wounded with the ſame ſtroke that hurt the Princeſs. Zenocrates knowing I was not ignorant of his love, us'd to me the moſt moving and paſſionate expreſſions in the world as often as I went to viſit him from the Princeſs. Whoſe vertue (on the other ſide) I aſſure you I could not but admire in this occaſion, for tho ſhe believ'd ſhe ſhould dy, yet ſhe always preſerv'd the ſame prudence, and did not ſpeak one word which ſhe ought to repent of: ſhe talk'd with me concerning Zenocrates always with expreſſions of great dearneſs, but yet it was with ſuch caution too, that what ſhe ſaid might as well agree to an amiable Friend as a faithful Lover. But at length Lysimena's youth overcoming the greatness of her distemper, her Physicians one day assur'd she was past all danger of death! of which Artemidorus transported with joy went to inform Zenocrates, who receiv'd this good news with so much delight, that the Prince perceiv'd he was amorous of Lysimena. But he was rather glad than displeased at it; for he hated Meleontus, and knowing Zenocrates was descended from the ancient Princes of Herbesa (altho his rank was now inferiour to that of his Ancestors) he was not sorry that so worthy a man lov'd the Princess his Sister, judging too, that this might rather hinder him from pardoning Meleontus. This discovery exciting the Prince to a curiosity of knowing Lysimena's sentiments as well, one day when she was able to suffer his conversation, he began to glibe at her a little about Zenocrates, whose life, he said, she had almost endanger'd. The Princess blusht when Artemidorus spoke thus to her; wherefore fearing he had displeas'd her, I beseech you (said he to her) do not think I speak to you as the Prince my brother would do, namely, with a design to persecute you; No, my dear sister (added he) I have more equitable sentiments, I speak to you as a faithful Friend, and desire not to know your thoughts, for any other end, but to conform my self to them; for I know you love glory, and are uncapable of loving any thing without it. My Lord (said the Princess than to him, recollecting her self) to testifie to you that I consider you more as a faithful friend than a generous brother, I will make you privy to the only secret of my life, and confess to you, that if I did not take care to rule the sentiments of my heart, I should have as great inclination for Zenocrates as I have aversion for Meleontus. But for as much as I foresee fortune cannot permit us to live together, I speak to him always as an agreeable Friend, and I forbid him to hope any such thing as a Lover might pretend to, beyond a certain free and unin-terested kindness, which I cannot refuse him. This, my Lord, is the onely secret of my life, use it as you please; and if you find me Criminal, you will do me a pleasure in telling me so, to the end I may endeavour to correct my fault. This freedom so extremely pleas'd Artemidorus, that he gave her a thousand thanks; he approv'd all her sentiments, and there became such an intimate and confiding a friendship between them, as will last all their lives. Afterwards Artemidorus with the Princesse's consent intimated to Zenocrates that he understood his affection; which produc'd in a few dayes a very strait amity between these three persons, who moreover had such an esteem of me as to communicate to me all their sentiments. In the mean time Cleanthus found it a matter of difficulty to compose matters; for the Prince loving Meleontus dearly, urg'd that Lysimena and Artemidorus would pardon him: these two persons on the contrary could not yield to see a man who had committed an action likely to prove so fatal to them. Nor could the Princess their Mother be brought to consent to return to Leontium as long as he was there, and desir'd that the Prince would banish him for ever. But Amerintha, whom the Prince was amorous of, protecting Meleontus, there was no obtaining of what she requir'd. So Cleanthus made frequent journies from the Castle where we were to Leontium, and from Leontium to the Castle to no purpose. All this while Meleontus was under a guard, tho it was more to hinder attempts upon his life then to satisfie Lysimena and Artemidorus. At length the Princess being recover'd from her sickness, became able to walk in the Gardens of the Castle, which are indeed admirably handsome. As soon as she was in a condition to see the world, all the chief Ladies of Leontium came to visit her, and Clidamira (whom you know) amongst others came thither with one of her Kinswomen. It hapned that Artemidorus accounted her so amiable that day, that he began to be possest with the passion which occasion'd all the adventures I know you have heard of. And therefore I shall tell you scarce any thing of it, but only that one day she came with Andromira and several other Ladies who stay'd to pass that night with us. Towards the evening the Princess and the Ladies went to walk in the Gardens, and Amerintha so brought it about that her self discours'd with Artemidorus, Andromira entertain'd Zenocrates (tho he did not much desire it) another Lady imploy'd her self in recounting to me a hundred things which did not concern me; and in the mean time one of her friends, who is as crafty a person as any in the world, led the Princess insensibly into a walk, at the end of which was a Pavilion that had a door opening into the fields. The further end of the place was set about with seats, in which to repose without the inconvenience of the Sun, or being seen of any that walk in the Garden, (tho it be wholly open on the side towards the end of the Walk), because there are great curtains before it which may be drawn at pleasure. The Princess having unwillingly suffered her self to be conducted into this Cabinet, beheld the Curtains half drawn, and observ'd that the gate looking into the fields half shut: but making no reflections upon these two circumstances, which might proceed from several causes she enter'd into the Cabinet without minding that the Lady did not follow her into it, but was gone back into the Walk. She had scarce made three steps in it, but she beheld Meleontus at her feet, who holding her by the Robe; notwithstanding her reluctancy forc'd her to hearken to him; for she being still weak by her late sickness, and astonishment redoubling her weakness, she was constrain'd to sit down for fear of falling. At which instant she was in a fear left Meleontus intended to carry her away, and therefore made a great shreek: which nevertheless was not heard by any person, because the company was all in another Walk, where she that was Meleontus's Agent knew well her Friends would upon handsome pretences retain them. Wherefore Meleontus not to lose an opportunity he could not easily recover, being upon his knees before the Princess who was sat down, began to speak to her with a strange commotion of heart: I beseech you, Madam, (said he to her extream submissively) hear the unfortunate Meleontus this last time; which certainly you ought to do, Madam, since he does not pretend to obtain the pardon which he desires of you with tears in his eyes. The unfortunate Meleontus (answer'd the Princess) is so criminal, that there are no misfortunes of which he is not worthy. I acknowledge it, Madam (reply'd he hastily) and I took the liberty of coming hither for no other end but to confess it. How dare you, Meleontus (said the Princess) come to present your self before me, after you have believ'd me capable of a crime? for in comparison of this, I count it almost nothing that you wounded me neer to death. But to speak truth, I resent most of all, that you went about to kill the Prince my Brother after the most unworthy manner in the World.

Ah!

Ah! Madam (anſwer'd Meleontus) when I ſaw you ſo fair, and ſo charming paſs amongſt the ſwords and the arrows with contempt of the danger to ſave the life of a man whom I believ'd my Rival, and thought was lov'd by you, I reſented that which I am unable to expreſs; and in this caſe I muſt have been void of love, if I could have preſerv'd reſpect and generoſity. I confeſs therefore, that I minded only to kill him whom I believ'd your Lover; and if Zenocrates had been ſtill amorous of you, he would queſtionleſs have done the ſame that I did. Be it how it will (ſaid ſhe) I am well enough pleas'd with Zenocrates, but I am not ſo with you. Alas! Madam (anſwered Meleontus) How can you, ſince I am not ſo my ſelf, but on the contrary am my own moſt mortal Enemy? Yes, Madam, I hate my ſelf more than you hate me, and I have at this preſent ſuch remorſe for my violence, and ſuch reſpect for you, that I dare not dye here before your eyes, for fear the Prince who loves me ſhould reproach you with my death. Know therefore, Madam, that perceiving the diviſion which I cauſe between the Prince of Leontium, the Prince Artemidorus, and your ſelf, I am reſolv'd to put an end to that conteſt by my flight. To which purpoſe, I have ſuborn'd my Guards, whilſt the Prince is at hunting, and by ways which I need not tell you, am come into this Garden, to aſſure you here, that I will go ſeek death in ſome place ſo remote from Leontium, that no tidings ſhall ever be heard of me. I will alſo leave the name which I bear, to the end it may be no more diſtaſteful to you, and retaining all the love I have for you, I will live the moſt miſerable of men, whitherſoever I go, if at leaſt I have ſtrength enough to live any time longer, only to adore you. Meleontus ſpoke this ſo paſſionately, that the Princeſs told me all her hatred and indignation could not hinder her from having a little commiſeration of him. Nevertheleſs, ſhe conceal'd it, for fear he ſhould alter his purpoſe; and therefore ſpeaking to him with a ſevere air, After bad actions are committed (ſaid ſhe to him) 'tis not enough to ſpeak fine words; a long repentance, a long abſence, and a thouſand ſervices are requiſite to the producing of a reaſonable hope of being indur'd amongſt perſons of honour. Howſoever, ſince I am equitable, I commend the deſign you take, as that alone which is fitting for you. Go therefore, Meleontus, go (continu'd ſhe, riſing up) go ask pardon of the Gods; for, as for me, I ſhould delude you if I ſhould tell you that I pardon you. I have already told you (anſwer'd the afflicted Meleontus) that I did not hope to obtain the pardon which I deſir'd; but at leaſt grant me the favour to believe that the exceſs of my love is the cauſe of all my Crimes, and that if I had lov'd you leſs, I had been always innocent. 'Tis the only and laſt favour I ſhall ever requeſt of you, not daring to deſire ſo much as a little compaſſion when you ſhall imagine that I am dead in exile only for love of you. As the Princeſs was going to ſpeak ſomething to him, Meleontus ſaw all the Company appear afar off, who (notwithſtanding all the contrivance of the Lady that return'd back to amuſe them handſomely in the mean time) were ſeeking for the Princeſs, and could not longer want her preſence. So that Meleontus being conſtrain'd to go away, roſe up, and the Princeſs ſuddenly leaving him without ſpeaking, he went forth at the door of the Pavilion which opened into the fields, mounted upon a Horſe held ready for him by a ſlave, and loſt himſelf in a wood not far diſtant. Yet this could not be done but that Zenocrates knew Meleontus. As for Artemidorus, he obſerv'd nothing, becauſe he was ſpeaking earneſtly to Clidamira; and there was none but Zenocrates and my ſelf who ſaw Meleontus. He no ſooner perceiv'd him, but he chang'd colour, came to me, and looking upon me with ſomewhat a diſturb'd countenance, What did I ſee? Amiclea, (ſaid he) Did my eyes deceive me? Is it poſſible Meleontus could be where I believ'd I ſaw him? Has the Princeſs pardoned him? What think you of that which I know you perceiv'd as well as my ſelf? In truth (ſaid I to him) I know not what I ought to think of it, but I know well the Princeſs can never be unjuſt, and that her aſpect tells me ſhe is as much ſurpris'd as we. I beſeech you, generous Amiclea (replyed Zenocrates) know the truth of this Adventure, for the reſpect I bear the Princeſs withholds me from asking it of her. And accordingly approaching towards Lyſimena, ſhe drew me aſide, and did me the honour to tell me what had hapned. After which having called Artemidorus and Zenocrates, ſhe related to them the ſame ſhe had told me before. At firſt the departure of Meleontus ſeem'd very advantageous; but afterwards conſidering the Prince would be afflicted at it, it was fear'd his diſpleaſure would fall upon Lyſimena, Artemidorus, or Zenocrates. However it was judg'd convenient to advertiſe the Princeſs of Leontium and Cleanthus of what had paſſed; and accordingly Lyſimena ending her walk ſooner than otherwiſe ſhe would have done, return'd into the Caſtle. She was not long there, before there arriv'd a friend of Zenocrates, who came to advertiſe the Princeſs that Meleontus was gone away from the place where he was guarded without being known whither, that the Prince was extremely troubled at it, that this Favorite had left the moſt paſſionate Letter in the world for him, and that Amerintha was much imploy'd in comforting him. It was requiſite therefore to have recourſe to the prudence of Cleanthus who was at Leontium, to the end to appeaſe the Prince's mind whom he found very ſad for the departure of Meleontus. He found him alſo much incens'd againſt Lyſimena, whoſe rigour was the innocent cauſe of all theſe diſorders: but at length Cleanthus telling him that the way to cauſe Meleontus to return, was to treat Lyſimena well, and to endeavour thereby to win her, things were pacified in the end, in ſpite of the artifices of Amerintha. Yet this diviſion extremely afflicted the Princeſs of Leontium, ſo that ſhe fell ſick and dyed within a few days after. Lyſimena and Artemidorus were ſenſibly touch'd with this loſs: but for the Prince of Leontium, he was not much afflicted at it, becauſe he believ'd Lyſimena would thereby be more abſolutely in his power. Shortly after, Lyſimena returned to lodge in the Prince's Palace, and during ſome days led a life pleaſant enough. Artemidorus at that time became perfectly amorous of Clidamira, which ſtrangely incens'd Amerintha who could not touch his heart. Wherefore ſhe obliged the Prince highly to diſapprove the affection he had for that Lady; and it was ſhe that prevail'd with him to cauſe her to be put amongſt the vailed Virgins, as no doubt you have heard in the relation of the Hiſtory of Artemidorus. For ſhe deſigned thereby to croſs a Prince whom ſhe did not love, and to ſerve Meleontus, with whom 'tis believ'd ſhe has always had ſome ſecret correſpondence. For it was eaſie to judge that Artemidorus would not fail to fall out totally with the Prince after this violence; and ſo Lyſimena would loſe a powerful protector. The event manifested that she was not deceiv'd; for you know Artemidorus voluntarily exil'd himself, to deliver Clidamira. But whereas it is not his History that I am relating, and you are ignorant of nothing that befel him, I will not tell you of his departure, his shipwrack, the resolution he took to go to the War, and in what manner he became prisoner to the Prince of Agrigentum, nor how he fell in love with Berelisa; but only what concerns Lysimena and Zenocrates. You shall know then, that after the departure of Artemidorus, Zenocrates (to continue to act according to his custom) made semblance of being in love with Clidamira, as soon as she came out from amongst the vailed Virgins, that afterwards he made Courtship for some days to another, but at length conceiving that since Meleontus was absent he might dispense with this dissimulation, he continued for some time without a Mistress. Whereupon it was said of him in railery, that of an inconstant person he was become indifferent; and I remember, Clidamira, being one day with Lysimena, undertook to maintain that it was much more honest to be inconstant than to be indifferent. For, I know nothing more hateful (said she in defence of her opinion) than such people as neither love nor hate, who determine themselves to nothing, and have so lukewarm a soul, that they are not very strongly on their own side. Ask them if they will walk; they know not: inquire of them, whether they would have people love them; they are dubious of it: do them any service; they take no notice of it: offer to displease them; they scarce perceive it: so much are they afraid to disquiet their happy indifference. But as for inconstant persons (added she) they have always something to do; they go, they come, they are imployed; and though they desire nothing vehemently, and disclaim obstinacy, yet they are always determin'd to something. They fill some place, and signifie something in the World, and at least make themselves to be spoken of, be it well or ill. 'Tis true (answer'd Lysimena) but if you observe, the indifferent and the inconstant are not too opposite. For an inconstant person loves indifferently all the Beauties of a City; 'tis only because he has some kind of indifference in his heart, that he loves several persons. And, for my part, methinks, I should love an indifferent person who is determin'd to nothing, better than an inconstant who determines himself to inconstancy, who makes a glory of his weakness, who believes he cannot be a gallant without being a profess'd shittle-brain, and who loving nothing ardently, yet passes all his life as if he lov'd. For the name of Love is not to be given to those transient affections which succeed one after another, which perplex hearts without possessing them, and which almost produce nothing but Sonnets. The Princess spoke this with a certain air, which made Amerintha (who was present) suspect something; for she judg'd that Zenocrates appearing to be so much in her favour ought to take ill her arguing so strongly against inconstancy, if she believ'd him inconstant. So that observing these things, and inquiring diligently of that waiting woman who formerly gave Meleontus intelligence of all Lysimena's actions, and whom the Princess had discarded; she came at length to discover that Zenocrates was always ardently amorous of her, and that his inconstancy was but dissembled. And forasmuch as she could turn the Prince's mind after what manner she pleas'd, Lysimena was one morning extremely amazed to understand that the Prince had commanded Zenocrates to depart his Court at an hours warning, with prohibition to see her before he went away. You may judge how displeasing this news was to her, especially too being advertis'd that Meleontus had writ to the Prince two days before. So it behov'd Zenocrates to go from Leontium without seeing the Princess; nevertheless, he came back thither the same night, conceal'd himself at the house of one of his Friends, and three days after contriv'd a way to speak with Lysimena by night in a Garden. Their conversation was the most pathetical in the World; for they saw no ground of hope ever to live happy. I know well (said Lysimena to him) That your descent is more illustrious than the Rank you hold at present is eminent. I know likewise that your merit sees nothing above it, and I will believe that your affection cannot be surpass'd by any other; but, when all is done, the Prince my Brother is extreme unjust and violent. He loves Meleontus whom I hate, and Artemidorus is not here; adde hereunto that his Mistress hates us, and does us no less mischief than his favourite. We have no Sanctuary in any place; and though we had, a sentiment of honour would not suffer me to wish we were there together. But, Madam (said Zenocrates) what then will you shall become of me? I would have you (answer'd she) endeavour to find Artemidorus, adhere to his fortune, and trust to my constancy. Alas! Madam (reply'd he) may an unfortunate absent person be assured of a thing which he ardently desires? Yes, Zenocrates (answer'd Lysimena) when she that promises him is indu'd with generosity. But your self (added the Princess) take heed absence do not change you, and that I have not cause one day to make you a thousand reproaches. Time shall justifie me, Madam (said he to her) and you shall see me during all my life the same I am this day, that is, the most faithful Lover that ever was. Alas! Zenocrates (answer'd she) there was never an unfaithful Lover in the World, but a moment before his infidelity swore he would be eternally faithful; therefore answer nothing, and leave me to fear that which I cannot but be apprehensive of. Zenocrates then made a thousand the most earnest protestations of fidelity that can be imagined; after which he departed, and went first to Syracusa, and from thence to Agrigentum, where you know he found Artemidorus, from whom he has ever since been inseparable. During his stay there, he writ very diligently to Lysimena; but having made a long practise of appearing inconstant, he was so accustomed when he was with a fair person, to use Courtship to her, that he did not change his manner. For when Clidamira was at Agrigentum, there were some days in which she was not unpleasing to him. And indeed Zenocrates is a little of the humor of those people who think an honest man cannot be call'd unfaithful, though he make some transitory Gallantries, and that the true Mistress ought to be contented, provided she be the chief Lady (to speak in their own terms) and that the Lover be always ready to Sacrifice the rest to her, when she knows it and requires it. So then without being scrupulous in his passion, he came to have something that seem'd like love for Clidamira. And this person who has always lov'd to trouble the contentment of others (though she then lov'd Artemidorus who did not love her any longer) writ maliciously to Leontium to a Friend of hers, that Zenocrates had been very amorous of her, and would have been so still, if she had hearkned to him. Forasmuch

as ſhe knew that ſhe to whom ſhe writ was no keeper of a ſecret, her deſign ſucceeded; the Princeſs ſoon heard of this news, which ſhe the more deeply reſented, for that after the departure of Artemidorus, ſhe had ſuffered a hundred perſecutions from the Prince, who continually regretted the caſe of Meleontus. Whereupon ſhe complain'd to me with much tenderneſs; not that ſhe did not believe Zenocrates always lov'd her, but ſhe could not endure he ſhould have any kindneſs or complacency for another. How unjuſt men are? (ſaid ſhe to me) They will have an intire heart, they are jealous of a ſhar'd glance, and nevertheleſs they take a liberty to divide themſelves upon the leaſt occaſion that is preſented; and I am perſwaded they are ordinarily much more inconſtant when they are lov'd, than whilſt they only ſeek to have themſelves lov'd: though nothing is more unreaſonable than to be leſs faithful to a perſon that loves you, than to one by whom you are not lov'd. Such were the ſentiments of Lyſimena; who being advertis'd that Meleontus was ſhortly to return, profeſſed her ſelf diſcontented with the World, and retired amongſt the Veiled Virgins which are near Leontium, and I accompany'd her. The Prince was highly offended herewith, though he conceal'd his reſentment; and cauſing Meleontus to haſten his return, this Favorite ſoon after came again to Court, hoping that during the abſence of Artemidorus he might obtain his pardon of Lyſimena. But whereas at his taking leave of this Princeſs, he had ſpoken to her like a man that went to ſeek death, and was never to come again, he therefore writ to her at his return almoſt in theſe terms.

The unfortunate Meleontus to Lyſimena.

IF you knew, Madam, all that I have done to dye of grief, you could not accuſe me of living contrary to my word: for I have continually remembred your rigours, my Crimes and my infelicity. I have ſighed, I have lamented, I have not had a moment of quiet, I have complained of you, and I have complained of my ſelf; I have loved you, I have hated my ſelf, and in brief, I have led the moſt miſerable life in the World. But after all, Madam, I have not been able to dye abſent from you; wherefore being perſwaded Deſtiny would have me dye in the ſame place where I had the unhappineſs to diſpleaſe, and offend you, I am returned hither to ſatisfie you. Theſe, Madam, are the ſentiments of the unfortunate Meleontus, who loves you more than he ever loved you, although he knows you hate him.

This Letter being very pathetical, I confeſs to you, though I was Zenocrates's Friend, I told the Princeſs, that ſometimes it was requiſite not to be too obſtinate againſt fortune, that there were unhappineſſes that could not be overcome otherwiſe than by yielding to them, and that perhaps ſhe would not do very ill in pardoning Meleontus, yet without ingaging her ſelf to any thing more. How? (anſwered Lyſimena haſtily) is it poſſible for me to loſe the natural averſion I have always had for Meleontus? Can I forget that he has been guilty of the injuſtice to ſuſpect me of a weakneſs I cannot think of without horror? That he has been ſo unworthy as to go about to kill a man that was aſſaulted by above thirty, and whom he could not wound without endangering to kill me, as indeed he wounded me in ſuch a manner that I look't for nothing but death? What know I but that that he deſign'd to kill me as well as Artemidorus? No, no, Amiclea (ſaid ſhe to me) Meleontus ſhall always be hated by Lyſimena, though even Zenocrates ſhould prove unfaithful. After this I durſt urge the Princeſs no more. In the mean time the Prince of Leontium being urg'd by Amerintha, reſolved to force Lyſimena to marry Meleontus, and deſign'd to come and take her with Authority from amongſt the Vailed Virgins, in whoſe number was a Kinſwoman of the Prince of Peruſia, who was ſhortly to be ſent back into the Country of that Prince, there to eſtabliſh a Temple and a Covent of Virgins like this. Wherefore the Princeſs (though her mind was exaſperated againſt Zenocrates) ſeeing her ſelf in danger to marry Meleontus or a perpetual priſon (for ſhe was advertis'd that this was the deſign of the Prince) took the opportunity which fortune preſented her, and reſolved to paſs the Sea with theſe Virgins, to go to Peruſia, leaving order with her that governed thoſe that ſtay'd, not to diſcover whither ſhe was gone. And accordingly the matter was effected, though her Waiting-women endeavoured to avert her from it.

So Lyſimena believing Zenocrates too little faithful, and fearing to be forced to marry Meleontus, went away (as I ſaid before) to Peruſia, with intent to reſolve if poſſible to ſpend her life amongſt the Vailed Virgins which were to be eſtabliſht there. As for me, I loving her dearly, and having no Mother, ſcrupled not to follow her fortune, however reſolv'd to hinder her from executing her purpoſe. But to ſpeak truth, I believe the affection ſhe has always had for Zenocrates hindered her from it rather than I. In the mean time the Prince ſtill ſuffered it to be believ'd in Sicily that the Princeſs Lyſimena was amongſt the Vailed virgins with whom ſhe had ſhut up her ſelf, having been a long time without diſcovering where ſhe was. As for Meleontus, he continued Favorite to the Prince, and very much afflicted for the abſence of the Princeſs. But for that he has ſeen her flight was a pure effect of her hatred, I believe his love is much diminiſht, and that he ſtudies only to hinder Artemidorus and Lyſimena from returning to Leontium. As for the Princeſs, ſhe found an inviolable ſanctuary with Mezentius Prince of Peruſia; and you are not ignorant that being there in a time of the great diſorders that happened between Porſenna and him, ſhe ſerv'd Aronces conſiderably when he came to deliver the Prince his Father; and having afterwards found better protection with Porſenna and Galerita than Mezentius, ſhe has continued in their Court, where ſhe has acquir'd a high reputation, and where Artemidorus and Zenocrates underſtanding of her reſidence, paſs'd to Syracuſa where Amilcar was, and came into Italy together, where they have ſeen Lyſimena many times. Zenocrates has been able to juſtifie himſelf, or at leaſt to deſire pardon for his cuſtomary inconſtancies, in which nevertheleſs he ſwears his heart was never concern'd. But for his puniſhment, he is become jealous within a few days, and we cannot imagine who it ſhould be that gives occaſion to this jealouſie.

However, we have underſtood a thing, which in my judgment will decide the intereſts of Bereliſa and Clidamira in reference to Artemidorus; for you ſhall know we have diſcovered by an antient Lover of Lyſimena, who came from Leontium a while ſince, and has had news from thence within theſe two days, that Clidamira has great credit in that Court, and ſo great, that Artemidorus and Lyſimena cannot return thither but by her negotiation. That which gives her this authority, is, becauſe there is a half engag'd love between her and Meleontus, who knows not that ſhe ſtill loves Artemidorus. The man whom I mention'd having brought a Letter of Clidamira's to Meleontus, which the Favorite loſt and one of my Friends ſends me, the Princeſs has purpoſed to give it to Artemidorus aſſoon as his health ſhall be better, to the end to let him fully know the levity of this unfaithful fair one, of whom nevertheleſs they have great need; for being the Prince of Leontium is weak and over-rul'd by Amerintha and his Favorite, reaſon can prevail nothing at all with him.

Thus, Madam (ſaid Amiclea to Clelia) I have recounted to you what you and your amiable Friends deſir'd to know; and I beg your pardon for the little art I have us'd in making this relation.

Amiclea holding her peace, all theſe fair Virgins thank'd her: but Clelia with a little more coldneſs than the reſt, having her mind ſo taken up with Zenocrates's jealouſie, whereof ſhe thought ſhe knew the cauſe, that ſhe ſcarce took notice of what was ſpoken. But there was none beſides Plotina that obſerv'd the alteration of her countenance; for Amilcar, Anacreon, and Merigenes being enter'd, the converſation was chang'd. The firſt diſcourſe was of the War paſt, the Truce and the Peace; then, of Love; and afterwards concerning Themiſtus and Merigenes, who were ſhortly to depart. For my part (ſaid Plotina) I envy thoſe that go to Syracuſa; for I confeſs to you I have heard ſpeak of a Lady call'd Amalthea, whoſe merit charms me. Tell me then, I conjure you (ſaid ſhe to Merigenes) whether they that brought the intelligence from Lindamira to Themiſtus, told you nothing concerning that admirable Woman. All that I can ſay (anſwer'd Merigenes) is, that Amalthea is continually more generous, that her vertue is never weary of obliging the unfortunate, and that after a noble manner, namely, without oſtentation or intereſt; and the young and charming Clariſta her Neece is at this time one of the moſt amiable Virgins in the World. For advancing in age ſhe is become more beautiful than ſhe was, ſhe has perform'd more than ſhe promis'd, though there was great expectation of her; and her mind being imbelliſht as well as her viſage, contributes to render her eyes more glittering, her phyſiognomy more agreeable, and her deportment more noble: in brief, ſhe has ſo well improv'd the advantage of reſiding with one of the moſt excellent Women in the World, that in this amiable Virgin are found all the charms of youth without any of the defects that ordinarily accompany that age. She is diſcreet and judicious, debonaire and modeſt, exact both in friendſhip and conſtancy; and it may be ſaid to her honour, that when ſhe is known, it is eaſie to divine under whom ſhe has been educated. I beſeech you (ſaid Plotina then) when you go to Syracuſa, tell the generous Amalthea and the charming Clariſta, that they have a Friend at Rome, whoſe friendſhip will coſt them as little to preſerve as it has to acquire. I promiſe to tell them whatſoever you pleaſe (anſwer'd Merigenes) and to tell it them in one of the moſt delectable places in the World. For I am told that ſince my departure the generous Artaxander and the virtuous Amalthea have finiſhed the building of a low apartment that lies along a fair Garden, and takes up the length of their ſtately Palace. You will do me a pleaſure to ſpeak of me in ſo excellent a place and in ſo good company (replied Plotina) but I ſhould not be unwilling that you would at leaſt carry my fanſie thither whither according to all appearances I am never likely to go in perſon. I ſhall obey you (ſaid Merigenes) yet I will not undertake to make you an exact deſcription of that magnificent Palace; for I fear I ſhould a little pervert the order of Architecture. You are very prudent (ſaid Amilcar) not to perplex your ſelf willingly amongſt Pilaſters, Columns, Frieſes, and Corniſhes; for I remember I once knew a pretender to fine wit, who going about to deſcribe a handſome houſe, put the Chapter in the place of the Baſe, the Pilaſter upon the Column, and (if I am not miſtaken) the Porch at the third ſtory. But yet he had the faculty of imploying all the terms of the moſt exquiſite Architecture, from the Fuming Pots to the Altragals. 'Tis true he did not put them in their right place; but nevertheleſs believing he underſtood himſelf, he conceiv'd he was underſtood too by his hearers, and was very much ſatisfied with it. To avoid therefore the like inconveniences, (anſwered Merigenes, after he had laugh'd a little as well as the reſt of the company at that which Amilcar ſpoke) I ſhall content my ſelf to tell you in general that the Palace of Artaxander and Amalthea is large and magnificent, and were it finiſhed, would be one of the goodlieſt in the world. That which renders it more agreeable, is, that it is built upon the Haven of Syracuſa, that there is a ſpacious and fair Garden belonging to it, that the Court of it is handſome, that the Stair-caſe is very excellent, that there are great and goodly apartments in it, that there are little ones too, agreeable and convenient; and that all the places and parts of this Palace are uniform, magnificent and well contriv'd. But to deſcribe only the low apartment (in which I purpoſe to ſpeak of you) I muſt tell you it is contriv'd in ſuch a manner, that all that can be wiſht is to be found in it; for there are ſo many rooms upon the ſame plain, that my memory is puzled to retain them. There are anti-chambers, Chambers, a Gallery, Cabinets at both ends; and all theſe ſo well contriv'd that all the doors of thoſe ſeveral places which are upon the ſame rowe exactly reſpond to one another; ſo that when one is at one end he may ſee all that is done at the other, & the view paſſing through all theſe ſeveral places, finds its a very agreeable ſight: but above all the reſt, the Gallery pleaſes infinitely. Imagine, that it is ſo contriv'd as to ſerve for a Gallery and a Cabinet both; for the Architect took room out of the thickneſs of the wall, at ſeveral diſtances, to place ſhelves fill'd with books. The like have been made on the ſide of the Bay-windows; and for the ſafety and neatneſs of the books, there are Curtains which cover them, and great carved Windows which encloſe them. This Gallery is vaulted, which renders it agreeable and cool. It has ſeveral Bay-windows which look towards the Garden, where are ſeen abundance of Orange-trees; and on each ſide and at both ends are ſeen at equal diſtances twenty great looking-glaſſes faſtned into the Wainſcot which is wholly of Cedar. But to render this ſight more agreeable, on the ſide of each of theſe great looking glaſſes there are other little ones, with branches of ſilver iſſuing out at the bottom, each of which ſupported two ſtately Lamps. So that when theſe ſixty or eighty Lamps are lighted, the reflection they make in that multitude of Looking-glaſſes, produces ſuch an admirable ſpectacle as cannot be repreſented. And to render this place as commodious as it is handſome, the Cabinet which is at the end remote from the Haven of Syracuſa has ſuch a ſemblance of melancholy and ſolitude, that it is impoſſible not to be penſive in it. Two ſteps downward lead into it, it is of no great largeneſs, the proſpect of it is bounded, and there is a ſhadineſs ſo ſutable to a ſolitary retreat, that never was any place ſo fit to muſe agreeably or better contriv'd to tell a ſecret in, as this. But contrarily, the other Cabinet which is oppoſite to this, at the other end of this apartment, being in view of the Haven, diverts the eyes with a thouſand delightful Objects, and a continual diverſity of people going to and fro. So that here is always a choice either of Solitude or of the World; and which is more remarkable, this apartment without many adornments or guilding makes nevertheleſs ſuch a ſhew of magnificence as cannot be expreſs'd.

After what you have ſaid (anſwer'd Plotina) I am more deſirous than before of the friendſhip of the generous Amalthea, and the charming Clariſta. I will not fail (replyed Merigenes) to requeſt it for you, and I confidently promiſe you to obtain it, aſſoon as I ſhall have told them who you are. But would you not alſo (ſaid Merigenes) be Friend to ſome of my Friends of this Country? I deſire it (anſwer'd ſhe ſmiling) for according to the humor I am of, I am not very well ſatisfied with all thoſe I have here. Sincerely (added ſhe) if we well conſider, all the World are are but diſſemblers; they whom we confide in moſt, deceive us moſt, and I think 'tis good prudence to diſtruſt all others and our ſelves too. For all the World act like the vulgar at ſome time or other, all the World commits faults, and all the World is to blame in ſome caſes. They who ſeem active, are deceivers; ſuch as are not deceivers are weak; they that are too wiſe, love no body; and they that love really are ſo few, that they make no remarkable number. Never tell me then (added Plotina ſpeaking of ſome Friends) ſuch a one is a wiſe man, generous, and incapable of failing; for to ſpeak truly, all men are ſubject to defects. Yes (continued ſhe with an amiable ſeverity) all the World may be prepoſſeſſed with prejudice, all the world is crafty, envious, ſlanderous, falſe, weak; and there is ſcarce a Heroe but in ſome moment of his life finds ſome little low and vulgar ſentiment in his heart; ſo true it is that all men have their imperfections. In truth (ſaid Anacreon) Plotina has reaſon in what ſhe ſays, for there is ſcarce any perſon that can boaſt of having a true Friend. Then I am more happy than others (ſaid Merigenes) for I believe I have many. I believ'd ſo as well as you (anſwer'd Anacreon) but upon an occaſion of ſome importance, when I was at the Court of Polycrates, I found I had an infinite number of falſe or weak Friends, and very few whom I could account good. 'Tis ſo in all places (replyed Amilcar) but in prudence it behoves never to confide in their Friendſhip further than their own intereſt, pleaſure, or glory tyes them to you; and in equity it behoves to love them in the ſame meaſure as they love us, and never with any other affection than that which increaſes and diminiſhes according to occaſion. But Heroical friendſhip is not much leſs difficult to be practis'd than conſtant Love; and for my part, I have rarely endeavour'd it, becauſe the former is more convenient. 'Tis true, 'tis not ſo noble, excellent, and ſolid; but it never cauſes us much perplexity; it never makes us partakers of the misfortunes or ſorrows of our friends; it never renders us concern'd in the injuries which are done them; but taking barely the flowers of friendſhip (if I may ſo ſpeak) we leave the thorns to thoſe ſincere Friends, who reſent all the ſorrows of thoſe they love, who engage in all their intereſts without exception, who maintain the ſame courageouſly againſt the World, who have no fortunes apart, whoſe very honour is mutually common, who can never be poor whilſt one of them is rich, who think themſelves not in health when their friends are ſick. Believe me (added Amilcar) this kind of friendſhip is not competent to all ſorts of people, and I know ſome perſons that have not been able to attain to it, though they much deſir'd it. And therefore for fear of the ſame miſcarriage, I content my ſelf with loving according to the faſhion, that is, very commodiouſly for my ſelf. To conclude, whatever Merigenes is pleas'd to ſay, he knows no great number of thoſe Heroes in Friendſhip. For my part (ſaid Plotina) I deſire no more of him but the Character of one; for I conceive he muſt needs be a very agreeable perſon, it being almoſt impoſſible to be perfectly a good Friend, without being perfectly a brave man. I grant it (ſaid Merigenes) and I aſſure my ſelf, that aſſoon as I ſhall have named Lyſimantus, Amilcar will confeſs he is an excellent man, and a faithful Friend. I acknowledge it (anſwer'd Amilcar) and that which renders his friendſhip more ſolid, is, that he is indued with an immutable honeſty; and as for conſtancy, he has given a thouſand eminent proofs of it, and lov'd the illuſtrious Meriander, even to the death. Since Lyſimantus was Friend to Meriander, and is ſo ſtill to Merigenes, (ſaid Valeria) we muſt needs know, and I joyn my ſelf with Plotina to deſire his deſcription. I do the ſame (ſaid Clelia) and I aſſure my ſelf, Merigenes will not refuſe us. It would be ſufficiently hard to do it, Madam (replyed he) and therefore to obey you, know, Lyſimantus is a man of illuſtrious Lineage, and whoſe Anceſtors have born the moſt conſiderable Charges in their own Country. But to ſpeak truly, he is ſo well worthy to be commended by himſelf, that 'tis not at all neceſſary to fetch his praiſes from the vertues of his predeceſſors, and it ſuffices to ſpeak only of what is truly his own. He is tall, of a goodly aſpect; time has a little thickned his ſhape; he has a freſh and lively complexion, handſome and ſprightly eyes, ſomething a great noſe, a happy Phyſiognomy, the air of a Wiſe man, and a very obliging addreſs, eſpecially towards his Friends. Nature has given him a great Wit, but ſolid and firm, with a very exact judgment of the higheſt matters. Not but that he has a pliable mind, which obliges him not to deſpiſe the meaneſt, for he ſpeaks well in the moſt trivial things when he pleaſes to give himſelf the trouble; but it is certain, his mind is naturally more fit for ſerious matters. He has an univerſal knowledge of the World, which ſcarce ever deceives him; he underſtands the ſoundeſt Policie, and the moſt ſolid morality. By his prudence he foreſees the moſt remote and leaſt probable events; and his firmneſs of mind cauſes him to ſupport conſtantly the moſt unexpected misfortunes. He knows how to undergo the changes of Fortune without changing his countenance; exile and impriſonment ſhake not the

firmneſs of his heart; and never ſtudying but to do that which he ought, he leaves events to the power of Fortune, and always prepares himſelf for the moſt improſperous, that ſo he may not be ſurpriz'd by them. He is honorable, honeſt, punctual, ſecret, and as great a friend as poſſibly can be. His manners are very innocent; yet his vertue is nothing auſtere towards others; but on the contrary, he conceives the wiſer a man is, the more he is oblig'd to excuſe the light follies of his Friends. He is naturally inclin'd to ambition and action, but his vertue renders him ſo abſolute a Maſter of his mind, that he conforms himſelf admirably well to moderation and quiet. 'Tis true, this quiet is ſufficiently honourable to him; for his vertue, and his great love of juſtice and truth being known to all the world, he is the comforter of his unfortunate friends, the umpire of many great conteſts, and the depoſitory of the laſt wills of divers eminent, who would be aſſur'd at their death to have their intentions perform'd. For Lyſimantus is incapable of bending for any reſpect whatſoever, when he ſees virtue does not require it; and indeed all the Grandeur of the World, nor death it ſelf cannot make him demur a moment to do his duty. He believes a man is not oblig'd to be happy, but is oblig'd to be virtuous; and he thinks he ſhould be more miſerable if he could reproach himſelf with an action of weakneſs, than if he were expos'd to the moſt cruel perſecution that ever was. In which regard he confines himſelf ſo ſcrupulouſly to do what he ought, that he can never fail in it; and friendſhip, as powerful as it is in his heart, has never been able to cauſe him to omit the leaſt thing which he thought himſelf oblig'd in honour to do, though it were in the moſt nice and difficult occaſions. Nevertheleſs, he loves his Friends very tenderly; for, being Love in general never much touch'd his heart, though he may be not uncapable of a great paſſion, his Friendſhip is thereby the more ardent and tender. But how ſtrong ſoever it be, the love of glory and virtue have always the greateſt influence upon him. 'Tis true, he does not flatter himſelf with ſelf-conceit in theſe occaſions, nor make a pretext of juſtice to the diſadvantage of Friendſhip; but he ſo well underſtands the juſt bounds of generoſity, juſtice, and friendſhip, that he is never miſtaken in them. Nevertheleſs, he has a virtue which he is troubled to give bounds to in his heart. For he believes goodneſs ought almoſt never to have any, and therefore he makes a particular profeſſion of being good; and this is ſo much the more excellent, in that having a very high Soul, his goodneſs has nothing in it but what is noble, and can never be ſuſpected of weakneſs. Were I minded, I could relate to you a hundred eminent actions of this illuſtrious man, which would confirm that which I ſay; but ſince I know he loves not to have his actions publiſht, I ſhall conform to his humor, and deprive you of a very great pleaſure by depriving him of a great glory. But though I forbear to tell you any thing of his life, yet I ſhall at leaſt inform you that he was dearly belov'd by the illuſtrious Meriander (whom you have heard ſo much ſpoken of) and is infinitely ſo at preſent by the generous Theander, the prudent Theodamas, the agreeable Teramus, the ingenious Amilcar, the illuſtrious Herminius (whom he ſaw at Syracuſa) and by a man of eminent worth call'd Clidamantus, who has a high and tender heart, a very great capacity, with all noble inclinations, who is very ſenſible of Love and Friendſhip, who is honourable and generous, who writes excellently both in Verſe and Proſe, who cannot ſubmit to any thing but Reaſon, whoſe Will is ardent in whatſoever he effects, who is decent and magnificent, and who by a thouſand great and excellent qualities has deſerv'd the friendſhip of Lyſimantus. I am raviſht with this Character of your illuſtrious Friend (anſwer'd Plotina) but I beſeech you, tell me whether Meleander lov'd him always alike till his death. He ſo tenderly lov'd him (reply'd Merigenes) that he left him his portrait, and made choice of him to execute his laſt intentions. Nevertheleſs an adventure once befel them worthy to be related to you, which might have bred a feud betwixt them, if both of them had not had well-temper'd minds, and in which honour and friendſhip made a great conteſt in the heart of Lyſimantus. I beſeech you (ſaid Clelia) tell us that adventure. I will ſo (anſwer'd Merigenes) on condition the company will afterwards declare their ſentiments concerning the action of my Friend. I ſcruple not to engage my ſelf to this (replyed Clelia) for I perceive in the eyes of all that hear me they will do what you deſire. Know then (ſaid Merigenes) there was never a ſtraiter friendſhip than that which was between Lyſimantus and Meriander; for they had a great mutual affection and eſteem, and had no diſtinct intereſts. Being in this condition, Fortune engag'd them to follow a great Prince into a ſtrange Countrey, where having continued a ſufficient long time, it hapned that this Prince's affairs becoming in another poſture, he took a reſolution to depart ſecretly out of the Countrey whither he had retir'd, and diſcover'd his purpoſe to Lyſimantus and ſome other beſides, with order to tell no perſon whatſoever of it, and to ſteal away with himſelf the next night, without giving intelligence of it to any. Lyſimantus then found himſelf in an extreme plunge; for on the one ſide honour requir'd him to be faithful to his Maſter, and on the other friendſhip would not permit him to deſert his Friend in a ſtrange Country, where he might be ill treated, or at leaſt arreſted after the departure of the Prince. However, though Lyſimantus lov'd Meriander more than his own life, yet believing he could not reveal his Maſter's ſecret without perfidiouſneſs, he told Meriander nothing of it, and reſolv'd to go with the Prince till he had conducted him into a place of ſafety, and to return afterwards to find his Friend and partake of the ſame Fortune with him, how bad ſoever it might prove. The buſineſs was done accordingly; Lyſimantus followed the Prince, and Meriander ſtay'd behind, and was extremely aſtoniſht at the departure of his Friend. But having a good opinion of the heart of his Friend, he complain'd rather of his own misfortune than of him, and took it not ill that honour had been more prevalent in his mind than friendſhip, and that not being able to ſatisfie the one without violating the other, he had prefer'd his duty before all things. Wherefore having found out a way to eſcape, and gone to ſeek the Prince upon the frontier, from whence his Friend was ready to return back to him, he was ſo generous as not to make him the leaſt reproach. On the contrary he embrac'd him with ardency; and when Lyſimantus would have told him what a ſorrow it was to him to have been prohibited by his duty from revealing the ſecret to him wherewith he had been intruſted, I beſeech you (ſaid he) have not ſo ſad an opinion of me as to ſuſpect that I blame you; for if I did, it would imply that I might be capable of a Treaſon. Do not then treat me in this manner, I conjure you, and believe that if I had been in your place, I should have done as you have: but if any alteration has hapned in my heart, 'tis that I esteem you more than I did before. Ha! Meriander (cry'd Lysimantus) this action of yours is far more excellent than mine; and if you have encreas'd your esteem of me, I am oblig'd to augment (if possible) my affection for you.

Ha! Merigenes (cry'd Plotina) that which you relate seems to me so excellent, so noble and heroical, that my reason is dazled with it. And sincerely (added she) I know not which deserves the greater admiration, Lysimantus or Meriander. For my part (said Clelia) I judge Meriander to have taken a very commendable course: but since there was no other in reason to be taken, and since that which Lysimantus did, was more difficult to resolve on, I conceive more praises are to be given to Lysimantus than to Meriander. If you please to consider (said Anacreon) you will find it a greater difficulty to keep our selves from being sway'd by our own interests, and to judge equitably in favour of a Friend when we are both judges and parties. But however (said Valeria) the matter was not very ambiguous; for no man ought ever to betray his Master in favour of a Friend. 'Tis true (answer'd Amilcar) but there are so many people who betray their Masters for considerations less noble, that a man cannot be too much commended who did what he ought at such a time, when he could not do it without exposing his Friend to be arrested in a strange Country. But yet I would know (said Plotina) when 'tis lawful to desert one's Friend. Never (said Valeria) but being 'tis forbidden for a man to be perfidious to his Master, in some occasions there may be a necessity of declining to serve his Friends as he desires. But to speak truth, these unhappy occasions are few; for it is requisite that they be indispensable duties, and such as are required toward our Prince, Father, or Country: nevertheless at the same time we ought to be capable of entring into all the interests of those we love, and to be sensible of whatever concerns them: it is requisite that their honour be mingled with our own, and that we be more ready to pardon injuries done to our selves than to our Friends. Finally, we ought positively to do more for our Friend than we would do for our selves. By what Merigenes has related (said Clelia) it appears that Lysimantus thought himself oblig'd even to perish with his Friend, since he resolv'd to return where he had left him; and 'tis easie to judge what he was capable of doing for him, by what he would have done against himself, lest his Friend might suspect him of too little affection. But that which I account most praise-worthy in Meriander (added Valeria) is, that he believ'd his Friend when he told him of his intention to return, and that without doubting a moment of what he said. For 'tis one of the greatest priviledges of Friendship to believe a Friend, as we would be believ'd by him. For if you think him capable of dissimulation, you ought to withdraw your friendship from him; and for my part, I confess, that I am sensibly troubled when that which I say, is doubted of; because I am incapable of lying: besides, assoon as distrust is admitted amongst friends, friendship it self is in danger to be destroy'd. Undoubtedly Valeria has reason (answer'd Amilcar) and there is nothing more disgustful than to call in doubt that which a Friend assures you of, and nothing likewise that more argues the weakness of friendship in him that doubts; for if he takes his Friend for a sincere person, why does he not believe him? and if he think him false, why does he not discard him? Assuredly 'tis confidence which is the most indissolvable bond of heroical friendship. So Meriander (who was vertue it self) presently believ'd Lysimantus; and to conclude, it may be said, without determining precisely which of the two deserves most commendations in this occasion, that either of them did all which they ought to do, to merit a greater mutual esteem. In truth (said Plotina then) I think there are not found many such Friends as Lysimantus and Meriander; and 'tis prudence not to believe lightly that we have found one, for fear of being deceived. For my part (said Amilcar) I am perswaded, that the World has in general been always alike, that there has been always vice and virtue, that what is not in one place is in another. And for what concerns me (said Plotina) I think Merigenes has done a master-piece in entertaining our minds so agreeably with the relation he has made us; for ordinarily narrations somewhat long do not much divert, and the custom of relating such continually ought to be avoided; as I know some who never speak but of the time pass'd, and always recounting what they have seen, say nothing of what they see. 'Tis true (answer'd Amilcar) these eternal tellers of Stories are sometimes much to be fear'd. Some are confus'd, others too long, some are so peevish that they will never be interrupted, others on the contrary interrupt themselves, and at the end know not what they have spoken, nor what they intended to speak: such as recount things that are not much cared for nor delightful in themselves, are more troublesome than the Tellers of Stories. Yet I had one day sufficient pleasure (said Plotina) in playing a prank once in my life in a company where I was; for after they had diverted themselves with a hundred several things, it was concluded to refer the divertisement of the rest of the day to me. Wherefore when they had walkt, danc't and been entertain'd with a sumptuous collation, I thought it would be best to contrive some kind of amusement in the conversation. But being there were some persons in the company of no great Wit, I confess that judging they were not fit to be diverted seriously, I made a malicious piece of railery, which was to engage them all to obey me, and to speak concerning what I pleas'd. And so chusing such subjects for these people to speak of as they understood least, I made them say very pleasant things. For my part (said Valeria) I should be much puzled if I were obliged to speak of several things which I understand not. And, as for me (said Clelia) I speak not much but of that which affects my heart. For my particular (said Amiclea) I speak indifferently what I have seen; and I what I think (added Merigenes.) I am then more dextrous than all you (said Amilcar) for methinks I speak alike well of every thing. At least you speak sometimes very pleasantly of others (answer'd Plotino) and though you believe you always do wonders (added she) yet I am confident you will not make a description of a handsome place so well as Amiclea. I grant it (reply'd he) but I can boast that I do it better than any thing else, except loving you; for, as for that, I not only surpass others, but I daily surpass my self. I beseech you (said she smiling) do not confound your descriptions, leave that of your affection to another time, and content your self to describe to us some fair House, or Garden, that we may ſee your skill. But if he deſcribe a place to us which we have not ſeen (ſaid Valeria) we ſhall not know whether he deſcribe it well or no. If you will refer your ſelves to Merigenes (anſwer'd Amilcar) I will deſcribe one to you, in which your fancy may walk with incredible pleaſure; for there is not a fairer in the World. They ſay 'tis ſo dry in Africa (reply'd Amiclea) that I hardly think you can make ſo handſome a deſcription if you chuſe a place of your own Country. No, no (anſwer'd Amilcar) do not fear my judgment, for 'tis at leaſt as great as my Wit. And therefore I ſhall deſcribe to you a very fair Place in Aſia, which I know Merigenes has ſeen, and which is not far from Babylon. Then 'tis the fair houſe of Telaſtus and Meliſanta (reply'd Merigenes.) 'Tis the ſame (ſaid Amilcar.) Your choice is admirable (anſwer'd Merigenes) and you cannot miſtake in the corner of a Walk, but I ſhall perceive your error. But 'tis a long way from hence to Aſia (ſaid Amiclea.) As for the Voyages of the fancie (anſwer'd Plotina) they are ſo eaſily made, that it will be no trouble to me to go to Babylon in a moment. But how will you know (ſaid Valeria) whether Amilcar repreſents a place well which you never ſaw, and never will? 'Tis ſufficient (anſwer'd ſhe) that I ſee whether he knows how to make a handſom Idea of a fair place; he that ſo much derides thoſe that put the Baſes upon the Chapters: for as for my own part, I confeſs to my ſhame, when I have been in a brave Garden, I could ſay nothing of it but that it was extremely handſome, delightful, and admirable. Then I ſhall excel you (anſwer'd Amilcar) and to manifeſt ſo much, attend to me ſilently, and have a little patience. If I would make a bare plat-form, I ſhould ſoon have done; but intending to make you a faithful Portraiture, I muſt deſire a little time. Yet I confeſs ingenuouſly, the place I am going to deſcribe to you, which is called Mount Euphrates, has ſuch extraordinary Beauties, that I think it impoſſible to delineate them well. It is ſo near Babylon, that it requires but a quarter of an hour to go thither. 'Tis true, the mountain upon which it is ſituated, is a little towards the right ſide of the City, but nevertheleſs, there is no difficulty at all in the way; beſides, if one pleaſes to go a little about, there is a way leads to it, the ſlopeneſs of which is almoſt imperceptible. As for the Building, it has nothing very magnificent on the outſide, but it is admirably commodious within. The apartments of it are handſome; there are Halls, Chambers, Galleries, and ſo pleaſant, convenient, and agreeable a Cabinet, that nothing can be deſired more in it. For after having paſſed through a great Hall, and a handſome Chamber, one enters into it by a carved Door, the borders of which are guilded. The form of this Cabinet is ſquare, it is painted and guilded all about, and on three ſides of it are Looking-glaſſes with guilded frames, which by reflection receive all the Objects of the moſt goodly Country that ever was ſeen, and of one of the faireſt Gardens in the World; ſo that ſitting upon the rich Cuſhions which are about it, or upon a little Couch which is on the ſide oppoſite to the Door, one ſees on all ſides a moſt agreeable ſight. For theſe ſeveral Looking-glaſſes not only give ſeveral repreſentations of a brave Country, a Garden, and the ſquare Ponds of water, as well as the Company which is in it; but they multiply themſelves, and by the diverſity of their reflexions agreeably deceive the eyes, and pleaſingly amuſe the imagination. And to make an end of deſcribing this admirable Cabinet, I ſhall tell you, that there is a kind of a ſhelf, in form of a Corniſh which lyes round about above the Looking-glaſſes. This ſhelf is painted and guilded, like all the reſt of the Cabinet, and ſeveral curious and magnificent veſſels are ſeen upon it. But that which chiefly renders this Cabinet admirable, is, that it has a large Bow-window from whence is ſeen all that which I am going to deſcribe to you. But to do it well, it is requiſite to return back the ſame way, to the end to repreſent to you all that is perceiv'd in an inſtant, when having gone through a very handſome paſſage, and croſs'd a great Court, one arrives at the Porch, and advances up the ſteps. Conceive then, that one is no ſooner arriv'd at the place I ſpeak of, but there is diſcovered the faireſt ſight in the World; for to omit ſpeaking of a great Terraſs walk which lies between two agreeable Groves, I will only tell you that it is a ſtately ſtone Balcone, beyond which is ſeen a large green plat with diviſions and borders of Flowers round about, and three Walks on the two ſides of it, as it were to lead the ſight to a fair Fountain, which is ſo much the more admirable, for that it is plac'd upon the top of a Mount. Beyond this Fountain which has a very ſtately Baſin, is another green plat made Terraſs-wiſe, with three ſtately entrances of ſtone-work, and two large ſquare lakes of water on the right and left ſide, almoſt as if Nature had inverted her order by placing lakes upon Hills, they are ſo great and handſome. 'Tis true, in approaching towards them, 'tis viſible enough that Art has aſſiſted Nature, for they are encompaſs'd with ſtone, the ſides of them are green turf, and there are low walks to go round about them, the borders of which are covered with perpetual verdure. So that theſe Ponds of water having each of them five Fountains ariſing up with ſharp ſpires, make a very agreeable Object with that Fountain in the middle I told you of before. Below this there is a third Terraſs'd green plat, more ruſtical than the ſecond, from whence being deſcended by other ſtone ſtairs, one ſees a Round of water with ſeveral Jets of Water, Rocks, Priſling-ſpouts, Napes, and all that the induſtry of men can add to Nature. But to bring back your imagination to the Porch (if I may ſo ſpeak) and make you well comprehend that which is ſeen there, know, that beſides the firſt and ſecond green-plat, the Fountain in the middle, and the two ſquare lakes of water, the proſpect reaches to above twenty miles diſtance, though the ſight be agreeably arreſted by a very delectable variety. For beyond the incloſure of the Park is ſeen a hill on the left hand, which is cultivated by husbandry, and in ſtead of hindring the ſight, leads it towards the faireſt Object in the world; for there is diſcovered a Royal Houſe ſtanding in a Plain, which has ſeveral ſtately Towers of ancient ſtructure; and another proud modern Building, which one of the chief men of the World caus'd to be built there, to render this place more fit for the divertiſement of a great Prince. This Caſtle is accompanied with a great Wood, which is diſcover'd likewiſe, and is a marvellous ornament to the Country. More towards the right hand is ſeen another fair Houſe, which belongs to a man very illuſtrious both for his eminent Charges, and his great Qualities. And a little nearer is ſeen a Temple, in which are Virgins conſecrated to Diana, and ſeveral other Houſes of Perſons of Quality are diſcerned, which which adorn this Countrey with an agreeable variety. Beyond these fair Objects, which seem to serve chiefly to render the Prospect from Mount Euphrates more divertizing, is seen an admirable Plain which shews as if it were united with the sky; and on the right hand is seen the top of a rustick Temple, solitary plains, hills, copses, heaths, interjacent fields, and remote mountains, which rising insensibly one above another, withdraw themselves out of view by their distance. In brief, this sight is so surprising and excellent, that one cannot be but continually amaz'd and charm'd with it. However, I must change my station, and conduct you from the left side of the Porch into a great Walk which runs through a side of the Grove, and is cross'd by two other very solitary walks, in the concourse of which is a Fountain in the midst. Going towards which, one finds on the right hand a little end of a Walk, which suffering the sight to pass through the trees that reach up to the Sky, discovers at a distance the Royal House I mention'd, the prospect of which is so agreeable. But when amongst the sweet warblings of a thousand Birds who are the perpetual guests of this pleasant wood, you arrive at the Fountain, you find your self in the midst of several Walks, and in an admirable place. That which continues directly from the House, at the end rises up into a little Hill, and hath a Copse on the left side, and a spacious Meadow on the right. If one look towards the side where the sight is free, one sees the same Countrey I have described to you, but with another aspect; because by changing place, all the objects appear after a different manner. But after this, turning to the contrary side you behold the shadiness of the Wood, and pass into another Walk from whence is seen on the left hand a Meadow between two Woods, which is the most agreeable sight in the World; and on the right, another Meadow, and a little further a Copse. At the end of this Walk, one enters into a great Walk of the Wood, the Trees of which are so shady that they wholly intercept the rays of the Sun. From this place is a very agreeable prospect; for this walk at one end terminates in a kind of perspective and rising at the other between two handsome Copses, one mounts up a little Hill where are four Walks, and where the sight is so free that one would think himself master of the World. On one side is seen the same Countrey that was seen from the Porch, and several square Ponds of water; and on the left hand, many brave houses, and a plain of far greater extent. On the one side is seen a corner of Babylon, and the shady Woods; and on the other a rustick Temple, all Assyria, the proud Monuments of the ancient Kings of this Countrey, Villages, Towns, Cottages, Valleys and Mountains afar off, and so great an extent of Land, that the sight being unable to discern any thing more, the imagination supplies its deficiency, and makes one think he sees that which he does not, because he knows only that things ought to be there. After this you go back the same way, and turning at the bottom of the Hill, you ascend by little rustick solitary Walks which shew as if it were the remotest Desart in the World. All is wild and neglected, there is nothing to be seen there but Trees and shade; nor heard, besides Birds. By the way is seen a little place to take covert, but it was made only to rest in, or avoid the Rain: so that in this place the imagination cannot but be fill'd with solitary objects. But then, having gone some time in these little winding-walks, one arrives at a Walk as high as the Wood. It rises on the side toward the little Hill, and is very open: but at the other end it is very delightful with its shadiness. On the left side are divers cross Walks, which descend by degrees, and whose shew is gloomy and wild. A little further on the same side there is a place so charming, that a Painter could never invent any thing so handsome. And there is another, the objects of which, though handsome, have an appearance of solitariness that pleases infinitely. But without stopping at so many places, I must proceed to tell you, that having gone some time in this high Walk, one sees at the end a kind of shew, which at first is so confus'd, that 'tis not discernable what it is; but going further one would think he beheld a great River and the Masts of a Navy; a little after, one would imagine, it were some piece of admirable Perspective painted; but in approaching nearer, one finds that they are Towers and Pyramids, and that this is the most goodly and magnificent sight in the World. For through three large Windows which make up the whole side of a Cabinet built with a round arch'd roof, is seen in the plain directly opposite the great and stately City of Babylon, which by the Towers of its Temples, Palaces and hanging Gardens makes a confusion of gallant objects that dazles and amazes the imagination, especially when the Sun shines upon them in the morning. The admiration this Prospect excites, deprives some of speech, and causes others to make a thousand shouts; and the excellency of it cannot be imagined by any but those that have seen it. But the opposition of divers other things seen from the same place renders it more surprizing. For upon hillocks toward the right hand are seen many little Countrey-cottages, a rustick Temple something nearer, a small thicket of trees; on the left Vineyards, and Corn-fields, in the middle spacious and flowry Meadows, and furthest of all, the heads of Mountains crown'd with stately Palaces. And besides all this magnificence, there is a terrass'd Walk six hundred paces long, that affords the same prospect, which undoubtedly is the most admirable in the World. But fear of tediousness perswades me to omit the description of several cross Walks which meet at the entrances of the Cabinet from whence this rare prospect is seen; and not to mention to you the various and admirable prospects of them, I shall only tell you, that descending to the low Walk of the Wood there is an admirable one for variety, and that from thence is seen the same square Pond that was seen from the little Hill which is directly opposite to it. But in brief, being return'd into the low Walk, one goes out of it by great Stairs of stone, crosses the Court, and comes again into the Porch, the goodly prospect from whence comforts you agreeably for all the other fair objects which are no longer seen. But that which is remarkable, they to whom this gallant House belongs (who are noble Babylonians) are so worthy of it, that all the World rejoyces to see it in their power. For Telastus and Melisanta his wife are persons of great fame for vertue, in which respect they are highly esteem'd by all people of eminent quality and worth. Telastus is a comely personage, of a brown complexion, and a tall stature; he has a noble air, an agreeable smile, and is extremely civil. His mind is of a good temper, his conversation sincere, his judgment solid, and his capacity fits him for the most considerable employments. His fortune is no doubt very advantageously establisht: but he uses it so nobly, that no body is envious of his plenty. Whatever can be expected from magnificence guided by diſcretion, is to be found in his habitation. His Houſes are handſome, his Table is ſplendid, delicate and neat, he loves worthy perſons; and to compleat his felicity, the Gods have given him a Wife whoſe perfectly noble inclinations correſponding to his own, leave him nothing to deſire for his happineſs but to have children that may ſucceed and reſemble them. For Meliſanta is indu'd with all that can render an excellent woman conſiderable. She is not tall, but yet ſhe is well made, and has a very agreeable ſhape. She has brown Hair, a fair and lively complexion, blew Eyes, pretty, chearful and ſprightly. The ſhew of her countenance is agreeable, her ſmile very amiable, her Neck well made, her Arms and Hands delicate, and her geſtures free and and graceful. As for her mind, ſhe is infinitely ingenious, and has a ſprightly Wit that exerts it ſelf always in converſation, and never ſuffers her to be penſive. She has a quick and ready Fancy, ſhe ſpeaks very exactly and eaſily upon all occaſions; ſhe makes a divertizing relation in the moſt pleaſant manner poſſible; and her memory is ſo faithful to her, that I once heard her repeat a Diſcourſe made by the moſt Eloquent of the Babylonian Magi, without varying ſcarce any thing from it. As for her judgment, the conduct of her whole life gives an advantageous proof of it, it not being poſſible to find a perſon more ſolidly vertuous than ſhe. Nothing ever moleſts her, and ſhe ſatisfies all kind of duties without ſolicitude. There is not a woman in Babylon more exact in obſerving all things pertaining to her Religion; ſhe performs to her Relations all the offices ſhe ows them; ſhe does no leſs to her Friends, and never failing in any of the different occaſions whereto decency or civility engage her, ſhe has yet time enough left to ſpend in converſations and things indifferent. As for her Addreſs, one would think ſhe was deſign'd for every thing ſhe does; her Attire is well choſen, her Houſe-furniture is judiciouſly ſuted, and when ſhe gives a Collation to her Friends at her fair Houſe in the Countrey, nothing can be deſir'd more. Her ſlaves ſerve her with order, decency and reſpect, and ſhe underſtands the art of giving in the moſt gallant manner in the World. She has a Friend, to whom one day ſhe made a Preſent very ingeniouſly; for having taken notice of a very handſome Picture-caſe which ſhe wore hanging by a plain ſtring, and this Friend coming to viſit her, ſhe took it from her with more dexterity than a Lacedemonian could have done: ſo that this Lady believing it loſt, regretted the loſs of it four days together. But at length Meliſanta ſent her the Caſe which ſhe griev'd for, cauſing her to be told that it was recovered out of the hands of thieves; and whereas they had put a chain to it, ſhe conceiv'd ſhe might keep it without ſcruple, becauſe it was not known to whom to reſtore it, and no perſon came to demand it. But indeed this chain, which was of handſome workmanſhip, and had a very neat claſp belonging to it, was put to the Picture-caſe by Meliſanta, who by this ingenious liberality would make a Preſent under the colour of a theft. It is for you to judge by this of Meliſanta's mind, who beſides all I have told you, has yet another admirable quality; for ſhe has a very excellent and charming voice. She ſings as well as 'tis poſſible to ſing, and there's no perſon that hears her, but would think ſhe has a very paſſionate ſoul. Yet ſhe is ſometimes accus'd of not being ſenſible enough to friendſhip, and indeed I think it may be confidently ſaid without doing her injuſtice, that hers is uſually more generous than tender, though I think it not impoſſible for her to love with great dearneſs. However, her manner of loving is very commodious to her Friends and glorious to her ſelf, for ſhe is very careful of perſons whom ſhe loves; ſhe is officious, gentle, and agreeable, and ſhe has no friend but ows her a thouſand civilities and pleaſures: in brief, it may be thought that were Meliſanta as loving as ſhe is lovely, the friendſhip born towards her would be ſo exceſſive, that it would torment as much as if it were love. Ha! Amilcar (ſaid Plotina) I am extremely taken with Meliſanta, and ſhould like better to be with her at Mount Euphrates than in the Camp of Perſenna. However, as I am ſincere, I confeſs you are as great a Painter of Landskips as Pourtraitures; but before I commend ſo much as I deſire, Merigenes muſt tell me, whether Telaſus, Meliſanta, and Mount Euphrates are ſuch as you repreſent them. They are ſo like (anſwered Merigenes) that there is nothing more exact. All that Amilcar has ſpoken, has much diverted me (ſaid Valeria) but I ſhould not counſel another to make ſo long a narration, unleſs he could perform it as well. That which I admire (ſaid Amiclea) is, that Amilcar has ſo accurately retain'd all the particularities of ſo excellent a place. As for that (anſwer'd he) wonder not; for you muſt know, that all handſome Objects make ſo ſtrong an impreſſion in my mind, that they never are extinguiſht. But I declare to you freely that in an ordinary converſation I ſhould not have made my relation ſo long, for it is not fit to impoſe ſilence to a whole Company, only to ſhew that one knows how to ſpeak. After this, Amiclea withdrawing, the reſt of the company departed, ſo that Clelia, Plotina and Valeria being left alone, the two latter perceived that Clelia's melancholy was ſtill more augmented. What's the matter? my dear Siſter (ſaid Plotina to her) What new cauſe produces this ſadneſs? Clelia bluſht at this ſpeech, and would have paſs'd it without anſwering; but Valeria preſſing her thereto, Is it poſſible (ſaid ſhe to them) that you have not apprehended by the end of Amiclea's relation that Zenocrates is jealous of Aronces and Lyſimena? and that you know not, that this being join'd to all the other conjectures I have of my unhappineſs, I have ground to believe that Aronces is unfaithful, and that whilſt I obſtinately reject Horatius's affection, he is unconſtant to mine? To ſhew you (reply'd Plotina) that I am ſincere, though I am Siſter to Horatius, and think he is worthy of your love, yet I do not ſtick to aſſure you that Aronces is innocent, and that your jealouſie is as ill grounded as that of Zenocrates. But who knows (ſaid Clelia) whether Aronces does not conſent to the order which he has receiv'd, not to ſee me? for by this means we ſhall be ſent back to Rome without his ſeeing me, and when I ſhall be return'd thither, perhaps he will write to me that he could not diſobey the King his Father; and ſo without being expos'd to my reproaches, he will forget all his Oaths, and perhaps love me no more. But if this misfortune ſhould happen (added ſhe bluſhing with) I find I ſhould hate Aronces as much as I have lov'd him, and this bare ſuſpicion I have of him, cauſes ſuch a confus'd trouble in my heart, that I cannot diſtinguiſh what ſentiments I have in my Soul. As Clelia was ſpeaking in this manner, Lucilius enter'd, and ſeem'd to them very ſad. So that Plotina being ſolicitous concerning the cauſe of his

his ſadneſs, askt him haſtily, what the matter was. Alas! Madam (ſaid he ſighing) I am unwilling to tell you. Clelia and Valeria bluſhr, and looking upon Lucilius, Is it (ſaid Valeria) becauſe the peace is diſturb'd by the artifices of Tarquin? Or is it (added Clelia) becauſe Porſenna inſtead of keeping us for Hoſtages, determines to treat us like Priſoners? No, Madam (anſwered he) but 'tis becauſe he has caus'd the Prince to be arreſted, without any known cauſe, and ſeems extremely incenſed againſt him. How? (ſaid Clelia in a great ſurprize) is Aronces arreſted by Porſenna's Order? Yes, Madam (anſwered he) and the Camp is ſo mov'd, all the World is ſo aſtoniſh'd, and the Queen, and the Princeſs of the Leontines ſo afflicted at it, that it is impoſſible to expreſs to you the univerſal conſternation occaſion'd thereby. Clelia ſigh'd at theſe words, which at the ſame time redoubled both her diſcontents and her ſuſpicions. But is it not imagin'd (ſaid ſhe) for what reaſon he is arreſted? Not at all (anſwered Lucilius) all that is known, is, that ever ſince the cruel Tullia had ſo private a conference with Porſenna, he has been ſufficiently penſive and ſad; that yeſterday there came ſeveral men from that Princeſs, with whom Porſenna conferr'd in private; and that ſoon after he caus'd the Prince to be arreſted, and abſolutely commanded he ſhould not be ſuffer'd to ſpeak to any perſon. So that, Madam, I do not ſee, how he can ſo much as give any intelligence of himſelf to thoſe he loves moſt. Porſenna has alſo appointed that you be guarded with more care than ordinary, though he has commanded too, that you be always ſerved with reſpect.

The Queen and the Princeſs of the Leontines being deſirous to ſpeak concerning the Prince to Porſenna, he told them with ſufficient roughneſs, that when they knew his offence, they would hate him as much as they lov'd him; and till he could declare it to them, he deſir'd them not to ſpeak of him more. This I conceiv'd fit to let you know, Madam (added Lucilius) to the end that if you know any thing that may be prejudicial or advantageous to Aronces, you might make uſe of it as you judge convenient. Alas! Generous Lucilius (reply'd ſhe) I know nothing, ſaving that I am unhappy, and that if Aronces be no more criminal towards me than towards Porſenna, he is the moſt innocent of all men. A little while after this, Telanus brought a Letter from Aronces to Clelia, in which ſhe found theſe words.

The unfortunate Aronces to the Incomparable Clelia.

I Know not what I am accus'd of, Madam; but I know well, I have done nothing but lov'd you, ſince I began to be yours. Therefore pity me, I conjure you; and whatever befals me, be as faithful as I am.

Clelia read this Letter with a ſtrange agitation of mind; and Telanus having promis'd her to endeavor to deliver her anſwer to the Prince, before his Guards were abſolutely ſetled, ſhe writ and gave him her Letter: after which, being unable to diſſemble her grief, ſhe retir'd till Lucilius and Telanus were gone. But aſſoon as they were departed, Who ever ſaw (ſaid ſhe to Valeria and Plotina) a more unhappy perſon than I am? for I paſs not one day without ſome new misfortune. 'Tis but a moment ſince I was ſo far jealous as almoſt to hate Aronces, and at preſent I ſo commiſerate his unhappineſs, as to wiſh my ſelf priſoner in his room. For if it were ſo, he might deliver me; whereas I am able to do nothing but pity him, and pity him unprofitably. But after all, if I cannot ceaſe to be unhappy, I may perhaps at length ceaſe to live; there being no likelihood that I ſhall be always able to overcome grief. Valeria and Plotina did all they could to comfort her, but with no effect; and Clelia having paſs'd the reſt of the day in complaint, ſpent all the night in ſighing.

The end of the Firſt Book of the Fifth part of CLELIA.

CLELIA:

The Fifth and last Part.

BOOK II.

THE imprisonment of the Illustrious Aronces, as it produc'd a passionate sorrow in the breast of Clelia at the Camp, so it excited a secret joy in that of Horatius at Rome; it being not possible for a rival, how generous soever, not to be glad for such a misfortune as may conduce to render him happy. And in order hereunto, he urg'd Publicola and the second Consul with much importunity to expedite the performance of the Treaty. Herminius also was no less earnest for it; to the end he might see Valeria return: but as for Æmilius, Mutius, and Spurius, they would have rather chose never to see their Mistress again, than to be spectators of Herminius happiness by her Nuptials. Octavius being become amorous of Hermilia, ardently desir'd that the peace were concluded; Clelius also wisht it impatiently, that he might cause Clelia to marry Horatius; and all the Romans in general, unwillingly enduring that Tarquin and Tullia were still so near Rome, made continual vows for the accomplishment of the peace. As for Artemidorus, he recovered so fast in a few days, that his Physicians affirm'd he would shortly be able to go abroad; and in the mean time the Princess of the Leontines signified to him that she would visit him speedily about an important Affair, but her presence being necessary at Porsenna's Court for serving Aronces, she could not exactly set the time. This Message extremely discontented Zenocrates, whose mind being prepossess'd with jealousie, he believ'd that the cause of deferring to visit a Brother, could be no other than to serve a lover and not a friend. On the other side Berelisa and Clidamira seeing Artemidorus recover'd, made a resolution to go to Preneste, and Anacreon offer'd himself to accompany them. In the interim, all the most vertuous Gallants at Rome continually convers'd with these two fair persons in the absence of Clelia and Valeria. But for that their interests were extremely cross, it was easie to perceive that their hearts always dissented, though they liv'd very civilly together. As for Amilcar, though Plotina were not at Rome, and that considering the nature of Love, it may seem his heart ought to have been at the Camp, because his Mistress was there, yet he did not cease to divert himself upon occasion, and to laugh at Damon's hatred towards him. for he perceived that he hated him more for having made that deriding Dialogue against the sect of Pythagoras, than because he was his Rival. Nor did Aerisius love him very well, because he oftentimes hindred him from speaking as much as he desired, and also because he observ'd that he was attended to more favourably than himself. But, as for Horatius, his heart was always fill'd with hope, imagining to himself that when Clelia could no longer hope to marry Aronces, she would resolve to obey Clelius. As for Themistus and Meriones, they prepar'd themselves to depart speedily, but in the interim, they were almost continually with Clidamira and Berelisa, to whom also Cesonia frequently resorted. The imprisonment of Aronces no doubt was sensibly regretted by all that knew him, and even by such too as had only heard of his fame; but being they judg'd not that he was obnoxious to any criminal accusation, they accounted him only a Prisoner of State, whose life was out of all danger, because he was Son of him that caus'd him to be arrested. Wherefore some of his Friends omitted not to entertain themselves delightfully when occasion was presented; For those people are rarely found, who are deeply sensible of the misfortunes which befall even such as they love, or whose regret is of any long continuance. Compassionate grief is but transient, and soon dispell'd upon the dawning of the least pleasure; and no doubt the number of those persons is very small, who are so generous as to partake sincerely in all the concernments of those they love, and whose hearts are capable of being thoroughly toucht with the sorrows of others. But Amilcar's natural jovialness being an antidote against all sorts of sadness, he was always debonaire, whether he were at Rome or at the Camp; and having gotten a priviledge to himself of speaking the most disgustful truths without offence, he talkt to Berelisa and Clidamira about their differences with all manner of liberty.

liberty. Sometimes he ſpoke ſuch things to them as, had they not been capable of railery, would no doubt have ſufficiently perplexed them, though they were extremely delightful to the hearers. But one day Bereliſa ſaid pleaſantly to him in the preſence of Ceſonia, Clidamira and Anacreon, I fear Herminius too much perſwaded you to love truth when he diſcours'd ſo well againſt lying; for I have lately obſerv'd you ſpeak your mind, without ſcrupling at any thing which you ſee. Since I do it, without offence to any perſon (anſwered Amilcar) wherefore do you blame me? I blame you (reply'd Bereliſa) becauſe you give an example which will be ſo badly followed, that all ſuch as would imitate you will be inſufferable. For it is more difficult than 'tis believ'd, to jeſt with Friends without diſpleaſing them. 'Tis true (ſaid Clidamira) uſually people go further than is fitting. Indeed (added Anacreon) 'tis not enough to ſpeak plainly that which true reaſon allows one to ſpeak; for we ought to underſtand thoſe perſons fully beforehand to whom we uſe freedom of ſpeech. For moſt frequently, ſuch as love to put jeſts upon others are leaſt willing to take them; and therefore it behoves to conſider ſuch well with whom we converſe in that manner, and to chuſe the words we make uſe of; ſince many times a word a little too hard embitters the pleaſing guſt of railery. Believe me (ſaid Ceſonia) leſs than a word will ſometimes make that change; for only the tone of the voice is ſufficient to alter the ſence of a ſpeech; a malicious ſmile turns an innocent jeſt into a Satyr; and in brief, nothing requires more judgment than to practiſe railery inoffenſively. And for my part I never ſaw any but Plotina, and Amilcar, that knew how to make this innocent war handſomly, which renders converſation delightful, and which always ends in joy when the practiſers of it are good and ingenious. Nevertheleſs, (anſwered Anacreon) they are in juſtice to be excus'd who are not ſo dextrous and agreeable as Plotina and Amilcar. I beſeech you, Anacreon (ſaid this ingenuous African) do not undertake to praiſe me; for being both of us make Verſes, we ſhall be liable to be reckon'd among thoſe Poets that commend one anothers Verſes, though they frequently jar in proſe. 'Tis true, this laſt can never be applyed to us; for I know you ſpeak much better of me than I deſerve, and I as much of you as you merit. For my part (ſaid Clidamira) I confeſs I extremely hate thoſe people who commend all perſons and things without diſtinction, and there is nothing leſs obliging than profaned praiſes, which have been employed a thouſand and a thouſand times in extolling ſuch as ought rather to be blam'd. As for groundleſs praiſes (anſwered Bereliſa) I hate them as well as you; but I confeſs I much love to excuſe the defects of others. Yet there are ſome (replyed Anacreon) who deſerve not very well to be excus'd. How ſhall we know them? (ſaid Clidamira.) It is not very difficult (anſwered Anacreon) for I conceive 'tis more juſt to excuſe the defects which are incident to the condition or age we are of, than thoſe which are oppoſite to it. As a covetous old man deſerves rather to be excus'd, than a young miſer; for although 'tis a folly to heap up treaſure when a man has not much occaſion for it longer, nevertheleſs, as 'tis a defect frequently attending old age, they that are guilty of it are the more pardonable. By the ſame reaſon it ought not to be accounted ſo ſtrange for an old man to love to recount what he has ſeen in his youth, and to be addicted to make long ſtories, as for a young, who having yet ſcarce ſeen any thing, affects to be longer in relating that little which he has ſeen than he was in ſeeing it. No Queſtion this is very juſt (ſaid Ceſonia:) and I conceive that 'tis fit to excuſe the defects not only which ſeem peculiar to a certain age or condition, but thoſe which are proper to Nations too; for in truth, every people have their faults and vertues. That which you ſpeak, is true (anſwer'd Ceſonia:) But are there any conditions that draw their defects along with them? No doubt there are (reply'd Amilcar) and for example, is it poſſible for them which are in the chief imployments of Commonwealths never to fail of what they promiſe? Ha! Amilcar (cry'd Bereliſa) unhappy are they who are conſtrain'd by the greatneſs of their imployments to fail frequently of their word; and happy they, who in great Fortunes retain exactly the vertues of private perſons, and who for fear of being defective to themſelves, are never ſo to any. However (ſaid Amilcar) I am perſwaded thoſe which are in a certain degree, cannot always do all that they deſire; and they deſerve to be excus'd, if it appear ſometimes that they do not do all which they ought, becauſe very often we are very ignorant of that which may ſerve to juſtifie them. But to ſpeak a little leſs ſeriouſly, is it not true that when a Lover is long abſent from his Miſtreſs, if he happens to meet with ſome fair perſon who ſeems to tell him by her looks, that ſhe would not be ſorry to be lov'd, he deſerves to be excus'd, if ſometimes he uſes obliging blandiſhments to her? For my part, I am of your opinion (ſaid Clidamira.) I imagined you would be ſo (anſwered Bereliſa ſmiling) but for my part, who place fidelity above all things, I aſſure you I cannot excuſe unfaithful Lovers, though I willingly excuſe all other weakneſſes. Yet there is ſo great a number of ſuch (reply'd Amilcar) that 'tis in a manner neceſſary to excuſe them, for fear of being oblig'd to blame almoſt all men. On the contrary (ſaid Bereliſa) 'tis becauſe there are too many of them, that we ought to take heed of excuſing them, for fear of encreaſing the number, which is already but too great. As for me (ſaid Clidamira) I believe there are more of them than 'tis thought, for I know ſome who hold it for a Maxim, that conſtancy is always to be talk'd of, but inconſtancy practis'd when any favourable occaſion is offer'd for it. For my part (ſaid Anacreon) I conceive it would be more gallant to make a ſhew of greater inconſtancy than we practiſe in reality. And, as for me (ſaid Amilcar) I conclude that we ought to to do that always which pleaſes us, without conſidering whether we are conſtant or inconſtant, becauſe pleaſure (to ſpeak properly) conſiſts not in the things which we do, but only in doing our own wills. For example, I confeſs that were I to have a long love in a place where I could have no other, I think, that to avoid the lukewarmneſs of long loves, I ſhould renew the ardor of my paſſion by making now and then ſome ſmall quarrel with my Miſtreſs, ſo as almoſt to break quite off with her, and our reconcilement would ſeem to me a kind of novelty. You are too ingenious by half (ſaid Bereliſa) and I doubt not but if Plotina continue long at Porſenna's Camp, you will ſeek to comfort your ſelf at Rome with ſome fair one, when you ſhall be conſtrain'd to come hither. Ha! charming Bereliſa (cry'd he) do not too cruelly taunt me; but believe I have more love for Plotina than I had for ſix other Miſtreſſes which I had one day at once. I perceive (ſaid Anacreon then) 'tis fit that I interrupt rupt this discourse a little, and demand of the Company, Wherefore, since Love is a sentiment so universal that Nature never fails to inspire it, men have offer'd to condemn it, or at least to make so great a Mystery of it? To render it more delightful (answer'd Amilcar hastily) for without the several formalities that are us'd in it, Love would not be that which it is. Besides, to speak sincerely (added he) Ceremonies make up the principal beauty of many things; for example, separate a sacrifice from the Temple, the Altar, the Wood-pile, the holy Vessels and Knives, the fillets of the Victims, and Garlands of Flowers which crown them, and you will see nothing but a miserable animal, which is no fairer than another of its kind; for, many times men are so wicked as to make but a bad choice of Victims. I beseech you (said Cesonia then) do not confound things thus; let us jest about love as much as you please, but never mingle Religion amongst your follies; for you have too much wit to do as some young people, new-come into the World, who think nothing so fit to produce them the reputation of great capacities, as to disdain the sentiments of their Fathers. Than which nothing is more contrary to true reason, or which sooner makes a man be look'd upon as a fantastick. Indeed (said Berelisa) it behoves never to make a particular way to ones self in these matters, the wiser sort of people ought to be constantly followed in the ordinary path, and we ought not to go wandring out of a conceit to find one more commodious. But let us take heed we do not wander too much our selves (said Amilcar laughing) for we are far from the beginning of our discourse, which was concerning the art of jesting with Friends. We are not very far from it (reply'd Cesonia smiling) for in speaking as you do, you imploy your railery upon me, and teach me how to use it towards others. As Cesonia was speaking thus, one came to advertise Amilcar, that a stranger was newly arriv'd at his Lodgings, who desir'd to speak with him with much earnestness. Whereupon he was constrain'd to go away thither. Presently after, Themistus enter'd, and told the company there was a report that Porsenna accus'd Aronces of a horrible crime: a moment after, Herminius came, and said he had heard the same thing; but added, that whatever the rumor meant, he was strongly perswaded that Aronces was innocent.

What then is it (said Berelisa) which they accuse him of? She had scarce pronounced these words when the Princess of the Leontines enter'd, who having first been to see Artemidorus, came to Clidamira's lodgings to see Berelisa. Assoon as the first Ceremonies were over, I beseech you, Madam (said Herminius to her) be pleas'd to gratifie the company so far as to tell them whether it be true that the King of Hetruria accuses his Son of a horrid crime. Alas! (answer'd she sighing) 'tis but too true, that he accuses him for having held intelligence with Mutius in designing his death; and some body has so strongly perswaded him that this unfortunate Prince was carried by an excess of love to conspire against him, that the Queen of Hetruria and my self have no small trouble to restrain his indignation. How! Madam (said Herminius) is it possible for Porsenna to suspect the most vertuous Prince in the World of having had such a design as this! Yes (answer'd she) and the ease is so much the more cruel, because he will not yet tell by what way he came to be perswaded of this belief. Although none doubts, but that 'tis a contrivance of the cruel Tullia. But can credit be given to a Woman (said Cesonia) that has pass'd with her Chariot over the body of her Father? It seems she is believ'd (answer'd the Princess) being Aronces is a prisoner; and Porsenna yesterday said openly, the Prince his Son was a Parricide. Wherefore being desirous to serve him (in all that I am able (added she) I am come to see the Prince my Brother, to get him to go to Mutius and oblige him to assist us to justifie Aronces, who is accus'd of being an abettor of his intended assassinate. But as ill fortune will have it, though Artemidorus has sent to enquire for him at his own house, he is not to be found in any place. Yet I met him last night in the streets (said Herminius) I saw him too (added Themistus) but it was out from my Windows this morning, and he was on horse-back in a Countrey-habit with two slaves only. If he be gone far (answer'd Lysimena) it will prove ill for Aronces; for his absence would be interpreted as a flight, and he would be thought to have conspir'd with him, instead of designing only to deliver Rome. And therefore (added it) it is very fit to inquire at his house whither he is gone. I shall take that upon me (said Herminius) for one of my attendants is a great Camrade of one of his. And accordingly Herminius sent one of his followers forthwith to get information of that which Lysimena desir'd to know. But word was brought her, that having had a long conversation with Publicola, he departed very discontented, without acquainting any whither he went. This caus'd much regret in all the company. However I cannot (said Herminius then) think it possible that Porsenna will put Aronces to death. I will not believe it (answer'd the Princess of the Leontines) but I cannot choose but fear it. Nevertheless Porsenna is a very noble Prince, and indu'd with humanity; but the cruel Tullia terrifies me, and all the Tarquins (saving Titus) make me apprehensive of the worst. 'Tis true, there are divers eminent persons which protect Aronces; for the generous Melintha takes all opportunities to serve him, and the fair Hesilia who lives with Galerita, does no less. Lusilius and a Brother of his, are as careful of his interests; Titus and Tolumnius imploy all their endeavours for him, and the Lovers of Terentia, and Aurelisa omit nothing that may conduce to his assistance. As for Galerita, she uses all the prudent arts possible, to serve him; and for my part were I his Sister, I could not do more than I do. But, Madam (said Berelisa) does Clelia know what Aronces is accus'd of? I believe she does (answer'd Lysimena) and that which renders her more worthy of pity, is, that she is unable to afford the Prince any redress, and that to her discontent, Sextus is again become as amorous of her as ever, and perhaps more than ever he was of Lucretia. So that she is very much to be pity'd; for though Porsenna ought not to violate the Law of Nations, and so 'tis probable the Hostages are in safety in the Camp, yet she has some very disconsolate hours, and the Queen of Hetruria and my self have desir'd Lucilius and Tolumnius to take especial care of guarding these twenty fair Romans. Since the generous Melintha, Lucilius and his illustrious Brother (reply'd Herminius) are Aronces's friends, I am very much comforted. Being I was not well (said Berelisa) when Lucilius came hither, I did not see him; but I have heard much good spoken of him. Too much you could not (answer'd Lysimena) and to let you know what manner of persons these two illustrious friends of Aronces are, I will describe them to you. And to begin with him that was not at Rome, whoſe name is Theomenes; you may know that 'tis not poſſible to be endu'd with more vertue than he is. I need not tell you that his extraction is noble, for you are not ignorant that he is Brother to the generous Melintha; you know his family is very ancient, and that his Father was a man of eminent worth. As for his perſonage, he is of an indifferent ſtature, his Hair is Cheſnut, his eyes black, his viſage round, and if one well obſerve it, he has ſomething in his Phyſiognomy ſo pretty and good together, and he always ſmiles ſo pertinently, that ſometimes he makes it appear in a moment that he underſtands things which could not be related in a day if any one ſhould attempt it. Theomenes has receiv'd from Nature a great ſtock of wit, eſpecially of that which is judicious and diſcreet, which examines and ſounds the depth of things, which will neither affect nor chuſe any thing without knowledge; of that wit, I ſay, which meddles with nothing without calling the judgment to its aſſiſtance. And nevertheleſs Theomenes wants not a lively and quick fanſie, and he is one, whoſe conjectures reſolve the moſt difficult things with the greateſt facility imaginable. I have ſeen him ſometimes in places where you would have ſaid he took no heed to what paſs'd, and yet he not only obſerv'd even the very leaſt things that were ſpoken or done there, but he divin'd the moſt ſecret intereſts of all that were preſent in the company. Theomenes has not only a very piercing and ſolid wit naturally, but he has improv'd it with great diligence. So that he judges well of all things, he accurately underſtands handſome compoſures, and never condemns or applauds any thing, for which he cannot give a good reaſon. In the beginning of his life he compos'd very amorous and delightful Verſes, and he makes ſuch ſtill when he pleaſes; he ſpeaks very exactly, and his converſation is extremely pleaſing. For no argument of diſcourſe comes amiſs to him, from Husbandry to Aſtrology, and from the moſt jovial Gallantry to the ſublimeſt Policy. And for my part, I have ſometimes remain'd aſtoniſht to ſee that Theomenes equally well underſtood both important and inconſiderable affairs, and to find that ſo wiſe a man as he, did not neglect to be perfectly inform'd of all the follies of his Age. If the profeſſion Theomenes has choſen had not oblig'd him to a particular reſtraint, his ſoul would have been capable of very much love, but ſuch a love as is real, tender, firm and generous together. But his fortune having diſpos'd of him after another manner, he underſtands love at preſent only in others, but has abandon'd his heart to friendſhip, which has prov'd very happy to him, for he has many illuſtrious friends of both ſexes, by whom he is greatly eſteem'd and belov'd. He is by natural inclination officious, equitable, good and generous. He is exact both in ſmall and great matters, he knows when 'tis fit to engage couragiouſly in the intereſts of thoſe he loves, to concern himſelf for their honour, to reſent injuries done to them, to love all that they love, to hate all that they hate, and to diſdain all ſuch as do not eſteem them. He is none of thoſe people who would prevaricate in certain occaſions, who would preſerve both Friends and Enemies, and who without diſtinguiſhing the virtuous from them that are not ſuch, ſometimes fail thoſe that never deſerted them. On the contrary Theomenes is faithful in all occaſions, ſincere in all tranſactions, and always very ſenſible of whatever concerns his true Friends.

Perhaps I inſiſt a little too long in commending Theomenes, for this excellent qualification of his; but I confeſs 'tis becauſe it is ſo very rare in theſe days, and becauſe I believe it neceſſary for a man of honour. For I conceive when our chief Friends tell us they have enemies to fight with, the firſt thing to be ask'd them, is, Where they are? and not, Who they are? For, be they who they will, we ought to be abſolutely againſt them. But on the contrary, when Friends of the ſecond Order come to tell us they have enemies, we muſt firſt ask them, who they are? that ſo we may be never in danger of doing any thing againſt our true Friends, which we know well can never be in the wrong. But as for Theomenes, he ſo perfectly underſtands all the rules of true friendſhip, and his heart is ſo naturally addicted to follow them, that 'tis ſcarce poſſible for him to fail in any of them. Moreover, Theomenes is gentle, ſociable, complacent, wiſe, and diſcreet. He has both moderation and equity, he conforms himſelf to the World, and diverts himſelf with it, and he knows how to enjoy in ſolitude all the pleaſures which it affords. He knows how to make the Court a Theatre to entertain him; and, which is moſt commendable, he knows ſo to live there, that his vertue is not alter'd by all the bad Examples which he ſees in it. Thus you ſee what a perſon Theomenes is, who beſides all I have ſaid of him, has ſo great an inclination to honour all that are indu'd with vertue, that it may be affirm'd, that if he were Maſter of all the favours which are in Fortunes beſtowing, not one vertuous perſon ſhould have cauſe to complain of her. For my part (ſaid Bereliſa) I am already Theomenes's Friend, though I never ſaw him. Certainly (ſaid Clidamira) you need no more to gain him than ſeeing of him, for you never deſir'd to get any thing but it became yours. Bereliſa is ſo charming (anſwer'd Themiſtus) that the power you ſay ſhe has is not to be wonder'd at. For my part (ſaid Herminius) who have the honour to know Theomenes, ſince the making of the Peace, I dare aſſure that the Princeſs of the Leontines has not flatter'd him, and that ſhe has made his Picture exactly like. I beſeech you, Madam (ſaid Bereliſa) tell me too what Lucilius is, who has been ſo much talkt of at Rome within theſe few days. He is ſuch a perſon (anſwer'd the Princeſs of the Leontines) that no Lover, be he never ſo deſerving, but ought to fear having him for his Rival. But ſince you have not ſeen this illuſtrious Brother of Melintha and Theomenes neither, I muſt tell you that he is of a tall perſonage, well made, and of a goodly preſence. His geſture is ſufficiently careleſs, his air very noble, his acceſs ſerious and civil, his Phyſiognomy happy, ſage, and agreeable, his hair cheſnut, his Viſage of a peculiar form, and his Noſe a little riſing. As for his eyes they are azure, ſweet, ſprightly, but not great, They have a certain faintneſs in them too, which renders them very ſutable for thoſe paſſionate glances which make things underſtood in a moment, and yet they have in ſome occaſions ſo jolly a ſmile, that 'tis apparent the heart of Lucilius may as well be capable of a ſenſible joy, as of a violent grief. His Complexion is good, for a man, and he has a little natural mark under his left Eye, which would well ſute with a Beauty, and is graceful to his countenance. Lucilius is neat, he attires himſelf like a man of Quality, and ſo as agrees well with his perſon; and if ſo worthy a perſon as he may be commended for ſmall accompliſhments, I ſay, there are many fair Ladies who would

wiſh they had hands as white as his. But indeed, I have too much to tell you of his Wit, his Courage, and his Virtue, to detain you longer with the deſcription of his perſon. Know then, that Nature has been liberal to Lucilius in giving him an extraordinary Wit, a Fancie of unmeaſurable extent, and a judgment which ſo well governs both, that he never ſpeaks any thing in converſation, of which he needs to repent. But indeed his Wit is one of thoſe which might well diſpenſe with learning any thing; becauſe conſidering things in themſelves, their own reflections inſtruct them better than they can be by all the Books in the world. For which cauſe Lucilius has ſpent no great number of years in ſtudy; but Travel, War, the Court, and his own Reaſon have been his Maſters. Nevertheleſs, he has read very much, and there are few excellent pieces of knowledge, which he does not underſtand; but he has read out of inclination, and not out of obedience, as ordinarily all young perſons do, that are deſign'd to be well educated. However, the Court, War, Travel, and his own Reaſon have ſo well inſtructed him, that 'tis believ'd he owes all his accompliſhments to learning; ſo well he underſtands all things, and ſpeaks ſo rationally of every thing that can be offer'd to diſcourſe. Lucilius's particular virtue is an incomparable fortitude, free from all the defects which are incident to the Valiant; for he is a ſtranger to vanity. He is gentle, civil, and moderate; nor did ever any other hate falſe glory, and love true, ſo much as he. Moreover, Lucilius is of an admirable equal temper; for his Friends always find him the ſame, and though he appears ſerious, and his conſtitution inclines a little to melancholy, yet he loves all allowable pleaſures. The jollity and mirth of his Friends pleaſe and divert him, to which he himſelf alſo contributes as much as they deſire, and is never refractory towards them. Lucilius has a ſenſe of honour, and generoſity, and he is conſtant in Love and Friendſhip. He has a firm Soul in adverſity, and whereas his Fortune has not been always happy, but he has met with ſeveral difficult encounters, been wounded and taken Priſoner in War, travel'd both by Sea and Land, his virtue has been ſeen to the proof, and 'tis known that he hath come off with honour in all occaſions, to which Fortune led him. In brief, Lucilius is valiant amongſt the valiant, learned amongſt the learned, gallant amongſt the Gallants, and equally prudent towards all. His Natural inclination has always carried him to Poetry and Love, and theſe two ſentiments are ſo much the more ingrafted in his heart, for that they ſubſiſt there one by another; for if Love has caus'd him to make Verſes in the beginning of his life, I account it not impoſſible, but that, in caſe he lives to that age in which love is no longer in ſeaſon, his inclination towards Verſes may alſo induce him to write of Love; becauſe Poetry and Love have ſuch a ſympathy, that they can ſeldom be divided one from the other. But I beſeech you, do not imagine that Lucilius makes ſuch Verſes as favour a little of the condition of the Authors, which may perhaps be call'd Gentile Verſes; becauſe for the moſt part perſons of that Quality are not skill'd enough in ſuch things to make them well. More intelligent perſons therein than my ſelf, profeſs, that Lucilius compoſes Verſes which might deſerve Homer or Heſiod for their Author. For there is a good Fancie, Wit, Strength, and ſo charming a Harmony in them, that all the world is raviſh'd with them. His deſcriptions are ſo handſome, ſo Poetical, and ſo Natural, that you would think you verily beheld all that he repreſents. If he paints the ſhadow of a Foreſt, he deludes the imagination; if he repreſents the Sea in a Tempeſt, the Rocks, and a Shipwrack, the hearts of the Readers tremble at what he deſcribes. If he builds a ſtately Temple, you would think Apollo himſelf had been the Architect of it; and if he repreſents an unfortunate Lover, his unhappineſſes excite pity, and ſighs from his relation; and becauſe Sadneſs and Love together have a wonderful operation in Verſe, he very rarely ſeparates them; not but that when he is minded, his Muſe is agreeably debonair. One of the moſt curious Wits of his age having made a very ingenious and gallant Dialogue (after the example of Anacreon, who made one between a Dove and a Paſſenger) wherein he introduces a little Bird which returns every year in the Garden of one of his She-Friends, this work afterward occaſion'd Lucilius and Theomenes to compoſe the moſt delightful Verſes in the world, whoſe natural, pleaſant, and ſprightly Stile, argues that nothing is impoſſible to them. As for Love, Lucilius underſtands all the exquiſiteneſs of it, and never was a Lover ſeen, whoſe ſentiments have been more tender than his. He can love conſtantly, even without being lov'd; abſence rather augments than diminiſhes Love in his Soul, and 'tis not eaſie for Infidelity itſelf to extinguiſh a paſſion in his breaſt. He loves with ardour and reſpect, he makes himſelf pleaſures and torments which other Lovers would not think of, and he has ſentiments ſo full of Love, that no other ever had the like. I have heard him ſay, that one day being at Sea, a terrible Tempeſt aroſe, which almoſt ſunk the Ship he was in, in view of a Caſtle which ſtands upon a Rock, at the foot of which there was great likelihood it would be wrack'd, for the wind violently drive it on that ſide, and the Rudder was broken. In this condition, knowing that his Miſtreſs was in that Caſtle, inſtead of abandoning his mind to fear like the reſt, or ſo much as minding what courſe the Marriners took to preſerve themſelves from periſhing, he ran'd againſt the foot of the Maſt, and took pleaſure in thinking that if he were Shipwrackt in that place, the waves might carry his body to the foot of the Rock, where his Miſtreſs going oftentimes to walk, might ſee it and bedew it with her tears; and this thought ſo wholly poſſeſt him, that he obſerv'd nothing at all that was done to reſiſt the tempeſt. But through exceſs of love, he ſlighted the danger and death it ſelf. But, in fine, 'tis enough to tell you that Lucilius can be as perfect a Lover as a Friend; for 'tis to tell you in few words that he is a perfectly worthy perſon, and deſerves to be Brother to the generous Melintha. I agree with you (ſaid Plotina) and if all men were like him, I think thoſe Ladies were to be excus'd that ſuffer'd themſelves to be lov'd by them. After this Lyſimena roſe up, and prepar'd to return to the Camp: but before ſhe departed, all the company entreated her to continue to protect Aronces and Clelia, which ſhe promis'd to do with great ſincerity. After which ſhe drew Bereliſa apart, and ſpeaking low to her, I have a while ſince ſo diſcover'd Clidamira to Artemidorus (ſaid ſhe to her) that you need not fear he will be unjuſt towards you. However I counſel you to haſten to make your voyage to Preneſte, for 'tis poſſible that in that place the Gods will change the heart of Clidamira who alone at this time hinders our return to Leontium, though ſhe makes ſhew of negotiating in behalf of the Prince my Brother and my ſelf. Bereliſa was deſirous

to know a little more precisely what Lysimena had told Artemidorus; but perceiving she haſtned to depart, she was contented only to thank her for the agreeable intelligence she gave her; after which Lysimena return'd to the Camp, which was much moved at the imprisonment of Aronces, there being no person that could so much as suspect him of ever having had the thought to conspire against Porsenna. But what was very glorious for this Prince, assoon as the rumour was spread abroad in Rome, all the people remembring Aronces had been the cause of winning the Battle in which Brutus was slain, murmur'd highly against Porsenna, and without considering that the King had Hostages in his hands, or thinking of the consequences of this affair, they declar'd boldly, that it was fitting to break the Peace, and go and demand Aronces of the King of Hetruria. All the worthy persons of the Senate were as sensibly affected with the unhappiness of Aronces, and judging that they could do nothing more dangerous to this Prince than to testifie their zeal towards him, they restrain'd the people as much as they could. But being they could not hinder them from speaking in pity of Aronces and complaint against Porsenna, Tullia, who had intelligence of these murmurings, made use of them to confirm her accusation of Aronces, by informing Porsenna that the Prince had more friends in Rome than in his Army. Whereupon Porsenna's mind being much incens'd against Aronces, he could not endure that any one should speak to him in his behalf. Which nevertheless Galerita and the Princess of the Leontines did not cease to do; the latter of which was not restrain'd by Zenocrates's jealousie from doing her utmost for Aronces, scarce any besides her self daring to urge Porsenna boldly in his favour. I beseech you, my Lord (said she to him at her return from Rome) suffer me to tell you that you do a very great wrong in accusing Aronces of a crime whereof no body suspects him capable, and you do no less in giving credit to all that Tullia says to you, who, you know, has neither virtue nor probity, who is subtle and cruel, and who hates Aronces and Clelia. I know all that you tell me (answer'd Porsenna) but it does not justifie Aronces; and though Tullia be wicked, that does not hinder but that Aronces is an unnatural Son, and a Parricide, in whose heart love has extinguisht all the sentiments of nature and virtue, and who looking upon me as an invincible obstacle to his imaginary felicity, has design'd to purchase it with my death. But, my Lord (reply'd Lysimena) how do you know Aronces has been author of such a design, and what proofs have been given of it? I have understood (answer'd Porsenna) that Aronces during his imprisonment in the Island of Saules, underwent that usage with very much impatience, though he always spoke with respect to those I sent to him; I have also been inform'd that he corrupted him that guarded him, that he went secretly to Rome, and had some private conferences in a Garden with divers persons: I have further known that during the Siege he never lost any occasion to favour the Romans in things which were not absolutely against the order of War. I have been advertis'd too that having taken prisoners on the day the Bridge was assaulted, he remitted them, and writ something in his Tablets which he deliver'd to one that he releas'd: and lastly, I have spoken with two of those three hundred Conspirators Mutius told me of, who declare that they were several times imploy'd to make the confederacy between Mutius and him, and that Aronces promis'd to secure him from perishing in the attempt. And indeed there must needs have been some secret intelligence between them, which I have not yet discover'd; for when Mutius had slain him whom he took for me, none offer'd to take him; and if I had not sent my guards for that end, Mutius had escaped. Besides, Aronces was in effect partly the cause that I pardon'd Mutius. But, my Lord (reply'd the Princess) if Aronces had been of that conspiracy, 'tis to be believ'd he would have better instructed Mutius, so that he should not have taken another for you. Did the Gods favour crimes (answer'd Porsenna) the criminals would never do any thing imprudently: but since they do not, they oftentimes in order to their punishment, permit those that would commit a wicked action to be blinded and deceiv'd in their judgments. So Mutius hapning to be mistaken by the purple Robe of the person he slew, because it was forgotten to tell him that this man's office allow'd him to wear one; it may be said, that he was deceiv'd happily for me, and unfortunately for Aronces. But, my Lord (reply'd the Princess of the Leontines) I do not yet see his crime well prov'd; for the two men who accuse him, may be suborn'd to do it. I would to the Gods, generous Princess (said he to her) that these people were false witnesses: but to speak the truth, all probabilities are against Aronces. For the obstinacy of Mutius not to name his complices, sufficiently argues that there was some one amongst them whom I might cause to be punisht; if all the Conspirators had been Romans, there was no reason wherefore he should conceal their names from me. But, my Lord, (answer'd Lysimena) the most general opinion is, that Mutius told you a lye to induce you to the peace, and that he was the sole person concern'd in the design of assassinating you. I can believe (reply'd Porsenna) that there were not three hundred of them, but I shall never believe that Mutius was alone. 'Tis also added (continu'd he) that to perswade Mutius to this attempt, Aronces promis'd him to grant peace to Rome, after my death, without other conditions than that of putting Valeria and Clelia into his power, engaging to bring him to marry the first afterwards. But, my Lord (said Lysimena) if Aronces had been so wicked as to desire to take away your life, what need had he of Mutius, and why should he not rather have suborned one of your guards? That was not the safest course (answer'd Porsenna) for by that means he might perhaps have come to be suspected: but in the other way, taking away my life by the hand of a Roman, the action would seem to proceed out of zeal for the delivering of Rome, and would not at all reflect upon Aronces. But Love alone put them upon this crime; and to manifest to you that 'tis so (added he) I am newly inform'd that Mutius is fled. Judge then whether after this, I have reason to doubt of their testimony who accuse Aronces. And to the end you may doubt of it less, see this Letter from Clelia to Aronces, which was found in his Chamber, and must needs have been deliver'd him by one of his Guards. Lysimena taking it, knew the hand of Clelia, in which she had seen several Letters; and opening it, found these words.

Clelia

Clelia to Aronces.

AS Criminal as you are, I do not ceaſe to pity you; and notwithſtanding your Crime, I ſhall ſtill make more ardent Vows for your liberty, than I ſhould do for my own.

This Letter no doubt ſeems to make againſt Aronces (ſaid Lyſimena) but, my Lord, two perſons that love have ſo many little conteſts which embroil them together, that it ought not to be concluded from hence that Clelia knows Aronces is a criminal againſt you. On the contrary, it is to be thought, that if ſhe did, ſhe would not have written to him in theſe terms. You are a ſtrange perſon, Madam (anſwer'd Porſenna roughly) to attribute judgment to perſons prepoſſeſs'd with a great paſſion. However, all that I can do for Aronces (added he) is to defer his puniſhment; for I confeſs to you, I would willingly convict him by Mutius himſelf. Were it not that Hoſtages ought to be inviolable, I would uſe Clelia in ſuch a manner that perhaps I might come to know many things by her, though I do not believe ſhe was privy to the whole ſecret of the Conſpiracy. On the contrary, I imagine that perhaps Aronces being unwilling to loſe the merit of his Crime in her eſteem, has only told her ſomething of it ſince. In the mean time, I have two men who will maintain that he is culpable. But, as I told you, I will cauſe Mutius to be ſought after, and oblige Publicola who affects him not, to force him to declare the truth. After which I will give as great an example of Juſtice, as Brutus did, when he beheld his own Sons put to death; for I will not be ſurpaſs'd by a Roman. Ah! my Lord (ſaid Lyſimena) you make me tremble with fear, to hear you ſpeak in this manner. I beſeech you, examine things well, remember that appearances are fallacious, and rather believe all that the great actions of Aronces, than that which the cruel Tullia tells you, who is accuſtom'd only to artifices and wickedneſs. For, do you think, my Lord (added ſhe) that this Prince has any great tenderneſs for your life after you have granted peace to Rome? and ought you not rather to fear that ſhe deſigns only to ingage you in a Crime? Be it how it will (anſwer'd Porſenna) that which ſhe tells me, ſeems to me to be true; all conjectures are againſt Aronces, who cannot be happy ſo long as I live; and I will not be prevail'd with, either by your prayers or tears, the murmurs of all my own Subjects, or the complaints of the Romans (which moreover teſtifie Aronce's intelligence with Rome) nor even the ſecret ſentiments of Nature which I feel in my breaſt in ſpight of my ſelf. But, my Lord (reply'd Lyſimena) how comes it that thoſe two men who accuſe Aronces, inform you of a paſt danger, of an attempt that has fail'd, and are their own accuſers? They could not have acceſs to me (anſwer'd he) before the buſineſs was executed; afterwards they reveal'd it to the Prince of Meſſene, to inform me of it, which yet he did not, undoubtedly becauſe he would not hurt Aronces. But for that they apprehend I knew nothing of the truth, they addreſs'd themſelves to Tullia, to whom I granted their pardon on condition they told me all they knew of the Conſpiracie. But where are thoſe men, my Lord? (ſaid Lyſimena) They are in a ſure place (anſwer'd Porſenna) till I cauſe Aronces to be publikly condemn'd. You know (added he) I had a purpoſe to make a Marriage between you and him; but, Madam, you have too great a virtue, to have a Parricide given you for a husband, and the Gods, no doubt reſerve you a better fortune. In the mean time ſpeak no more to me of him, and forbid Galerita to intercede in his behalf; for the more he is pleaded for, the more I ſhall haſten his puniſhment.

After this Lyſimena was conſtrain'd to be ſilent, to retire, and go to augment the ſorrow of the Queen, by relating to her this diſcourſe with Porſenna. Lyſimena's ſadneſs appearing manifeſtly in her countenance as ſhe came away from the King of Hetruria, all the Court was in fear for Aronces; and the rumor of it ſpreading abroad in all places, was augmented in the Camp.

Tullia being thus become neceſſary to Porſenna, not only becauſe it was by her means that he could convict Aronces, againſt whom he was extremely incens'd, but alſo becauſe his own Army being mutinous againſt him, he fear'd he ſhould have need of Tarquin's Troops; Sextus went and came continually to the Quarter of Porſenna, whereby he extremely moleſted Clelia, who was incredibly ſorrowful to ſee his paſſion for her increaſe in his heart. Not but that ſhe avoided his ſight as much as ſhe could; but in the caſe things were in, ſhe knew not where to find any protection. For the ſentiments ſhe had concerning the Princeſs of the Leontines would ſcarce ſuffer her to ſpeak to her. But the greateſt of her griefs was to underſtand Porſenna's ſentiments concerning the Prince his Son, the correſpondence of Tullia with that King, and the care that was taken to guard Aronces diligently. For this unfortunate Prince, as extremely belov'd as he was, could find no way to communicate his mind to Clelia, in anſwer to the Letter which he had receiv'd from her; for Telanus being become ſuſpected, durſt not come near one of his guards. Clelia had alſo another diſcontent, in not ſeeing her friends of Rome ſo often as formerly; for in this conjuncture, a tumult being both in the City and the Camp, the Conſuls caus'd Horatius, Herminius, Æmilius, Octavius, Spurius, and all the other Romans to forbear viſiting the twenty fair Roman Ladies which were given in Hoſtage. Which was ſomething difficult to make them conſent to; but cauſing them to conſider that if matters ſhould fall croſs, and they ſhould be arreſted, Clelia, Valeria, and all the reſt would be in a worſe condition than if they were at Rome, a ſentiment of love induc'd them to reſolve upon that which Policy could not. So that they were conſtrain'd to be contented with ſending to know tidings of the perſons which were deareſt to them in the World. Themiſtus though prepar'd to go away with Merigenes, was nevertheleſs willing to ſtay ſome days. But as for Amilcar, out of particular priviledges he went and came continually from the Camp to Rome, and from Rome to the Camp. Artemidorus being much better began to go abroad, and made his firſt viſit to Bereliſa, who was to depart the next day to go with Clidamira to Praneſte, accompany'd by Anacreon, who would not leave them. This Prince being very civil, deſir'd Bereliſa's permiſſion to ſee Clidamira at her chamber; beſides, (added he) I have ſomething to ſay to her, which is material for her to know. Ha! my Lord, (anſwer'd Bereliſa) will you never leave this exact civility towards a perſon, who has ſo unfaithful a heart? and can you ſtill eſteem her ſo much as to conceal from me her laſt weakneſs? Artemidorus bluſht hereupon; for he did not imagine the Princeſs of the Leontines had told Bereliſa any thing of that which ſhe had inform'd him of. No, no, my Lord (added ſhe) your ſilence is not at all obliging; for when men wholly ceaſe to love an unfaithful perſon, they are willing to publiſh their infidelity. But no doubt becauſe you cannot altogether quit your love to Clidamira, you are aſham'd to let me know that ſhe can never ceaſe to deceive you. I muſt have confided in her words (reply'd Artemidorus) to be obnoxious to be deceiv'd by her. Wherefore then (ſaid Bereliſa) do you not tell me that ſhe has a new correſpondence with Meleontus? Becauſe, being your ſiſter-in-law (anſwer'd he) I reſpect you in her perſon; beſides, as I have told you a hundred times, I conceive 'tis a piece of honorable prudence for a man not to publiſh the weakneſſes of a perſon whom he has lov'd, and who would ſtill perſwade him, that ſhe does not hate him. But in the bottom of my heart, I proteſt to you, I ſlight her as much as I eſteem you; I behold all her charms without having my heart affected with them; I look upon the teſtimonies of her affection as ſigns of weakneſs, or diſſimulation; and I never lov'd you ſo much as I do at this preſent. Go therefore, Madam, confidently to Praneſte; for ſince the Gods are veracious, you can learn nothing there which will not be to your advantage. If you would have me believe you (reply'd Bereliſa) tell me what you know concerning Clidamira. I know, Madam (anſwer'd he) that there is a great league between her and Meleontus, and that conſequently neither the Princeſs my Siſter nor my ſelf are likely to be ever recall'd from our Baniſhment. 'Tis true, Clidamira being crafty, would perſwade me that ſhe deludes Meleontus, and entertains correſpondence with him, only to do us ſervice. Nevertheleſs, I know what I ought to think of it; but prudence requires us to diſſemble as well as ſhe; for ſhe has a great influence upon the mind of Meleontus; Meleontus is Maſter of that of the Prince; and Meleontus too, as you know, hates Lyſimena, becauſe he has lov'd her too much. Believe me (reply'd Bereliſa) one cannot ſatisfie ſo many duties at once, and exceſſive prudence is not always compatible with exceſſive Love; to be a good Citizen, a great obſerver of the Laws, never to fail in any duty to Relations, Friends, Superiors, and fair comportment, is to have too many things to do; and in ſuch caſes, 'tis frequent to fail towards a Miſtreſs. Nevertheleſs, according to the Laws of Love, a man ought to be capable of failing in every thing rather than in that. But you do not conſider, Madam, (ſaid Artemidorus) that your intereſt is join'd with mine in this caſe. I know what you ſay (anſwer'd Bereliſa) but I confeſs I know as well too, that when a man does not hate that which he once lov'd, he loves it ſtill. On the contrary (reply'd the Prince) hatred is many times but a diſguis'd Friendſhip, and indifference is a true proof of an extinguiſh't affection. I confeſs (anſwer'd Bereliſa) that a clear indifference is a ſign there is no more Love; but when this indifference is accompanied with an exact civility, believe me, my Lord, believe me, if he that is capable of it loves no longer, 'tis poſſible at leaſt that he may love again. But, in brief, without ſhewing you further my weakneſs in not being able to conceal the diſcontent you cauſe me, I will go to Praneſte, to learn what ſhall be told me concerning your ſentiments, which your ſelf do not know ſo well as to inform me of them. Ah! cruel perſon, that you are (cry'd he) why do you ſpeak to me in this manner? Think you, I have forgot all that I promis'd you? think you, I can compare Clidamira to Bereliſa? and do you believe I have not obſerv'd the difference between her ſentiments and yours during my ſickneſs? Clidamira ſo well knows how to counterfeit (anſwer'd Bereliſa) that perhaps you believe ſhe was as ſad as I, to ſee your life in danger. No, no, (reply'd Artemidorus) I am not miſtaken in Clidamira; I have ſeen her put on an affected negligence, to ſeem more ſorrowful; which yet did not move me: I have ſeen her compoſe her eyes, ſummon up tears, and make ſighs, which proceeded more from her will than her heart; in brief, I have always ſeen her decently attir'd in her negligence, and in the greateſt extremity of my ſickneſs; nor did I ever ſee her relinquiſh the care of her beauty a moment, even then when ſhe believ'd I was not far from death. Ha! my Lord (interrupted Bereliſa) you would not have ſeen or obſerv'd any thing of all this. You are very unjuſt (anſwer'd Artemidorus) to turn to poyſon all that I ſpeak to cure you. For at the ſame time I obſerv'd all that I have told you, I ſaw a real ſorrow painted in your countenance, I beheld true tears fall from your fair eyes, I heard you ſigh with tenderneſs, I mark'd the careleſneſs of your attire, ſufficiently to be perſwaded that you did not remember that then you were fair; and if I dare ſpeak it, I ſaw your heart affected enough, to believe that perhaps my death would have caus'd yours. And will you quarrel with me after this, Madam? and not permit me to diſſemble a little with Clidamira for your intereſt? I know not what to anſwer you (ſaid ſhe) but I know well, I cannot endure that Clidamira ſhould hope to be lov'd by you, and 'tis only to deprive her of that hope that I go to Praneſte. For when I conſider well upon it, I cannot believe you ſhould make an ill choice between an unfaithful perſon and Bereliſa. After this Artemidorus ſpoke ſo many obliging things to Bereliſa, that ſhe conſented he ſhould go bid Clidamira adieu, on condition that ſhe ſhould come into her chamber a moment after him. And accordingly the Prince was no ſooner enter'd into it, but Bereliſa was conducted thither by Amilcar, who came to take leave of theſe two fair perſons which were to depart the next day. Anacreon and Ceſonia enter'd preſently after, ſo that Bereliſa had the ſatisfaction to ſee that Clidamira could not bid Adieu to Artemidorus in private. Whereby her mind being more at liberty, her converſation became more agreeable. That which gave occaſion to render it ſuch, was this; Clidamira had had a Dream which diſquieted her, and being ſo weak as to believe that Dreams are always of a good or bad preſage, ſhe complain'd to Ceſonia of having ſlept ill. Alas! (ſaid ſhe) if you knew what a Dream I had, you would not wonder at it. How! (cry'd Amilcar) is it poſſible a bad Dream ſhould cauſe Clidamira to have an unquiet night? What? (ſaid ſhe in ſome aſtoniſhment) does not Amilcar, who has ſo much wit and is ſo learned, know that ſome Dreams are certain predictions? I know (anſwer'd he) all that can be known concerning Dreams, and if I ſhould make you the Hiſtory of them, you would ſee that I am not ignorant therein. I know that Homer ſays, Dreams, and particularly thoſe of Kings are ſent from Hea-

Heaven, that many excellent Philoſophers have believ'd, the Gods diſtribute them to men, and that Pythagoras, who made them a great Myſtery, learnt the Art of interpreting them, eſpecially amongſt the Ægyptians and Chaldeans. I know that there are Temples Built on purpoſe to receive the inſpirations of Dreams, that in Ægypt people go to ſleep in the Temple of Serapis, to the end to have Prophetical Dreams, and that great care is taken there to record all Dreams which a fortuitous event has verifi'd. Moreover, I know what a Dream Mandana had, which preſag'd the power of Cyprus; but being an African, and not oblig'd to believe that which people believe in Ægypt or Perſia, any more than what Pythagoras believ'd, I declare to you, that I laugh at all the Dreams in the World. For my part (ſaid Anacreon, feigning himſelf of Clidamira's opinion) I aſſure you I am not of your mind, for this laſt night I had a Dream, the conſequence of which will occaſion me much trouble. Oh! I beſeech you (ſaid Clidamira) tell me what you Dreamt of. Me thought (anſwer'd he with a ſerious countenance) about midnight, Cupid, who never ſleeps, came to knock at my chamber door. I askt him who knockt, and he anſwer'd me, 'twas a poor child all wet with a ſtorm, that deſir'd ſhelter of me. Being I thought his voice very ſweet, I pity'd him, and open'd the door to him; when by the light of my Lamp which was ſtill burning, I beheld that this lovely child had two wings, a quiver upon his ſhoulder, and a bow in his hand. Then I wip'd his hair, caus'd him to come near the fire, and dry'd him with very much goodneſs; after which this little Traytor took his Bow, ſaying, he would ſee whether the rain had not ſpoil'd it. But, alas! he no ſooner took it in hand, but he bent it, and ſhot an arrow ſtraight into my heart. After which he laught at me and flew away, only telling me that his Bow was as it ſhould be. Whereupon I was ſo enrag'd for having been deceiv'd, that remembring confus'dly, that people cry, Stop thief when any one is rob'd, I began to cry, Stop Cupid, ſtop Cupid, ſo loud, that I wak'd. But the miſchief is (added Anacreon) that at the firſt viſit I made this day, this dream was turn'd into a Hiſtory, by the charms of a perſon infinitely amiable. This is ſo jolly a dream (anſwer'd Bereliſa ſmiling) that I condemn you to make an Ode upon it. If it were made long ago (ſaid Amilcar) Clidamira would be much deluded; for ſhe has heard this dream with as much attention as if Anacreon had had it indeed. But I am confident he has ſaid all this only to intimate to Clidamira that he is taken with her to day more than ordinary. Since you have ſo well expounded my real ſentiments (anſwer'd Anacreon) I will acknowledge what you have ſaid. How? (cry'd Clidamira much diſturb'd) did not you dream as you have related, and are you of Amilcar's opinion that no heed is to be given to dreams? No queſtion, I am Madam, (ſaid Anacreon.) For my part (ſaid Artemidorus) who ſcarce ever dream at all, I never cared much to reaſon upon dreams. As for me (ſaid Bereliſa) I have always found them ſo frivolous, falſe, extravagant and chimerical, that I ſhall eaſily rank my ſelf on Amilcar's ſide. And for my particular (ſaid Ceſonia) I confeſs, it has hapned to me to dream of things which have befallen me ſo exactly, that I know not what to think of them. Since chance (anſwer'd Amilcar) ſometimes repreſents very regular Pictures in the Clouds, it is not to be wonder'd, if hazard brings to paſs ſome things which are dream'd of. I have heard a Thuſcan woman affirm that the moſt ancient manner of Divination was by dreams. She alſo told me that thoſe which we have preſently after repaſt, or in the ſecond ſleep, ſignifie nothing, but that thoſe we have in the beginning of the morning, are the moſt certain; that the dreams of the Spring are more true, than thoſe of the Autumn; and that it's more ordinary to dream in the new Seaſon of the Year than in all the reſt. Believe me (amiable Ceſonia) ſaid Artemidorus, dreams are only a bare repreſentation of images. They are pleaſant or ſad, according to the conſtitution when they are purely natural. Thoſe which are mixt, have extrinſecal cauſes, which ſupply matter to the fanſie; and this is the reaſon that many times we dream of things which we have ſeen, or thought on, and moſt of all of things which we deſire. And certainly this laſt manner of dreaming has brought Dreams into ſuch credit, when it falls out that we ſee the people by day whom we dream of by night. For many times our hearts deſire or fear many things, which we are not ſenſible of; ſo that in ſleeping, our fanſie, which is mov'd by our deſires and fears, without our conſent, cauſes us to dream more of that which we fear or deſire than of any other thing It is not therefore to be wondred if it ſometimes comes to paſs bychance, that we ſee thoſe we dreamt of, becauſe we uſually dream of thoſe people whom we cannot meet with. Since 'tis certain that we deſire only that which may be hop'd, and fear only that which may poſſibly come to paſs. I agree with you (ſaid Amilcar) that Dreams may denote our inclinations, but I deny that they can preſage our fortunes, unleſs as they proceed from our conſtitutions. For, they ſay, cruel people are wont to have terrible dreams as well as thoſe that are melancholick. So that when it falls out that the dreams and adventures of theſe people have reſemblance, it is not to be wonder'd at, foraſmuch as they are produc'd by one and the ſame cauſe. I know well ſuch as are skilful in dreams, ſay there are three ſorts, which they diſtinguiſh and divide as exactly, as if they had travell'd into the Country of Dreams, as men do into Aſia. But to ſpeak truth, they are miſtaken; for if the Gods would advertiſe men of that which muſt betide them, they would do it more clearly. And beſides (added he) when I ſee a Grey-hound aſleep dream of a Deer, as I do of my miſtreſs, and perhaps better too, I conclude that my dreams come from my temper alone, I ſet my mind at reſt, and do every thing as if I had not dreamt at all. Indeed (added Bereliſa) I know no more pleaſant fanſie than to think that the Gods await till we be aſleep to advertiſe us ſo doubtfully of that which muſt happen to us; the Gods, I ſay, who are Lords of the World and of Events, who can change our wills as they pleaſe, and who inſpire to us all that ſeems good to them. But, I beſeech you (ſaid Anacreon) what kind of dream is that which the fair Clidamira had? It is ſuch (anſwer'd ſhe bluſhing) that I cannot tell it to any but Artemidorus. This Prince then became ſufficiently perplex'd; for he conceiv'd this was but a contrivance of Clidamira to ſpeak to him apart before he went away. But though he much fear'd to offend Bereliſa, yet he could not reſolve to anſwer Clidamira uncivilly before perſons that were ſtrangers. Wherefore, beginning to ſpeak, I am ſo little skilful in interpreting dreams (ſaid he coldly,) that I ſee not why you ſhould chooſe me rather than another. However, my Lord (anſwer'd ſhe) I muſt needs

tell it you; and ſo approaching near, and ſpeaking low to him; Do not fear (ſaid ſhe to him) that I am going to entertain you with my dreams; and if you have any juſtice left, conſider (I conjure you) whilſt Bereliſa and I go to Preneſte, that your heart was mine before hers was yours, and that I ought not to be ſo generous as to procure your return to Leontium, with the certainty of never being lov'd by you. 'Tis too much, Madam, 'tis too much (anſwer'd he, not being able to reſtrain himſelf) to deſire to be lov'd at the ſame time both by Meleontus and Artemidorus. How? my Lord (ſaid ſhe) do you not underſtand that I endeavour'd to make Meleontus who is the Prince's Favourite, my Lover, only that I might be in a capacity to make your peace when I pleas'd? I underſtand very well (anſwer'd he) that Clidamira is ever deſirous to gain all and loſe nothing. But as far as I perceive, my Lord (ſaid Bereliſa bluſhing) you have dream'd as well as Clidamira, for you ſpeak at leaſt as much to her as ſhe does to you. You have very well gueſs'd (anſwer'd Clidamira, who delighted to make Bereliſa jealous) but Artemidorus's dream is not ſo aſſuredly true as mine. Perhaps if he expounded yours (reply'd ſhe haſtily) it would not be granted to be more true than his. Believe me (ſaid Amilcar to Clidamira) ſtay till you be at Preneſte for the explication of your dreams; for you will find there a Kinſman of the Prieſt of Fortunes Temple, who has ſo great a wit, that what he is ignorant of, is not known by any. But ſince you conceive (anſwer'd Clidamira) no heed is to be given to Dreams, you muſt think too that no explication can be given of them. I do ſo, (reply'd Amilcar) but I am ſtrongly perſwaded, he I ſpeak of will convince you that none but Phyſicians can make good uſe of the dreams of their Patients, whereby they ſometimes judge very certainly what humor it is that is predominant in them. I beſeech you (ſaid Bereliſa, who ſought only to interrupt the converſation of Artemidorus with her Rival) give us recommendations to him you ſpeak of. I will, Madam (anſwer'd Amilcar) but before I write to him (for I contracted a friendſhip with him during my travels) I have a deſire to tell you what manner of perſon he is, that ſo if he does not pleaſe you, I may not loſe a Letter. You are a good husband of your words (reply'd Bereliſa) but however I conſent to what you deſire. And ſo do I (added Artemidorus) and for my part (ſaid Ceſonia) I entreat it of you; For I have heard a good character given of him by a Kinſwoman of mine who was at Preneſte. As for me (ſaid Anacreon) I ſhall be glad to know what kind of perſon an honeſt man is whom I am to ſee. There remains only Clidamira to entreat me (ſaid Amilcar.) Since I do not oppoſe the conſent of the company (anſwer'd ſhe) 'tis ſufficient. Know then (ſaid Amilcar) that Telantus is of a middle ſtature, has black hair, a pale complexion, very large eyes, a handſome mouth, an ingenious aſpect, a ſweet and careleſs air; he naturally loves the world and pleaſures, but having a quick-ſighted mind, he has by his prudence plac'd himſelf out of the reach of many accidents which might have render'd him unhappy. His wit is a little ſlow; but yet he ſpeaks very agreeably, though he has no very ſprightly fanſie. If he followed his own inclination, he would be full of diſcourſe; but he conſtrains himſelf partly out of wiſdom and partly out of policy. Moſt commonly he does not ſpeak his thoughts of what he ſees, but when he pleaſes he ſpeaks them admirably well. Yet he is ſubject to be prejudic'd; and without thinking himſelf to be ſo, he many times does injuſtice even when he believes himſelf moſt equitable; but this defect is not peculiar to him, and the greateſt part of men are guilty of it. Indeed I ſaw him once have a very ſtrange prejudice upon a certain occaſion; for becauſe he did not affect an ancient Prieſt of the Temple of Fortune, he judg'd that he did not ſpeak well when he ſpoke in publick. And yet it is certain, that venerable old man charms all that hear him. He ſpeaks with vehemence and elegance, his language is neither courſe nor affected, he knows how to joyn the Graces of Eloquence with the ſolidity of Morality; and if he is not always aſſur'd to perſwade thoſe that hear him, yet he is ſo to be heard with pleaſure, even by ſuch as are incapable to profit by his inſtructions. For all this, Telantus does not account him eloquent. Believe me (anſwer'd Bereliſa) he is not the ſole perſon that is liable to be prejudic'd, and 'tis more hard than we think, not to be ſo at all. When one is but a little (reply'd Amilcar) 'tis no great defect; but when ſo much as to account that evil which is good, and ugly which is handſome, 'tis a great imperfection in an elevated mind; for there is a great diſtinction to be made between an error proceeding from ignorance, and an error proceeding from prejudice. But to return to Telantus, I believe he has ſomething in his heart that inclines him to be very amorous, and ambitious, and I am perſwaded he has had great conflicts with himſelf to overcome theſe two ſentiments. No doubt he has done well (ſaid Bereliſa) for they are many times the cauſes of great diſquiet. That's certain (anſwer'd Bereliſa) but withal they cauſe a thouſand pleaſures. Believe me (ſaid Clidamira) neither all the ambitious nor all the prejudic'd are known, but ſometimes we ſee people that make ſhew of not being ſo, who affect to deſpiſe ambition, to ſatisfie that which they have in their hearts. However it be (ſaid Amilcar) I think men are not frequently deceiv'd who believe themſelves always liable to error; and the ſureſt way is to judge affirmatively of nothing upon apparences. But to return again to Telantus, he is complacent and civil, he loves company, and particularly that of Ladies, and I can aſſure you, that if he pleaſes he will write you pleaſant Letters, as much Prieſt as he is; for I conceive this faculty is never loſt after 'tis once gotten. I have further to tell you that Telantus believes as well as I, that 'tis no eaſie matter to find a great contentment without the aſſiſtance of Fortune. Thus, fair Bereliſa, you ſee what a perſon the illuſtrious Telantus is; it remains for you to tell me whether you would have me write to him. You will do me a very great pleaſure in ſo doing (anſwer'd ſhe.) For my part (ſaid Clidamira) I ſhall be glad to ſee him, but according to the character you give of him, I think I ſhall not ſpeak to him about my dreams. After this, Artemidorus went away; but though Bereliſa knew he would give Clidamira no new opportunity to ſpeak to him, yet ſhe was not fully ſatisfi'd with him, becauſe ſhe was ſolicitous to have him give her an account of what Clidamira ſaid when ſhe ſpoke to him apart. So that ſhe look'd a little coldly upon him as he went out; which though his heart reproacht him with nothing, gave him ſome diſcontent; and therefore he writ to her the next morning. But he that carri'd the Letter being ſtopt by the way, Bereliſa was gone her journey towards Preneſte with Clidamira and Anacreon, Artemidorus not being yet in a condition to travel. Nevertheleſs, less, to repair the fault of him that he sent, he caus'd a slave of notable wit to depart immediately to Preneste and carry Berelisa her first Letter accompany'd with another.

In the mean time Amilcar continu'd to seek out ways to serve Aronces, and so did Herminius, and all the virtuous gallants of Rome, excepting Horatius, who, how generous soever, could not be sorry for the unhappiness of his Rival. As for Zenocrates, his secret jealousie caus'd him to avoid speaking of Aronces as much as he could, for fear it should be observ'd that he was less his friend than formerly. But though Amilcar would not altogether renounce his jollity, yet there were some hours, wherein he was pensive at least, if not sad. For besides the Imprisonment of Aronces, and the trouble in which Plotina was, his mind was extremely perplex'd by an order brought him by an African lately arriv'd, to return to Carthage. He lov'd Plotina as much as it is possible to love, he had Friends at Rome very dear to him, and he had an especial Friend in his own Country, who at that time had great need of him. Thus duty towards his Master, affection to his Friend, the interest of Aronces and the love he had for Plotina sufficiently divided his heart, to cause those that knew him well, to observe some little alteration in his humour. Plotina soon perceiv'd it; and at first thought his resentment of Aronces's danger was the only cause of his discontent; and loving Clelia very well, he was sensibly concern'd in her sorrow: as indeed Amilcar was extremely affected with the unhappinesses of Aronces and Clelia. But as love makes an exact discovery of the sentiments of the person lov'd, Plotina at length knew Amilcar's disturbance proceeded from some cause of his own. At which being troubled, Whence comes it, Amilcar (said she to him) that I see something in your countenance which seems to tell me you are sad? Alas! amiable Plotina (answer'd he) I see I can hide nothing from you, for I intended to dissemble the discontent which I have in my breast. But since you have discover'd it, I must let you know, that love does not torment me only in Italy, it persecutes me also in Africa in the person of an illustrious Friend who is become unhappy by it. I knew all the beginning of his love, and was something concern'd in it: but since I departed out of Africa, some things have befallen him, which excite me to pity him, and afflict me so much the more, for that I believe my presence is absolutely necessary to redress the fortune of my Friend. Nevertheless, the affection I have for you is so strong, that I know not whether the command of a Master, and the misfortunes of a Friend will be sufficient to oblige me to make a voyage into Africa. I say, a Voyage, Madam (added he) because at this prelent I account Rome my Country; for a Lover has no other but that of his Mistress. That which you say, is very obliging (reply'd Plotina) but being I am equitable and generous, I will not cause you to be deficient either to your Prince, or to your Friend. All that I desire of you is, that you will not depart till we be return'd to Rome, and Aronces be acquitted. We hope this will shortly be effected; for the Queen of Hetruria, the Princess of the Leontines, the generous Melintha, and the amiable Herfilia have signifi'd to my sister and me this morning, that they were going this day to make their utmost instance with Porsenna: I promise you more than you desire, Madam (said he to her) for I engage not to depart at all unless you command me. As he was speaking this, Valeria enter'd, and told them Lucilius had sent word that all the Friends of Aronces were gone to intercede so urgently with Porsenna in his behalf, that a happy success was to be expected thereby. Which news something satisfying the minds of these two amiable Virgins, Plotina told Valeria what Amilcar had said to her, and then intreated him to declare what unhappiness it was that had befallen his friend he spoke of. Since the misfortunes of others sometimes a little solace our own (said he) I will content your curiosity, and no doubt you will agree that my Friend is to be pity'd, that love is the same in all places, and that there is no infelicity so great, but that another may be found like it. After this, Valeria and Plotina knowing that Clelia was with Hermilia, gave order that none should interrupt them: and then Amilcar began to speak in these terms.

The History of Cloranisbes and Lysonice.

YOu have heard me speak so much of Carthage; and you are so well inform'd of all that relates to my Country, of which the persons are, whom I am to speak of, that I shall in a manner wholly forbear to speak any thing of the Original of Utica, its manners, magnificence, customs or gallantry, being the same with those of Carthage; for I presuppose that as I, being an African, am become a Roman for your sakes, so you being Romans are become half Africans for mine. I shall therefore only tell you, that Cloranisbes, whose adventures I am to relate, is of a very illustrious Lineage, and that he is one of the most worthy, couragious, accomplisht and agreeable persons in the world. He has a very noble air, a lofty countenance, and in brief, wants nothing that can get a man esteem, merit love or friendship. He has neglected no means to accomplish himself; for he has travell'd, and has been in Greece to learn all that could not be taught him in Africa. Nor has he done like some young persons, who seem in the beginning of their lives to design to acquire extraordinary worth, but after they have learnt many things which are sutable for the world, they become idle and never practise any thing which they learn. For my part I account those, that have attain'd some good qualities, and afterwards are in a long incertainty what they ought to do, to be as void of Reason as a Pilot, who should furnish a Ship with all things necessary for a long Voyage, weigh Anchor, hoise Sayl, and then not knowing whither he would go, abandon himself to the pleasure of the Wind, and put himself in danger of being swallow'd up by a quick-sand, or split against a Rock. Yet the World abounds with such people, as have learnt the Art Military, and were never afterwards at the War; with others, who have had Dancing-Masters, and never go to Balls, and which is worst, with others who have learnt to speak several languages, and speak their own ill; and with others too, who are born in the world, and do not understand it. I crave your pardon for my comparison and my observations, but I could not refrain them; hereafter I will be more cautious of digressing so far from Cloranisbes. Know then, that having learnt all things requisite to the accomplishing of a brave man, he determin'd to pass his life at the Court, and to do all he could to obtain honour there.

Accord-

Accordingly in the beginning of his manhood, a War being fallen out between Numidia and Maſſilia, he ſignaliz'd himſelf in it, and perform'd actions worthy of great applauſe. So that the Prince of Carthage was pleas'd to take him into favour, and to reſide about him. I need not put you in mind (amiable Plotina, and charming Valeria) that this Prince is call'd ſo, only by reaſon he is deſcended from an Aunt of Dido, and that ordinarily he dwells at Utica; becauſe I ſuppoſe you remember to have heard that 'tis only a Title which he wears, though he has no authority in Carthage. Nevertheleſs, he has great intereſt there, but he is a Soveraign only in his own State. So that he is really but Prince of Utica, though he is ſtil'd otherwiſe. This City is of a very ſtrong ſituation, upon the ſhore of the Sea, and near a great River, thirty miles from Carthage. Its Original is very dubious, it has been ruin'd and rebuilt, it has chang'd its name two ſundry times, and it may be ſaid, that 'tis one of the moſt inconſtant Cities of the World in all things. 'Tis true, the air of the Country is apt to inſpire levity, and therefore the changes are leſs to be wonder'd which happen in theſe places than in others. The Numidians and Maſſilians who are neighbours, are levity it ſelf; and 'tis not altogether without Reaſon that people relie not too much upon the faith of the Africans. Not but that honeſty is of every Countrey, and conſtancy is ſometimes to be met with at Utica as well as at Rome. Yea, there is a Prophecie which affirms, that in this City ſhall one day be ſeen the greateſt example of conſtancy that ever was heard of, and that it ſhall be accounted a modern City, although it be very ancient. But ſince I know not what is to come I cannot aſſure you, whether this Prediction be true or falſe, but only that the Court of the Prince of Utica is very agreeable. For all the brave perſons of Carthage go thither frequently to viſit the Prince and moſt of the youth of Quality of Numidia come to learn gallantry under the Prince of Carthage. The Ladies there have noble aſpects and delightful wits; and though there are few great Beauties amongſt them, yet there are abundance infinitely amiable, and indeed ſcarce any unhandſome. They are all pleaſing, merry, and gentle; but how lovely ſoever they were, Cloranisbes at his return from his Travels did not become amorous. His mind was ſo fill'd with the Greek beauties that had charm'd him, and the gallantry of Athens and Corinth ſo ſtrongly poſſeſs'd him, that he had nothing but ambition in his heart when he arriv'd at Utica. So that the deſire to pleaſe the Prince was the great ſpur to make him active. The Prince of Carthage had at that time a Siſter much elder than himſelf, who taking a fancie to rule him abſolutely, had a ſtrange jealouſie of every one that came near him. Wherefore the merit of Cloranisbes cauſing her to be jealous of him, ſhe ſecretly did him all the bad offices ſhe could; though ſhe deported her ſelf civilly enough towards him before the Prince and the whole Court. But he was ſo amiable a perſon, and the Prince had ſuch a great inclination to love him, that her artifices were at firſt unprofitable. When ſhe ſaw ſhe could do him no hurt, ſhe bethought her ſelf to remove him from the Court by ſome honorable way. And accordingly, as young as he was, ſhe caus'd the Prince to ſend him to negotiate affairs of importance in Libya; at his return, a War happning between Carthage and Numidia, he was made a Commander of the Forces which the Prince ſent thither; but taking advantage of his abſence, ſhe caus'd a hundred things to be told the Prince, to render his fidelity ſuſpected to him. She alſo corrupted ſome Friends and ancient Domeſticks of Cloranisbes; after which, ſhe caus'd ſome of her own dependants to ſuggeſt ſeveral things to the Prince againſt Cloranisbes, which ſhould induce him to believe that he was a man of boundleſs ambition, that he held intelligence with the King of Numidia, that he betray'd Carthage and him too, and that it was very dangerous to ſuffer him longer in the head of the Army. Whereas nothing of importance was wont to be told the Prince, but he communicated it to the Princeſs his ſiſter, in whom he abſolutely confided, ſhe made ſhew not to believe the informations given againſt Cloranisbes, and offer'd to juſtifie him. But in fine (ſaid ſhe to him with unparallel'd diſſimulation) though I am perſwaded Cloranisbes is innocent, yet 'tis requiſite to act with as much prudence, as if he were believ'd culpable; and therefore, my Lord, if I may counſel you, ſend a ſtrict order to Cloranisbes to come immediately to you. If he comes, it will be fit to obſerve him and endeavour to diſcover the truth: if he does not, his diſobedience will argue his guilt. The Prince judging this advice of the Princeſs reaſonable, ſent an expreſs order to Cloranisbes to come forthwith to him, and to reſign the command of the Forces to another whom the Prince nam'd to him. But at the ſame time that this order was diſpatcht away, this ſubtle Princeſs oblig'd thoſe falſe Friends of Cloranisbes whom ſhe had ſuborn'd and treacherous Domeſticks to write to him to beware of coming. So that when Cloranisbes receiv'd the Prince's order, he received four tickets, which extremely perplex'd him; for, in the firſt he found only theſe words,

Very bad offices have been done you here; have a care, and diſtruſt all things.

In another,

The Prince is much incenſed againſt you; the Princeſs excuſes you as much as ſhe is able, but cannot appeaſe him; take care of your affairs and your ſafety.

There was alſo a third, in which Cloranisbes found theſe words:

Your deſtruction is deſign'd, Cloranisbes, therefore do not truſt to your innocence; for they which have power to ruine the innocent, make them criminal when they pleaſe.

But that which aſtoniſht Cloranisbes moſt was the fourth, which ſpoke thus:

If you obey the Princes Order, you cannot eſcape impriſonment or death; this is all that can be told you by a Friend who hazards his own fortune to ſave you.

You may judge, Madam, in what a perplexity Cloranisbes was; for he did not miſtruſt thoſe who gave him this advice. But that which wholly perſwaded him to think himſelf loſt was, that the Princeſs of Carthage having cunningly caus'd a rumor to be ſpread in Utica, that if Cloranisbes came, he ſhould be arreſted, he receiv'd alſo twenty other adviſo's, and particularly one from ſo faithful a Friend, that he could not doubt of it. Yet his own inclination led him to truſt to his innocence, and to go to the Prince. But having conſulted two very prudent friends whom he had in the Army, they diſſwaded him from it. But if I do not obey (ſaid Cloranisbes) I render my ſelf ſuſpected, and become culpable. Believe me (anſwer'd one of thoſe that counſel'd him)

'tis better for a man to render himself suspected than miserable: but to take a middle course in this extremity, and to testifie that you design not to render your self Master of the Forces, leave the Army and go towards Utica; and whereas you have a house upon the frontier, feign your self sick, write to the Prince, that assoon as you recover you will go to him, and in the mean time your friends will do their utmost to discover what you are accus'd of, and justifie you to the Prince. This counsel seeming very prudent to Cloranisbes, he oppos'd his own inclination, and follow'd the advice of his friends. So he left the Army, made shew of intending to go Utica, feign'd himself sick, when he was at his house upon the frontier, and writ to the Prince after the manner that he was counsell'd. But at the same time he answer'd all those that had given him intelligence, and conjur'd them to send him what they could learn. Wherefore they that betray'd him shewing his Letters to the Princess, who endeavour'd to destroy him, she made use of them to perswade the Prince that he was not really sick, and to inform him what a curiosity he had to know all that was spoken of him at Utica. For though he spoke in his Letters as being innocent, yet they contributed something to make him seem culpable, because they imply'd that he was not very sick, that he was desirous of intelligence, and durst not trust himself. But to make the matter worse, this subtle Princess pretending to be his Friend, sent one of her own Physicians to him, to the end that if he were in health as she believ'd, he might inform the Prince of it; and that if he were sick, she might make him report that he was not. Now, for that a Feaver is not to be had at pleasure, Cloranisbes took his bed indeed, and carried himself like a sick man; but the Physician found that he was in health, and reported so to the Prince, who no longer doubting but that Cloranisbes was guilty, was so exasperated against him, that all the intercessions of his true friends could not hinder the Prince from sending to forbid him coming near to Utica; for the house where Cloranisbes stay'd, was upon the frontier. So that Cloranisbes was banisht without knowing the cause of this severity against him. At first he was extremely afflicted; but having a great and firm Soul, he took a resolution on a sudden, and writ to his Friends to desire them not to trouble themselves further about making his peace, assuring them that he found his heart strong enough to be able to live in solitude, and enjoy himself without being concern'd with the rest of the world. 'Tis true, there was a wise old man who contributed much to cause him to take this resolution; for going to see one of his friends a days journey from his own house, he lost his way, and went cross the corner of a Forest. And finding a mountainous and barren Countrey beyond, he perceiv'd some miserable Shepherds tilling a little corner of ground between the Rocks, and observ'd a venerable old man who liv'd in a Cave not far off, and who with a countenance both melancholy and serene, said to them, as he beheld them, Alas! poor people! beware of rendring your fields fruitful, leave your land uncultivated, if you love quiet; for if your Countrey become good, you will soon have War. Cloranisbes who stopt to ask the way, having heard what this venerable old man said, seem'd surpris'd at it, and turning towards him, Tell me I pray (said he) for what reason you would make a desart of the Countrey you dwell in. Because (answer'd he) solitude is always inseparable from deserts, barrenness upholds solitude, vertue and peace are in solitude preserv'd, and felicity found, if it be possible for men to be capable of it. This old man who was a Greek, though he spoke the African tongue, and whose name was Andronodorus, spoke this with so grave an air, that Cloranisbes believ'd that perhaps the Gods had caus'd him to meet with him for his comfort. Wherefore lighting from his horse, and giving him to the slave which follow'd him, he drew Andronodorus apart, and askt him, who he was? where he liv'd? what had caus'd the aversion, which he had against the World? My Lord (said he to him) I was born at Samos, and I was banisht by Polycrates when he usurp'd the Soveraign Power, because he knew well I could not submit. So I departed from my Countrey with all that I could carry in a Ship, intending to see if it were possible for the monsters of Africa to be more inhumane than the men of my Countrey. For in truth, my Lord, I acknowledge to the shame of mankind, I never found any thing but weakness, folly, injustice, and wickedness in all places where I have liv'd, and principally in those where wealth and plenty are to be met with. I have had a father who took no thought for any thing but his pleasures, I have had children who would have me mind nothing but theirs; my wife had vertue, but not goodness; my relations had no humanity, my friends were but little sincere to my interests, my domesticks were of small fidelity; and in sum, I may say, that in all places where I have liv'd, I have seen almost all others as unhappy as my self, though they did not think so. But fortune having caus'd me to suffer shipwrack upon the Coast of Africa long ago, and chance conducted me to a Cave on the side of this Forest which you have cross'd, I took it for my habitation, and have liv'd here since by the assistance of a slave, who escap'd drowning with me, and with the help of some poor Fishers has till'd as much Land as is necessary for our subsistence. So that this little Sanctuary being encompass'd with a very great extent of Land which is not husbanded, I have enjoy'd much tranquillity since I came hither, without conversing with any but the Priest of a Temple not far from hence, who taught me his language. But I see these poor people at work, will make my Desart arable; and so I look upon them as those that go about to destroy my felicity; for, in brief, if they bring me neighbours, they will bring me enemies.

Cloranisbes then admiring Andronodorus, desir'd him that he would lead him to his Cave; which at first he refus'd: but on a sudden checking himself, Come, my Lord (said he to him) come, for it is not fit for me to belye my self, and after having affirm'd that vertue may be preserv'd in solitude, to shew you only a wild and uncivil vertue. After this Andronodorus led Cloranisbes by a small path little trodden; before his Cave he found a little rustical Garden, but very neat, and in the Cave a Bed of Bulrushes woven together, Seats of the same, some Books which he had borrow'd of the Prieſt, and Writing-Tables. Then Andronodorus took his turn to ask Cloranisbes, who he was? and this illuſtrious exile related his fortune to him. Upon which Andronodorus, who wiſht he could make Hermits of all the men in the World, ſet himſelf to perſwade him ſo earneſtly not to offer to reſiſt the will of the Gods, that he fell to tell him a hundred things, whereof I cannot refrain from telling you part. I beſeech you (ſaid he to Cloranisbes) ſuffer not your ſelf to run into that general error of all men, who will always force their deſtiny. Reſign your ſelf to the conduct of the Gods, and know that true Wiſdom conſiſts only in this. As long as I was in my own Countrey, I behav'd my ſelf like a good Patriot; but ſince Fortune caſt me into a ſtrange one, without ſubſiſtence and without any ſanctuary, I made my ſelf one, and have found a ſafer in poverty and ſolitude, than I could have done elſewhere. For ſince I came hither, I have deceiv'd no perſon, and none has deceiv'd me. The error of all men, is blindly to ſeek that which they have not; they who have no tranquillity, deſire it, but do not that which is requiſite to obtain it; and they who have, are weary of it, and think they ſhould be happier in a more turbulent way of life. When we are children, we long to be a little advanced in age; when we are very old, we wiſh we could again become Children; and when we are in the prime age of our lives, we never conſider what we have been, nor what we muſt be, nor many times too, what we are; but only addict our ſelves to find out pleaſures, which are ſo momentany, that we ſcarce know whether they are pleaſures or no, becauſe ordinarily ſorrow follows them ſo cloſe, that it extinguiſhes all their ſweetneſs. Thus, Cloranisbes, you ſee what the World is, which you have ſo much regret to be baniſht from. But, wiſe Andronodorus (anſwer'd he) as I am far from your age, ſo I am from your wiſdom; and therefore I ſhould find it a hard matter not to ſtrive all I could againſt my bad fortune. But, who told you that it is bad? (ſaid Andronodorus) do you know the ſecrets of deſtiny? and is it not your duty to conform your ſelf to it? We have ſometimes ſeen people think that they were out of their way, who in the mean time eſcap'd being overwhelm'd under the ruines of a houſe which had fallen upon them if they had follow'd the ordinary way. Therefore 'tis the grand ſecret, as I told you, to ſubmit to the decree of Heaven, and to have ſo noble a ſoul, and ſo rational a mind, as to be always ready to paſs from good to bad fortune, from riches to poverty, from health to ſickneſs, from liberty to ſervitude, and from life to death. This certainly is that which Pythagoras intended to ſignifie by his Metempſychoſis or tranſmigration of ſouls; for no doubt he only meant to intimate, that the ſoul of man could not be all things. 'Tis fit then not to reſiſt our deſtiny, it behoves us to ſubmit to it; if the Gods will that you live at Court, they will draw you thither, whether you endeavour it or no; and if they do not, you will but torment your ſelf in vain. But in brief, not to repeat to you all the diſcourſe of the ſolitary Andronodorus to Cloranisbes, I ſhall tell you that he comforted him, and that Cloranisbes reſolving to comply with his fortune without tormenting himſelf more, contracted a friendſhip with this wiſe old man to whom he offer'd his houſe to retire into, which he would not accept, and return'd home without caring for any other counſel but that of Artamidorus. And therefore he writ to his Friends at Utica, that they would give over ſoliciting for his revocation, telling them it was ſufficient if they only maintain'd that he had done nothing to deſerve his diſfavour, and that he deſir'd nothing more from their aſſiſtance. He writ this to them ſo earneſtly, that they obey'd his pleaſure; and as Princes eaſily enough forget what they do not ſee, and delight in, the Prince of Carthage no longer thought of Cloranisbes. For my part I much regretted him; for I was his Friend; but, in fine, it behov'd him to comfort himſelf for his abſence, and I comforted my ſelf ſweetly enough with two or three Miſtreſſes, which I courted about that time. Nevertheleſs, as jovial as you ſee me, I can aſſure you Cloranisbes was better pleas'd with me than with any of his Friends; for I had the confidence to ask the Prince's permiſſion to go ſee him in his Deſart, though I knew well enough that the Princeſs of Carthage was offended at it. In the mean time Cloranisbes delighted himſelf in his ſolitude with embelliſhing his houſe, which he made very agreeable; he alſo addicted himſelf much to reading; and having ſlaves that were skill'd in Muſick, he diverted himſelf very innocently. The firſt time I viſited him, I found him ſo merry, ſo ſatisfied with his retirement, in ſo good health, and with ſuch tranquillity of mind, that I took occaſion to jeſt with him about it. How? (ſaid I to him) Cloranisbes, ſo goodly a perſon, ſo full of wit, ſo rational, ſo fit for ſociety and gallantry, be happy with Meadows, Rivers, Woods and Fountains? What? can Cloranisbes be ſo jovial as I ſee him, without Nymphs, without Ladies, without Shepherdeſſes, and without having ſo much as one poor Iris? Yes (anſwer'd he, ſmiling) and I am ſo pleas'd in having no need of any but my ſelf to be happy, as no man can be more. I confeſs to you, I laugh'd at his wiſdom; I gave him the hearing of all that his Hermite had ſaid to him, but he did not convert me; I left him to his opinion, and carried back my own. Six months after, I went again to viſit him; but I found him much chang'd, he ſeem'd ſad and paler than ordinary; and though he was more decent, and even more magnificent than I had ſeen him formerly, yet I perceiv'd well ſomething troubled his mind. Methinks (ſaid I to him aſſoon as I obſerv'd it) your countenance tells me your felicity of ſolitude has not laſted you very long. Cloranisbes ſmil'd to hear me ſpeak thus, but though he told me he was ſick, yet I knew that his malady was rather in mind than body. But being I was to ſtay with him ſome days, I would not preſs him too much at firſt, and we went to walk together upon a Terrace, the proſpect of which was very handſome. After which, having ſome orders to give to a Painter who was embelliſhing a Banqueting-houſe at the end of his Garden, he askt me liberty to go thither, and left me to walk whither I would. Wherefore having a purpoſe to inquire of a man that belong'd to him, with whom he intruſted many things, I went to ſeek him in the houſe, from one room to another, and not finding him, I ſtay'd at laſt in Cloranisbes cloſet which I found open. And being naturally curious, I could not ſee Verſes upon the Table without reading them; for knowing Cloranisbes made very good, and perceiving thoſe that lay there were written with his own hand, my curioſity was redoubled. So that taking them up, I read them with much pleaſure, becauſe they ſeem'd very amorous. But that which made me conſider them more, was, for that I accounted them an infallible proof that Cloranisbes was in love, and that his

ſadneſs only proceeded from thence. At the ſame inſtant a conceit coming in my head to play a prank with him, I ſet my ſelf with all diligence to copy them out, and I was ſo happy that I had done tranſcribing them a good while before I found Cloranisbes again. For I went out of his Cloſet without being ſeen by any perſon, and going forth of the houſe enter'd into an Orchard to take a good long turn, feigning to ſeek for Cloranisbes, who at laſt met me. All the evening I found him ſufficiently ſad, though he endeavor'd to ſeem otherwiſe: I pretended to be a little weary and ſleepy, to the end I might retire in good time. So being led to my apartment, I was at liberty to execute the deſign I had. I ſpent all the evening in tranſlating thoſe Verſes into Greek; for I had formerly travell'd into Greece, and ſo had Cloranisbes. So that that language was not unknown to us.

Having paſs'd the night in this Tranſlation, I ſlept ſo late, that Cloranisbes fearing I was not well, came to my chamber, and ask'd me whether I were ſick, ſlothful, or ſleepy. I aſſure you (ſaid I to him, awaking my ſelf) I cannot tell you which; and beſides (added I) you were ſo penſive laſt night, that I imagin'd I ſhould do you a pleaſure in leaving you to entertain your own thoughts. You are not wont to be ſo complacent to the lofs of your own pleaſure (anſwer'd Cloranisbes) but however riſe, and let us walk. I obey'd him, and we went together into a Grove which is extremely agreeable. We had not gone a hundred paces in it, but turning my ſelf toward him, See, Cloranisbes (ſaid I to him) a very fit place to make Verſes in, and I doubt not but your leiſure has occaſion'd you to write excellent things. Solitary people (anſwer'd he) have ſo few ſubjects to write of, that their fancies furniſh them with nothing agreeable; for, to tell you the truth, 'tis ſo common to declaim againſt Fortune, that I would not chuſe it. For my part (reply'd I) Verſes that are not of Love, muſt be admirably good to pleaſe me; for ſince Verſes were no doubt invented for Love and Mirth, they muſt have ſomething of both, to charm me. But as to the matter of verſes (added I) I muſt ſhew you an Elegie that was given me, which in my conceit is very paſſionate, and I have made a Copy of them my ſelf, to give you. In ſpeaking this, I drew forth the Tranſlation which I had of Cloranisbes Elegy into Greek out of his own Language, which naturally is not very fit for Poetry. At firſt Cloranisbes took it without thinking to find any thing in it that he knew, but he had ſcarce read four Verſes, when looking upon me, Ha! Amilcar (ſaid he to me) ſee the greateſt chance in the world. How? (ſaid I to him very ſeriouſly.) The ſence of theſe four Verſes (reply'd he) agrees ſo exactly with four which I made, that nothing was ever ſeen ſo like. Such things always ſurpriſe when they happen (anſwer'd I coldly) but 'tis not very frequent; and I my ſelf (added I confidently) have made Verſes which I have found almoſt word for word in Heſiod, whom I had not read at the time when I made them. So that it could not be ſaid that they remain'd in my memory unwittingly, and that I believ'd I compos'd them though I only remembred them. Therefore 'tis not to be much wonder'd at, that your conceit ſhould jump with that of another; and when conformity is only in the ſence and not in the words, the chance is leſs marvellous. After this, Cloranisbes proceeded to read, but the more he read the more he was aſtoniſht, he ſtopt at each Verſe with incredible amazement, and not imagining it poſſible for me to have ſeen his Verſes, or having ſeen them, to have had time to tranſlate them, he made exclamations at every word, and having told me a hundred times, This is ſtrange, this is admirable, this is wonderful, this is incredible, and teſtified his amazement in all manners he could, he was, in fine, wholly aſtoniſht that I was not ſo at all. No doubt (added he) 'tis becauſe you believe there are ſome thoughts in the Verſes you ſhow me, which reſemble thoſe which I have made. I certainly believe ſo (anſwer'd I) and I wonder as much at your aſtoniſhment, as you do at the conformity of your Verſes with theſe which I ſhew you. Ha! Amilcar (cry'd he) you do not underſtand how the matter is, and to force you to admiration, mark well the Elegy which I am going to repeat to you, and if you do not find that the beginning, continuance, and end are the ſame, never believe me. After which Cloranisbes repeated his Elegy, and I taking my turn to feign aſtoniſhment, ſtopt at every Verſe, and made cries of admiration, which ſurpaſs'd all his before. But in fine (ſaid I to him, after he had done repeating the Elegy) it is impoſſible this ſhould be the effect of meer chance; you muſt have borrow'd this ſence from ſome other, or ſome other from you. Cloranisbes then fell to make a thouſand Oaths to me, that he had never before ſeen the Verſes which I ſhew'd him. It muſt be a long while then (ſaid I to him) ſince you compos'd yours; you gave Copies of them when you were in Greece, and ſome one that underſtands our Language, deſir'd to inrich his own with them. That cannot be (anſwer'd he) for 'tis but three days ago that theſe Verſes were made, and I have not ſhow'd them to any whatſoever. So that this accident muſt be look'd upon as a prodigy. But do you know (added he) who is the Author of thoſe Verſes which ſo much reſemble mine? No (anſwer'd I confidently) but a Kinſman of Theſpis ſent them to me by a Ship that came to Utica. But as far as I perceive (added I) you make Love-Verſes in your ſolitude.

But as far as I perceive (ſaid Plotina interrupting him) you intend that we ſhall not hear Cloranisbes Verſes, and you have forgot that Valeria underſtands the language into which you tranſlated them well enough to hear them with pleaſure. I have not forgotten any thing that is lovely in you (anſwer'd Amilcar) but becauſe I was but the Tranſlator of thoſe Verſes, I durſt not ſhew you them unleſs you had commanded me, though I ſomething deſir'd it. But ſince you have ſome curioſity for them, you ſhall have them in your own language; for when I began to underſtand it, I tranſlated them a ſecond time in this manner. See then what were the ſentiments of Cloranisbes.

Elegy to Melantha.

IT was within a pleaſing ſolitude,
Where free from cares and from inquietude,
My thoughts an undiſturb'd ſerenene ſs found,
And in themſelves my eaſie wiſhes crown'd.
A goodly plain, a Meadow flowry fair,
With the ſoft courtſhip of the perfum'd air,
Cenſing the fields, or bubbling ſtreams that paſs
O're pebbles; or that thrid the matted graſs;

The charming notes of birds that move delight,
And the more charming silence of the night,
Courts noiseful pleasures taught me to despise,
And joys of undesigning shades to prize.
There I without ambition, love, or strife,
Pass'd the soft minutes of a careless life;
Until Melantha's fatal beauty found
My desart out; straight from th'unhappy ground Away the disinchanted pleasures flew,
And rest for ever had my Soul adieu.
Since then my mind by melancholy seiz'd,
And raging pangs of jealousie diseas'd,
Like a crack'd Mirrour thousand forms doth shew
Of Rivals, whom Melantha never knew.
My lightest wish was death, hopeless to move
That heart that only could ambition love.
And still the more I pay'd profound respect,
My slighted service found the more neglect;
As if my adoration were a crime,
Or dying sighs were murmurs out of time.
And yet obdurate as she is, I find
No other passion can divert my mind
While she not pitying my forlorn estate
Can find no easier object for her hate.
If it be so, ye Gods, I only crave
That last relief despairing Lovers have.
May grief destroy me, and Melantha find
A Victime fit for her ambitious mind.

If Cleranisbes's Verses (said Valerius) be as passionate as yours, he must certainly have been very amorous. For my part (added Platina) I do not doubt of it; for Amilcar's Verses are ordinarily more sprightly than these, but not so passionate. However (added she, turning towards him) proceed if you please to the sequel of the History of Cleranisbes; for I extremely long to know whether he told you upon whom he made these so amorous Verses.

I am so desirous to obey you, Madam (answer'd Amilcar) that I will not stay to answer the illusive commendation you have given the Verses which I make. To return therefore where I was, I shall tell you, that turning my self towards Cleranisbes, But as far as I perceive (said I to him) you make Love-Verses in your solitude, and make them as well as if you were amorous. Nevertheless I do not much believe that you can be so, for to speak truth, there are not many African Ladies to be found in the Countrey that are fit to take such hearts as that of Cleranisbes. Alas! (answer'd he sighing) I thought indeed to live in safety in my Desart: but, to my unhappiness, I have seen so divine a person here, that I have not been able to resist her charms. Then I press'd Cleranisbes to tell me who that fair one was, where he had seen her, and how he became in Love with her: for as for the name of Melantha which you give her in your Verses (said I to him) I know 'tis but a name of love. Cleranisbes told me that since he was banisht he had seen but two or three of his Friends, and my self, who had visited him twice, excepting the solitary Andronodorus whom he saw very frequently, till one day, walking in a great Waste that leads to the way which goes to Massilia, he beheld a handsome slave, who saluting him respectfully, told him, some Ladies of quality desir'd him to permit them to see his Garden. Wherefore having not yet forgot to be civil, he answer'd him that he should joyfully receive the honour which they would do his house. But that he might not fail in the respect which it behov'd him to give them, he ask'd the slave their names; and was told that there was the wife of a man of chief quality of Massilia at a house not far distant from his; that this Lady's name was Cyrene; that she had her daughter with her who was nam'd Lysonice, and two of her kinswomen who dwelt with her. The slave added also that, to divert them, Cyrene purposed to let them see all the fair houses thereabours. Upon which Cleranisbes sending the slave back speedily, prepar'd himself to receive these Ladies in the best manner he could, though it was something troublesome to him at that time to be oblig'd to spend a day in Ceremony; for in the humour he was in then, he could have lik'd better to see a Painter at work whom he had in his house, or hear a slave sing that belong'd to him and had an excellent voice, or entertain himself with a Book, or his own thoughts, than to receive Ladies whom he believ'd he should never see more than this time. Nevertheless in consideration of civility, he order'd his servants to make preparation to receive them. And then causing a handsome horse to be brought to him, he rid to meet them as far as he could. When he approach'd their Chariot he first beheld Cyrene, who though of good age seem'd to him to have a graceful countenance. But presently after all that were with her lifting up their Vails, he saw the charming Lysonice her daughter, and he saw her so beautiful, that his eyes were dazled, his heart was mov'd, and his reason almost wholly laid aside at that moment, so that he had like to have made his complement to Lysonice without speaking at all to Cyrene or her Friends, who were notwithstanding very amiable. Yet at length he recollected himself from his dumb admiration; and beginning to speak, I would not have believ'd, Madam, (said Cleranisbes to Cyrene) that an unfortunate Exile could have receiv'd so great an honour; and if I could have foreseen it, I would have endeavour'd to put my Desart in a condition to divert so fair a company. Since we find you in it, (answer'd Cyrene obligingly) we have nothing more to desire. For my part (added one of her Kinswomen, whose name was Pasilia) when the Master of the house is a person of merit, I do not much care to find that the Garden-plots and walks are not decently kept. I am altogether of your mind (added a sprightly Virgin nam'd Delisia.) And as for me (said the fair Lysonice) I have at present the greatest consolation in the World, in seeing an Exile who is neither savage or incivil; for whereas we our selves are Exiles, it makes me hope that we shall preserve some civility in our Desart, since Cleranisbes has retain'd so much in his. What? Madam (cry'd Cleranisbes looking upon Lysonice) can such a person as you be exil'd? If it be so, it must needs be only because your beauty is too redoubtable to those that banish you. Cleranisbes had no sooner said this, but Lysonice blusht, and he perceiv'd it would have been better to have spoken of the worth of Ladies in general than of Lysonice in particular; but it was not in his power to repress his first sentiment. But Cyrene, to interrupt the praises given her daughter, entreated Cleranisbes that he would do them the favour to let them see his house. And so, they went thither-wards slowly, continuing their discourse.

Cyrene told Cleranisbes that the King of Massilia had banisht the valiant Bostar her Husband by the artifices of some enviers he had in this Court, and that having having been sent to a house of his own upon the frontier, he had obey'd, and arriv'd there only fifteen days ago. Cloraniſbes heard with pleasure that which Cyrene said to him; and though he knew no reason for it, yet he was glad that Lyſonice was an Exile, and that he had some conformity with so fair a person. At length having pass'd a great Waste and two Courts, this fair company alighted before a stately entrance of stone-steps: for though the Architecture of this house is something barbarous, 'tis notwithstanding magnificent. For instead of the Statues of the Graces, Venus, Diana, or Apollo, as in other places, here were represented huge Lyons, Tygers and Panthers; and in imboss'd imagery, Crocodiles devouring passengers, frays of savage beasts, and shapes of the most extraordinary monsters that have been seen in Africa. But, in fine, this house is very handsome though built after the ancient mode; so that Cyrene commended it with as much earnestness as a person could do that desir'd to please the Master of it. I beseech you, Madam (said Cloraniſbes to her) do not so extol a thing which does not deserve it; for I am none of those who seek to be commended for what has been made by Architects who are dead many ages ago; and if you have any thing to commend me for, it must be (added he smiling) for not having lov'd Lyons, Tygers and Panthers so much as my Ancestors. In speaking this, he oblig'd Cyrene to enter into a Hall, the painting of which was newly finish'd, where the history of Diana was admirably represented. It not being usual in Massilia to see such rare Pictures, all the Ladies were charm'd with those, and stay'd a good time to behold them, during which they all made it apparent that they were infinitely ingenious, and especially Lyſonice. After this Cloraniſbes caus'd them to pass into a Chamber hung with Tapestry of Sydon, for having been a great Traveller, he had renounc'd the simplicity of Numidia. Then he led them into a Cabinet open on three sides, the prospect of which was very handsome; it was full of Pictures, Books, and Musical Instruments; and round about it were Cushions wrought with flowers, and a plat of Seabull-rushes cover'd the floor. But as far as I perceive (said Lyſonice pleasantly when the company was all set) you purpose to be eternally banish'd, by so delightfully adorning your Desart. Yet I am not of your humour, for I shall always so fancie to my self to return to the Court in a few days, that I look upon all the deformities of a disorder'd house as things which comfort me, and assure me I shall not stay long there. You are so fit for the World (answer'd Cloraniſbes) that 'tis not to be wonder'd if you love it: but you are also so amiable, that you ought never to fear solitude in what place soever you be. I know not whether I can fear solitude (reply'd she) but I am sure I very much fear bad company; and that which makes me dislike continuing in the Countrey, is not so much the fear of seeing no body, as of seeing people that displease me. I believe what you say (answer'd Deliſia) but I believe too that you love agreeable company. I grant it (reply'd she) but I had rather not see any whatsoever, than see some whom I dislike. Did you consider well what you say, Daughter (said Cyrene smiling) you would not speak so positively. Indeed (added Paſilia) they who have so ambitious a soul as you, can never think it possible for themselves to conform to solitude; which is a way repugnant to ambition. I beseech you (said Lyſonice) do not use railery upon me before such a person as Cloraniſbes, who does not know me so well as to discern how far he ought to believe you. No, no, Madam (answer'd Cloraniſbes) do not fear that I think any thing of you which is not to your advantage; for your beauty so powerfully disposes hearts to judge favourably of you, that I find I cannot believe any thing against you. Since 'tis so (said Lyſonice, perceiving her Mother was talking to Paſilia at a window) I defie you to speak all that you please. Then I shall tell Cloraniſbes (said Deliſia to whom she spoke) what a dispute we had by the way as we came hither; and I believe, as prepossess'd as he is with your beauty, he will not acknowledge that your sentiment is more just than mine. We shall see that (answer'd Lyſonice coldly.) I beseech you (said Cloraniſbes then to Deliſia) do not force me to be against you. Provided you will swear to me (answer'd she) that you will judge sincerely and and without partiality, I desire no more of you; and without so much as expecting your oath, you shall know that, after much discourse too long to relate, Lyſonice gave us to understand that she should like better to marry a King whom she hated, and who should always hate her, than a man whom she lov'd, and who always should love her, if he were of a mean fortune. The meanness of mine (reply'd Cloraniſbes) no doubt ought to make me declare against Lyſonice, but since I judge nothing according to my own interests, I cannot resolve to condemn her without first hearing her.

For my part (said Lyſonice) since inclination is a thing which arises in us without the help of our reason, I might, if I would, dispense with speaking any thing upon this matter; but however, I will acknowledge ingenuously, that ambition seems to me the most noble passion of all. I know not, whether it be the most noble (answer'd Cloraniſbes) but I know well it is not the most sweet. Be it what it will (said she) I apprehend a thousand pleasures in seeing ones self above all those that surround us, and I fancy endless discontentment in a mean fortune. As for me (said Deliſia) I should account my self more happy with a plain Shepherd whom I lov'd, than with a King whom I hated. If I hated his person (answer'd Lyſonice) I should love the degree he advanc'd me to, and his greatness. But if I lov'd a Shepherd (reply'd Deliſia) I should be contented with his fortune, I should love him even to his Cottage, and I should be more happy in seeing him feed his Flocks by a River side, than you would be upon the Throne, if you shar'd it with a Prince whom you hated. Believe me (answer'd Lyſonice); Love is a fine thing in Verses and in Pictures; but considering it a little profoundly, I think all the blessings of it are very imaginary. If you examine ambition aright (reply'd Deliſia) you will see that all the favours of Fortune do not affect the Soul sensibly. 'Tis true (said Cloraniſbes) the desires of Love proceed directly from the heart, but those of ambition only from the mind. I do not understand these distinctions very well (answer'd Lyſonice) but I know, the thought of being a Queen flatters my heart pleasingly; and that of being lov'd makes no great impression in my mind. 'Tis because you do not conceive (reply'd Cloraniſbes) there can be any thing in the World worthy of being lov'd by you; and because 'tis more easie for you to imagine that there should be a King so just as to make you a Queen, and give you a Crown which Fortune has not given you. You draw your self very civilly out of this matter (said Lyſonice) but nevertheless, I know know you judge me too ambitious, and therefore I will not give you leisure to explain your self more clearly, for fear Delisia triumph to my disadvantage; moreover, 'tis fit to mind my Mother, that we have not too much time to see the Gardens of so fair a house, and to return home. And so rising up, she oblig'd Cyrene to go walk, and this lovely company went to see the Gardens, the Orchards, and a Grove which was behind them; but they were much surpris'd to find a very noble and handsome Collation in a Banquetting-house which stood in the middle of the Grove. With which while these Ladies were entertain'd, they were delighted with the noise of a little consort of Countrey-Musick, very agreeably. And after it was ended, the Musician which belong'd to Cleranisbes, sung admirably well; by which time it was grown late, and so the Ladies went away extremely satisfied with the civility, wit, and magnificence of Cleranisbes, who with several of his Attendants conducted them half their way. When he left, Cyrene desir'd him to go and visit them, and he told her, that having intended to request her permission to do it, he should not fail to obey her: after which they parted. Cleranisbes, as he return'd home, was sufficiently pensive, though he did not imagine that he was fallen in Love. Yet the idea of Lysonice accompanied him in all places; which, being it was agreeable, he did not care to extinguish out of his memory, but on the contrary entertain'd it with pleasure. The next day going to see a Painter work, whom he had in his house, he found him more merry than ordinary; of which desiring to know the cause, Whence comes it (said he to him) that I see you so joyful? My Lord (answer'd he) I have been a whole moneth seeking in my fancy for an air of a head to make a Venus, and could not hit upon one; but I found one yesterday without trouble; for whilst the Ladies were at the Collation in the Banqueting house of the Grove, I stole the Picture of her they nam'd Lysonice. How? (said Cleranisbes surpris'd) could you make any thing that resembles her? Yes, my Lord (answer'd he) and upon the plain design which I made yesterday, I am confident to make an excellent Picture for resemblance. I pray do not execute your intention (said Cleranisbes smiling) for it would disturb my quiet, if I saw Lysonice's Picture often. Nevertheless, Cleranisbes ask him to shew him the draught which he had made, and found it very much resembling. He also desir'd to keep it; but the Painter who had a Venus to make, was so importunate with him, that he was constrain'd to let him have it to make use of for his intended Piece.

The next day Cleranisbes went to see Andronodorus, and told him of the Adventure he had had; for after he had reveal'd him of his ambition, he gave him an account of whatever happen'd to him. But he had no sooner done relating to him the visit he had receiv'd, but the wise Hermit taking his turn to speak, Ha! Cleranisbes (said he to him) have a care of your self; for love is not much better than ambition, and if I am not mistaken, your heart has more propensity to submit to the Tyranny of the one than of the other. I confess it wise Andronodorus (answer'd Cleranisbes) in this case methinks 'tis so easie for my Reason to defend my heart, that I ought not to fear being surpris'd. For Lysonice and I have so different interests, that I think it is not easie for Love and Fortune joyn'd together to unite us; and besides, I have already perceiv'd Lysonice has a very ambitious Soul, and so it would be in vain for an Exile to offer to become her Servant. Yet, I say once more have a care of your self (reply'd Andronodorus) for if there be no other obstacles than those you mention, to keep you from being in love, you are so already; for 'tis certain, difficulty produces a greater progress towards love than facility. Beware then to fortifie your Reason well, if you mind not to lose the contentment you have obtain'd. But do you think (said Cleranisbes) there is no Love commendable? I think there may be (answer'd this wise old man) and I grant there is nothing more excellent than a lawful, tender, and constant Love: but Cleranisbes, where will you find two persons that Love one another, who have minds so generous, hearts so tender, and Souls so constant, as to love one another ardently and for ever? And yet without all these conditions, Love is but a weakness, a crime and a folly. So that, considering the almost impossibility to find a woman which deserves to be lov'd, or knows how to love, 'tis best for a man to preserve his liberty. Love founded upon beauty can never out-live it, and many times dies before it: Love which is establisht out of vanity, is but vanity it self, and cannot last: that which proceeds from the interests of Fortune, is nothing but covetousness, that which is inspir'd only by youth, passes away with it, and is nothing but levity and inconstancy: that which arises from the temper or constitution, is blind, gross, and brutish: and there is none durable or commendable, but that which is produc'd by vertue. Defend your self then couragiously against Love, if you believe me, and suffer not your self to be surpris'd by so dangerous an Enemy. Do not flatter your self with the thought that there may be calm Loves; for,

As spring without West-winds has never been,
So Love without desires was never seen.

Therefore enjoy the quiet in which you are, Cleranisbes, and remember that flight is the only course that can secure you.

The discourse of Andronodorus very much mov'd Cleranisbes; and yet he could not resolve to forbear giving a visit to Cyrene and Lysonice, but he really purposed to go thither but once. At his return home, he found his Painter had finisht the head of his Venus, and that this Picture so much resembled Lysonice that it was the same. His heart was mov'd with it, and he could not behold it without pleasure and disturbance; nevertheless, at the same time he laught at himself for his weakness, and so went to his rest. But the next morning he could not keep himself from going again to Lysonice's Picture, and the day following he went to the house of the valiant Bostar, father of this fair person, who receiv'd him with extraordinary caresses, and led him to the apartment of Cyrene, where Lysonice, Pasilia, and Delisia were. Whereas he had receiv'd these Ladies with much civility before, they receiv'd him so now; and this obliging reception adding something to the charms of Lysonice, prov'd a further engagement of the heart of Cleranisbes. At first Bostar began to discourse about their common misfortunes, by which they were both exil'd; complaining that Princes ordinarily think themselves dispens'd with from ingratitude, and that they owe nothing to those which serve them; then, lamenting their unhappiness, in that they can scarce ever distinguish flatterers from their true friends, not know the clear truth; and which is worst, care not to know it, being being willing to be deceiv'd but not recompenſe ſuch as are faithful to them; and finally, in that they do more good to thoſe that hurt them, than to thoſe that have done them ſervice. But after this Boſtar being retir'd upon occaſion of ſome buſineſs, the converſation was chang'd, and became pleaſant, mirthful, and divertiſing, that Cloranisbes, to his unhappineſs, judg'd this converſe more delightful than with the ſolitary Andronodorus. He offer'd to return home at night, but Boſtar and Cyrene detain'd him till the next day: whereby having had more time to know Lyſonice's wit, he was ſo taken with it, that he perceiv'd it would be very troubleſome to him to reſiſt her. All her diſcourſe was agreeable, and though ſhe had a little vehemence in her mind, yet her eyes ſhew'd ſo much ſweetneſs, and that vehemence was ſo ſprightly, that ſhe made it part of her gracefulneſs.

Thus Cloranisbes who went thither free, return'd home without almoſt the leaſt doubting of his Captivity. Yet he ſtay'd ſix days before he went again to the houſe of Boſtar, during which the poor Andronodorus dy'd. This loſs afflicted him, and perhaps would have hindred him from returning ſo ſoon to Cyrene's houſe, if all thoſe fair exile, had not ſent a complement to oblige him to viſit them. His ſadneſs being diſcernable in his countenance, they askt him the cauſe of it; which having told them, Lyſonice ſpoke with aſtoniſhment concerning ſuch as confine themſelves to eternal ſolitude, not being able to comprehend how 'tis poſſible for any one to renounce ſociety for ever. But ſhe ſpoke ſo ingeniouſly, that though her diſcourſe was repugnant to the ſentiments Cloranisbes had at that time, he was an exceeding admirer of her. But not to inſiſt upon ſuch ſmall matters, having greater to tell you, The more Cloranisbes beheld Lyſonice, the more charming he found her, and became the more amorous.

Shortly after Boſtar took his turn to viſit him, and ſo did all the Ladies, who were extremely amaz'd to ſee the Picture of Lyſonice at his houſe. This beautiful Virgin immediately bluſht at the ſight of it, and askt Cloranisbes where he took it. When you have told me (anſwer'd he ſoftly) fair Lyſonice where you have put the heart you have taken from me, I ſhall tell you how I came by your Picture. Believe me Cloranisbes (reply'd ſhe) if you had my Picture no more than I have your heart, you would not have it at all. You mean, Madam (anſwer'd he) that you would not have it be yours. In good earneſt (ſaid ſhe to him) I conceive women in baniſhment do not much mind taking of hearts; and men in the ſame condition have enough to do to ſupport their adverſity, without ſuffering them to be taken imprudently. Ah! too charming Lyſonice (anſwer'd Cloranisbes) 'tis always pertinent to love you. This little converſation was at this time interrupted; for Cyrene, Deliſia, and Paſilia, who had ſtay'd to conſider the Picture, came and joyn'd with them; but, in fine, though what Cloranisbes ſaid to Lyſonice might have been taken only in the way of gallantry, yet he was glad he had ſpoken. As for Lyſonice, ſhe made no reflection upon it at that time. I do not tell you that Cloranisbes gave this fair company all the divertiſement, that could be had in the Countrey: but I aſſure you he became deſperately amorous of Lyſonice; and having the counſels of Andronodorus no longer, the remembrance of thoſe he had formerly given him was too weak to withſtand the charms of this admirable Lady, whom then he ſaw very frequently. Moreover he ſought an opportunity to ſpeak to her of his growing paſſion, and found it; but ſhe receiv'd him ſo fiercely, that he was more miſerable after he had diſcover'd his love to her than before. Believe me, Cloranisbes (ſaid ſhe to him one day when he conjur'd her to ſuffer him to love her) Love is not ſuitable for the unhappy, nor does it belong to the unfortunate to love one another; it would be too much to have complaints to make both of Fortune and Love at the ſame time. Ha! Madam (ſaid Cloranisbes to her) I am perſwaded you cannot but have a great averſion for me; for if it were not ſo, you would on the contrary find there would be ſome ſweetneſs to your ſelf in raigning abſolutely in my heart, and that love is a conſolation of all ſorts of infelicities. No, no, Cloranisbes (ſaid ſhe to him) do not imagine I have any averſion for you, for I aſſure you I know very well all the excellent qualities you are indu'd with; but you are an Exile, and ſo am I; I love the World; I am ambitious, and I hate ſolitude: judge then, whether, as things now ſtand, 'tis poſſible for you to render me happy. But, Madam (anſwer'd he) Fortune may change, and 'tis eaſie for me not to be perpetually in baniſhment. Nor but that I could eaſily diſpenſe with the World if I enjoy'd you (added he) but ſince you love it, I will love it too for your ſake, I will hate Solitude, and Love ſhall anew inſpire me with ambition.

Thus (amiable Plotina) ſtood the caſe of Cloranisbes with Lyſonice, when I was at his houſe, when I found thoſe Love-verſes, and when I play'd the prank of tranſlating them, to perplex him. After this afflicted Lover had related to me all that I have rehears'd to you, he complain'd of his unhappineſs in a moſt paſſionate manner. For, my dear Amilcar (ſaid he to me) no man alive can love more ardently than I do; none can have leſs hope than I have; and finally, none can reſent greater torment. I know Lyſonice has ſeveral Lovers at the Court of Maſſilia, who beſtir themſelves to their power to make Boſtar's peace: ſo that if he be recall'd, I ſhall loſe Lyſonice for ever, and live in my Deſart tormented with love, jealouſie and deſpair. Boſtar, without doubt, does not hate me (added he) Cyrene loves me very tenderly; and Paſilia and Deliſia are for me; but Lyſonice, with all her eſteem, is ſenſible to nothing but ambition. But however (ſaid I) is not her heart ſenſible of joy? Yes (anſwer'd he) and I know not whether it be partly becauſe ſhe loves pleaſures and is very ambitious. If you credit me (reply'd I) inſtead of complaining continually as you do, ſtudy to divert her, carry me to Boſtar's houſe, to whom I will give hope of your return to Utica, and ſuffer me a little to obſerve your Miſtreſs. But if you ſhould go and become my Rival (anſwer'd Cloranisbes) I ſhould be much more unhappy. If I ſhould (reply'd I ſmiling) it would be probably for ſo ſhort a time, that I ſhould not have leiſure to prejudice you. For beſides that 'tis ſeldom I have any long Loves, I am to ſtay here but eight days; ſo that my abſence would cure me of my paſſion.

At that time, charming Plotina, you had not yet taught me to love conſtantly. But, in fine, Cloranisbes promis'd to carry me the day following to Boſtar's houſe. Where accordingly, I found that Cyrene was a handſome woman, to whom one might ſtill offer an idle heart, without being lyable to blame; I found Paſilia very amiable, Deliſia infinitely agreeable, and and Lysonice so fair and so charming, that if my Friend had not lov'd her, I should have infallibly become her servant. But because I would not augment his miseries, I hastned as much as possibly I could to make choice between Pasilia and Delisia. And having well consider'd them both, I fix'd my self upon Delisia. Whereas I came from the Court, Lysonice receiv'd me with joy; and when I said I believ'd Cloranisbes was likely to be recall'd speedily, she treated him a little better that day than ordinary. Moreover, I describ'd the Court of Utica to her so gallant, and the vicinity of Carthage so commodious and pleasant, that me thought, if Cloranisbes were recall'd, she would easily resolve to marry him. In the Interim, it being my happiness to please all this fair company, Bostar propos'd to us to stay at his house, during the eight days allotted me to abide with Cloranisbes. Wherefore, conceiving it would be advantageous to my Friend if we accepted his offer, I carri'd the matter so handsomly, that they seem'd almost to force us to stay there. In this time I lov'd Delisia, I did not hate Pasilia, I was very complacential to Cyrene, and I also lov'd a yonng Phœnician Virgin who came to Bostar's house, and whose name was Phelinice. She is indeed a very lovely Lady, of an indifferent stature, but extreme well shap'd; she has a round visage, a little dimple in her chin, a lively complexion, a somewhat high forehead, a handsome mouth, a very pleasing smile, black and sparkling eyes, purely white hands, and hair of the fairest bright chesnut, that ever was seen; which is very rare in that Countrey. But though Phelinice be always very agreeable, yet she is infinitely more upon one of these days in which she has a certain sweet and a little caressing complacency, which becomes her admirably. She is naturally good, discreet, and generous; she is both debonair and melancholy; she is very ingenious, and is capable of more things than many others who make greater ostentation than she. Pleasure is sufficiently sutable to her inclination, though she can dispense with it when 'tis fitting to do so; as for her friends, she loves them well, but yet a little less than she thinks, because she does not believe her self so well belov'd by them as she really is; and having taken up a conceit, that true friendship may be without an absolute confiding intimacy, it is hard for her to escape the upbraidings of her Friends. Yet this does not hinder her from being very amiable and very worthy to be lov'd; and therefore I lov'd her at least as much as Delisia and Pasilia. But being she was but one day with us, I was quit of her for four and twenty hours love.

The eight days we stay'd there, were spent very delightfully; for having no other design but to divert our selves, we satisfied our desires, notwithstanding all the ambition of Lysonice. We went a hunting and a fishing, we walkt, we made jovial Sonnets, and extemporary Verses; we sometimes talk'd seriously, and many times otherwise, and, in brief, we had very divertising conversations. That which often render'd them agreeable, was, for that there liv'd rustical people in the places adjacent, whose countrey modes made Lysonice desperate, and gave her occasion to declare against the Countrey very agreeably. But forasmuch as I know well enough how to counterfeit all sorts of people, I diverted her sufficiently in conversing with these people, as if I had been one of them. For I could imitate their looks, speak their language, and transform my self absolutely into a noble Bumkin. And by this folly I drew pleasure from a thing which otherwise would have been very disgustful to her.

In the mean time Cloranisbes imploy'd all his endeavours to win the heart of Lysonice; he knew well that she esteem'd him, and nothing was so prejudicial to him as his quality of being an Exile: but this difficulty was in a manner insuperable, and made him extremely unhappy. And the more, because he durst not hope to make his peace with the Prince of Carthage; for I had given him to understand that it was the Princess who was his chief enemy. However, he dissembled his sentiments, and omitted nothing whereby he might please Lysonice. But at length the eight days being ended, I departed, and I dare say, Cloranisbes and I left behind us some regret for our absence. For my part, I was melancholy till I return'd to Utica, but especially at my leaving of Cloranisbes amidst the inquietudes of his violent affection. I promis'd him at parting, to do him all the service lay in my power, and indeed I did not fail of my word. And I had a better opportunity to do it than at any time before, because the Princess of Carthage, who alone had procur'd Cloranisbes disgrace, was now out of favour with the Prince her self, and constrain'd to retire into the Countrey. I forgot to tell you, that when I took leave of Cloranisbes, I promis'd him not to discover his passion to any, nor so such as to say I had seen Lysonice; and that in my return, the Painter who had workt for him in his Desart, follow'd me and came to Utica. For that Cloranisbes had desir'd me to assist him as much as I could, I did not fail to do so; and he soon got imployment.

Now the Prince of Carthage having some secret design to make War, and knowing that Bostar was banisht from the Court of the King his Master, that he liv'd not far from Cloranisbes, and had a very strong place which belong'd to him, he purposed to gain him to his interest, to the end to make him declare for them; wherefore having happily dispos'd him to recall Cloranisbes, I acted so dextrously that he gave me Commission to send to my Friend that he might return. This news made Cloranisbes both joyful and sorrowful; for knowing his exile was an obstacle to him to be lov'd by Lysonice, he was glad for being recall'd to Court; but then he was on the other side extremely afflicted, for that he could not cease to be an exile without being absent from his Mistress. Nevertheless whereas this absence might possibly prove to the advantage of his Love, he resolv'd upon it, and went to take his leave of Bostar, Cyrene, Lysonice, and the Ladies his Friends. He promis'd them to return to see them, and desir'd their permission to write to them. Lysonice was more pleasing towards him this day, than she had been ever before, and having an opportunity to entertain her apart for a quarter of an hour, Suffer me, Madam (said he to her) to complain of the joy which the end of my banishment gives you. You ought rather to thank me for it (said she to him) for 'tis a sign that I sensibly interest my self in your happiness. But, Madam (reply'd he) is it possible for one that has given you his heart to be happy when he is absent from you? I know not whether or no you will be happy at Utica (answer'd she) but I know well you would have been always unhappy here. But, Cloranisbes (added this fair Virgin) I will not have you go away ill satisfied of me; know then, that I am perswaded, when one loves another ardently, he ought always to study more to content him, than his own pleasure; and so, when a Lover studies only to enjoy his Mistress, Miſtreſs, without conſidering whether he can render her fortune happy, he loves but imperfectly. Therefore conceiving that adverſity and love cannot ſubſiſt together, I have been unwilling to encourage the affection you pretend towards me, for fear of increaſing your unhappineſs. But, in fine, I eſteem you infinitely, and if I were capable of love, I doubt not but I ſhould affect you rather than any other. This, Cloranisbes, is all that can be ſaid by an Exile to a man who is not yet wholly diſcharg'd of his baniſhment (if I may ſo ſpeak) an exile, I ſay, who accounts nothing more unjuſt than not always to imploy the greateſt endeavours for advancing the greatneſs and honour of the perſon lov'd.

Although this which Lyſonice ſaid to Cloranisbes was not too obliging, nevertheleſs perceiving that ſhe was willing to give him a little hope, he was raviſht with it, and us'd the moſt paſſionate and exquiſite blandiſhments to her that the moſt ardent love can inſpire an Inamorate with; after which, he came back to Utica. I had a purpoſe to have gone to meet him, and give him notice that his Painter, who had kept a copy of Lyſonice's picture, had ſhew'd it to the Prince; who was ſo charm'd with Lyſonice's beauty, that he kept the Picture and plac't it in his Chamber: but the Prince having taken me to hunting with him, Cloranisbes arriv'd at Utica a quarter of an hour before we return'd hither. And going to wait upon the Prince at the Palace, he was extremely ſurpris'd to ſee Lyſonice's picture in her Chamber. This thought ſo wholly took up his mind, that though the Prince's arrival caus'd a ſufficient noiſe in the Court of the Palace, he ſcarce heard it at all. Yet at length he went to meet him in the Court, and being the Prince lov'd him very well, and believ'd he ſtood in need of him, he careſs'd and embrac'd him with tenderneſs. Let us forget what is paſs'd, Cloranisbes (ſaid he to him) and make amends for it with the future; ſo that you may be never ſeparated from my intereſts. Cloranisbes very reſpectfully anſwer'd to that which the Prince ſaid to him; who after that, fell to ſpeak of the hunting and ſeveral indifferent matters. But ſome time after he was in his Chamber, he caus'd Cloranisbes to enter into his Cloſet, where when he had diſcours'd very obligingly to him, and Cloranisbes fully juſtifi'd himſelf, he told him that to teſtifie to him that he believ'd him innocent, he would preſently put confidence in him, and impart to him his deſires to bring Boſtar to his intereſts. I know he is mal-content with the King of Maſſilia (ſaid he to him) that he is couragious, his reputation amongſt theſe Nations, and is maſter of a ſtrong place; therefore you muſt endeavour to gain him to me, and oblige him to declare himſelf for me when I ſhall deſire it. My Lord (anſwer'd Cloranisbes, who was glad of this imployment) I am ſufficiently capable to bring to paſs that which you deſire; For Boſtar has ſome eſteem for me. Then you muſt return ſecretly to him (added the Prince) but ſeeing it concerns me that this negotiation be neither tedious nor unſucceſsful, I am to ask you, whether Boſtar's Daughter, whoſe Picture you have ſeen in my Chamber, be as handſome as it; for, if ſhe be, you muſt tell Boſtar I am ready to marry her, on condition he will do what I deſire. You know (added he) I have always ſet up my reſolution never to marry a woman but who is admirably fair; therefore it behoves you to anſwer me punctually, and tell me whether Lyſonice be like her picture: for I ſay again, if ſhe be as handſome, I ſhall be glad that ſhe be the means to unite Boſtar and me; ſeeing I never beheld any thing ſo handſome as this Picture, and I am in love with it.

Cloranisbes was then extremely perplex'd; the love he had for Lyſonice combated with his generoſity, which urg'd him to tell a truth which might content the ambition of that fair perſon; but he had ſo little time to deliberate upon a thing moſt difficult to reſolve upon, that Love being unable to conſent that he ſhould yield up his Miſtreſs, and not daring to tell the Prince he was amorous of Lyſonice, eſpecially not being much lov'd by her, he told him, 'twas true, Lyſonice was a great beauty, but in his own eye ſhe came much ſhort of her Picture. Perhaps (ſaid the Prince to him) you have not well conſider'd her; for baniſht perſons have uſually ſo many other things to take up their minds, that their eyes may commit injuſtices. But however (added the Prince) it is requiſite that you go to Boſtar, and treat with him, and conſider Lyſonice well: and then in caſe ſhe be as handſome as her Picture, you may confidently aſſure Boſtar that I will marry her. If ſhe be not, offer him a greater fortune in my Dominions than he has in that of the King his Maſter; and do not come back till this treaty be accompliſht. Cloranisbes being unable to contradict the Prince, accepted the imployment, which he gave him, and prepar'd himſelf to depart the next day. But when he came to ſpend the evening with me, I ſaw him ſo afflicted that I pityed him. I knew not what to think at firſt; for though the Prince accounted Lyſonice's Picture very handſome, yet I was ignorant of his ſecret intention; ſo that I could do nothing but conjecture. I aſſure you (ſaid I to Cloranisbes) I never told the Prince that I had ſeen Lyſonice, nor that you were in love with her, but it was your Painter's doing, who being ambitious to ſhew what he could do, caus'd her Picture to be ſeen by the Prince. Alas! my dear Amilcar (ſaid he to me) I am unfortunate. After which exclamation he related to me what had befallen him. But (ſaid I to him) you do not account that you need be ſo perplex'd. For if I were in your place, I would tell the Prince I was amorous of Lyſonice; it not being credible that he is ſo much in love with her Picture as to contend for her with you. But you do not conſider what you ſay (anſwer'd he) for the Prince has not only had always a fanſie to marry the handſomeſt woman in the World, if he could, but he aims in this Marriage to bring Boſtar over to his intereſts; ſo that ſhould I tell him of my love to Lyſonice, he would look upon me as an obſtacle to his deſign; and being I am not yet too well eſtabliſht in his mind, I ſhould ruine my ſelf therein for ever; I ſhould cauſe him to baniſh me a ſecond time, and eternally deprive my ſelf of the hope of pretending to Lyſonice. But what then intend you to do? (ſaid I.) Alas! my dear Amilcar (anſwer'd he) I know not; for, to examine things aright, I betray Lyſonice as well as the Prince, by ſaying ſhe is leſs handſome than her Picture, ſince nothing is more true than that her Picture is a thouſand times leſs handſome than her ſelf; and which is worſt (added he) I am a wretch who love only my own felicity, who have no regard to Lyſonice's advancement, who offer to keep her from that which of all things in the World moſt ſuites with her inclination, and who, having no aſſurance of being happy, go about to hinder her from being ſo, as without doubt ſhe would be, if ſhe became wife to the Prince of Carthage. For all this, I cannot overcome my paſſion, my generoſity muſt yield to it, Lysonice must be injur'd because I love her, and because I cannot deprive my self of her; and though I am to betray both the Prince, Bostar and Lysonice, yet 'tis absolutely necessary that I lose not hope, and beware of being the instrument to put her into the arms of another, whose affection being only grounded on her beauty, would in a short time diminish. So that, when I consider well, 'tis for Lysonice's own sake that I must hinder her from becoming Princess of Carthage; or, at least I will perswade my self so. Cloranisbes spoke this so pathetically, that he caus'd me to pity him. But again, (said I to him) What intend you to do? I intend (answer'd he) to employ all my power to invite Bostar into the interests of the Prince, without mentioning the Marriage of Lysonice; and if my negotiation prove happy, at my return I will give the Prince an account of it, and at last tell him that Lysonice is less handsome than her Picture. And being he does not know her, that fancie of his will vanish. But withal, to hinder Lysonice from convincing me of untruth, and appearing so soon at the Court, I will handsomly perswade Bostar to leave Cyrene and Lysonice in that important place which he holds, whither he would not go at first, for fear of rendring himself more suspected to the King of Massilia. But when all that you speak is done (said I to him) Lysonice will not be yours. No (answer'd he) but she will not be anothers, and 'tis possible in process of time she may be mine.

I spoke many things more to Cloranisbes, to which he answer'd as one prepossess'd by his passion. Nevertheless, he could take no very firm resolution, and the incertainty which distracted him made his greatest torment. So he went away unresolv'd, and continu'd his journey in the same manner; and when he was arriv'd near Bostar's house, he was almost in the mind that his great affection might induce him to give over pretending to Lysonice, and to tell her ingenuously the truth. But when at his arrival he beheld her upon the Stone-stair entrance, going to walk with Pasilia and Delisia, this sight destroy'd all his designs, and caus'd him to take an immoveable resolution to do all he could to marry Lysonice. He had no sooner resolv'd thus, but he look't upon matters in another manner, he believ'd there was no unfaithfulness in doing what he did, that he having lov'd Lysonice a long time, and the Prince loving but her Picture, he might innocently practise a deceit, and that provided he could engage Bostar in the interests of his Master, he was not Criminal in not mentioning his marriage with Lysonice. In effect, without amusing my self too long in telling you after what manner he acted, I shall only tell you, that he manag'd Bostars mind so well, that he brought him to that which he desir'd, which was so much the more easily done, because he was advertis'd the King of Massilia had resolv'd to destroy him: so Cloranisbes almost intirely concluded the treaty with Bostar.

All this while Lysonice no longer considering Cloranisbes as an Exile, but on the contrary as a man that might free her self from being such, treated him better than ordinary, suffer'd him to speak to her of his passion, and did not forbid him even to hope. This confirming Cloranisbes in the resolution he had taken, he remain'd firm in it, and was more amorous than he had been; without doubt nothing serves more to augment love than hope.

At his return he was receiv'd very well by the Prince, especially when he inform'd him that his negotiation was successful. Yet he was sufficiently discontented when Cloranisbes assur'd him too, that Lysonice was not so fair in his eyes as her Picture. Not but that she is handsome, my Lord (said he to him) but either I understand not your inclination, or I am perswaded her beauty would not affect you. For my part (added the Prince in a great indignation) I cannot sufficiently blame the weakness of women in general, who will always have their Pictures made handsomer than themselves, and will be more oblig'd to the Painter than Nature, without considering that it would be more pleasing for them to hear it said, that they are more handsome than their Pictures, than to perceive in the eyes of such as behold their Portraitures, that they judge they have been flatter'd. Believe me (said I to the Prince; for I was present at this conversation) all the world desires to be flatter'd; people will have flattering Pictures, they admit of adulation with delight, they will be flatter'd even in their houses, and trifles; and I know a woman that has a little Dog who would take it very ill if she were not flatter'd in conceit of him; and whoso would be her friend, must confidently affirm that 'tis the handsomest Dog in the world. Judge then, my Lord (added I) if those women are not to be pardon'd who desire to have the appellation of plump, fair, and rosie given them, to have arch'd eyes, little mouths, and fair hands, and handsome arms attributed to them, though they have none of all these. They must therefore be pardon'd a weakness which they cannot be hindred from (answer'd Cloranisbes.) For my part (reply'd Cloranisbes) I cannot pardon the Painter who has made the Picture of Lysonice handsomer than she is; for I should have extremely lov'd a woman as fair as that. But, in fine, since 'tis so, I must be satisfi'd, and to put it out of my mind (added he) I will have that deceitful Picture taken away. And accordingly he gave it to Cloranisbes, who receiv'd it joyfully. However (added he) 'tis sufficient that your negotiation succeeds well.

The next day the Prince sent Cloranisbes back again to Bostar; the Treaty was sign'd, and Bostar, not caring any longer for being suspected by the King of Massilia, went forthwith to that important place which belong'd to him with Cyrene, Lysonice, and the two Ladies his Kinswomen. The Prince of Carthage sent some men to him to strengthen his Garrison: at length the business became so much rumor'd, that it could not be doubted of. In the interim, Cloranisbes increasing in favour, the favours of Lysonice were also augmented towards him; and according as he was consider'd by his Master, he was likewise by his Mistress, who at this time gave him all grounds to believe that she would obey without resistance, if Bostar commanded her to marry him. Cyrene greatly wish this Marriage; and Bostar himself desir'd it, both out of affection to Cloranisbes, and to content Lysonice, who he knew did not dislike it, and more also out of Policy. But sometimes he wonder'd much, that Cloranisbes, who he knew was passionately amorous of Lysonice, did not speak to him about it.

After divers matters which 'tis not necessary to tell you, because they relate only to the interests of the King of Massilia and the Prince of Carthage, Bostar came to Utica to confer with the Prince of Carthage, who was then a great Lover of a Lady of Quality in his Court; but he did not bring Cyrene nor Lysonice thither, who remain'd in the strong place I told you of. Cloranisbes love being now very violent, and observing ving the Prince ingaged in an affection which agreeably employ'd him, he thought he might begin in good earneſt to think of being happy. Wherefore he ſpeaks in private to Boſtar about his love to Lyſonice, askt him, if he might hope to be happy, and conjures him to open his heart to him, as himſelf is reſolv'd to open his own to him. Boſtar approves his deſign, and tells him that he promiſes him his daughter: after which Cloranisbes gave him a thouſand thanks. But, my Lord (ſaid he to him) if you pleaſe to have me happy, it lies in your power to render me abſolutely ſo; for I know the Prince of Carthage is of ſo nice and ſuſpicious an humor, that if I ſhould appear very amorous of Lyſonice, I ſhould be always ſuſpected by him. If I ſhould but expreſs my ſelf deſirous to marry, he would leſs eſteem me for it, and think me leſs addicted to his intereſts: therefore to accompliſh my happineſs, and keep him from believing me more devoted to you than to himſelf, it is requiſite to act in ſuch manner, that he may think I marry Lyſonice only becauſe he commands me to do it; and in fine, 'tis your part to bring him to command it. Though it be not the cuſtom (anſwer'd Boſtar) for a father to ſpeak firſt of marrying his daughter, yet I have ſo earneſt a deſire to give you mine, that I will diſpenſe with the ordinary decorum for your ſake. And accordingly Boſtar manag'd this affair with the Prince in ſuch ſort, that he oblig'd him to think fit of his own accord for him to marry Lyſonice into his Court, to the end that important place which belong'd to him, might not after his death be poſſeſs'd by any perſon that depended on the King of Maſſilia. 'Tis for that reaſon, my Lord (ſaid Boſtar to the Prince) that I preſume to deſire a husband of you for Lyſonice. The Prince judging this propoſition of Boſtar might be to his advantage, receiv'd it well, and ſet himſelf to think who would be a fit perſon in his Court to marry Lyſonice. At firſt he caſt his eyes towards me; but a moment after remembring how great an enemy I was to marriage, he diverted his thoughts to ſeveral others, but he found ſome obſtacles in all: at length he thought of Cloranisbes, and neverthleſs he durſt not name him to Boſtar, becauſe remembring in what manner he had heard him ſpeak of Lyſonice, he fear'd he might have ſome averſion againſt her. Whereof being deſirous to be ſatisfied, he only told Boſtar that he would think upon it. Aſſoon as night was come, the Prince ſpeaking in private to Cloranisbes, propounded the buſineſs to him with all the Reaſons which Political intereſt ſuggeſted to him, to perſwade him to marry Lyſonice. Not that I will compel you to it (ſaid he) if you have any avertſion for her; but if ſhe be indifferent to you, undoubtedly you can do nothing more advantageous for your ſelf, nor important for me; for you are not ignorant of what importance the place is which belongs to Boſtar, and which will be yours after his death. Cloranisbes heard this which the Prince ſaid to him, with a joy ſo great, that he had ſome difficulty to diſſemble it. Yet he was ſo much Maſter of himſelf, that he receiv'd this Propoſal like a man averſe to marry, and who would not reſolve upon it, but only becauſe it was the Prince's pleaſure; who therefore thank'd him for the conſent he gave to it.

Now the Prince being us'd to proceed haſtily in all things which he undertakes, the next morning he told Boſtar he had found a husband for Lyſonice, and then nam'd Cloranisbes to him, who was accepted as you may imagine. Wherefore being impatient till the buſineſs were accompliſh'd, it was reſolv'd Cloranisbes ſhould return with Boſtar to marry Lyſonice. At firſt the Prince would have had Lyſonice have come to Utica; but Cloranisbes repreſenting to him that there was danger in leaving the place ſo long without the preſence of Boſtar, Cyrene, and Lyſonice, he at length determin'd that it was beſt for Cloranisbes to go along with Boſtar thither; and the Prince told me, that to render the feaſt more delightful, he would permit me to go to the Nuptials. You may judge how joyful Cloranisbes was; for in the tranſports of his contentment, he foreſaw nothing but delight and happineſs for all the remainder of his life. Lyſonice had treated him well the laſt time he ſaw her; her ambition had wherewith to be contented, as well as her love; Boſtar and Cyrene lov'd him; and the Prince being amorous of another at this time, he did not think there was any thing to be fear'd. So then he ſtudied only how to give Lyſonice every thing which he imagin'd might pleaſe her. Knowing ſhe affected magnificence, there was no piece of State in Carthage that might befit her, but he gave it her; and procur'd her ſuch a handſome retinue, that nothing could be deſir'd more. But, in fine, we departed with Boſtar, and went to find Cyrene and Lyſonice, who having been advertis'd of the ſtate of matters, receiv'd us admirably well. Lyſonice, having heard the Prince of Carthage's Court many times ſpoken of as a very gallant Court, was extremely joyful to think that ſhe ſhould be in a very conſiderable rank there; ſeeing ſhe ſhould marry a man whom the Prince lov'd very well, and whoſe merit made him worthy of the love of all the world. Cloranisbes obſerving her ſo well ſatisfi'd, was the happieſt man in the world; as without doubt there is nothing more ſweet in love, than to cauſe the felicity of a perſon whom we love. And indeed I never ſaw a perſon have a more real joy than that which Cloranisbes had; for though there was ſome deceit in his proceeding, yet Love render'd it excuſable, and his paſſion was too ardent then to ſuffer him to be capable of repenting. But becauſe he was wholly taken up with entertaining his Miſtreſs and his own joys, he deſir'd me to take ſome care for the magnificence of the Feaſt. Wherefore ſearching in my memory all the gallantries which I had ſeen in my travels, I may ſay, I contributed ſomething to the divertiſement of the Marriage. I omit to tell you that Boſtar made continual feaſtings for three days, that there were publick ſports, and ſeveral exerciſes, for which Lyſonice gave the prize, that on the Feaſt-day there was a very gallant Ball; but I ſhall only tell you, that the next day, becauſe all the Africans are exquiſite Dancers, we made a kind of a Maſque, which I had devis'd, wherein Paſilia, Deliſia, and ſome other Ladies danc'd; and it was receiv'd not without ſome applauſe.

Though we were not at the Marriage (ſaid Plotina interrupting him) do not think but we will be at the Maſque, and you ſhall not eſcape without telling us ſomething of it.

If I could remember the Verſes (anſwer'd Amilcar) I would tell you them with pleaſure, but they were made in ſuch haſte, that I did not think them worthy of retaining. The unpremeditated Poetry of Amilcar (ſaid Valeria) excels the moſt elaborate of others. However (ſaid Plotina) tell us the Subject and Order of the Maſque, and at leaſt ſome of the Verſes. I will, Madam, (anſwer'd he) but firſt, I muſt tell you, that I devis'd it, that being the perſons there were partly of the Court, and partly of the Country, I feign'd that there were two Cupids, one which might be nam'd the Cupid of the Court, and the other the Country-Cupid. And therefore I intitul'd our Masque

The different Effects of LOVE.

THe Castle wherein we were, having a large Hall, I caus'd a great Theatre to be erected in it from side to side. One end of it was adorn'd with the representation of stately Palaces, and the other with an agreeable Landskip. On the right side of the Theatre appear'd first the Cupid of the Court with a Bow painted and guilded, a Quiver of the same, adorn'd with Jewels, his Wings painted and guilded, a Torch in his hand, and follow'd by Jealousie, Dissimulation, Fear and Fury.

On the other side of the Theatre appear'd the Country-Cupid with a Bow and a Quiver adorn'd with flowers, follow'd by Hope, Laughter, Sports, Pleasures, and Jealousie, which appear'd not so frightful as the other, and was accompani'd only with light fears and suspicions which I had represented pleasantly enough.

Then either of these Cupids made a Speech, in which they related their power. After which defying one another to give proofs of it, they danc'd together in a threatning manner.

After this, the Entries were diversifi'd, namely, there was one of the Cupid of the Court, and another of the Cupid of the Country, with a different sort of Musick agreeing to either of them: of which I am going to give you as good a relation as my memory will permit me.

But to the end the several Entries might not be confounded, the two Cupids always appear'd there alternately, shewing the effects which they pretended to have caus'd.

The first Entry of the Cupid of the Court, was a King in Love with a Young Shepherdess; and the first of the Cupid of the Country, was a Young Shepherd coming out of a poor Cottage, proper, jovial, spruce, active at all sorts of exercises, though he had been taught the same only by Love.

The second Entry of the Cupid of the Court was an old Miser, offering all his Treasure to a Young Mistress, who laught at him as she took them: and the second Entry of the Country Cupid was a Young Shepherd, who giving his Shepherdess but a Shephook engraven with the Letters of her name, was receiv'd by him with a thousand caresses.

The third Entry of the Cupid of the Court, was three jealous and ill-us'd Lovers, fighting together in the presence of their Mistress who laught at them; and the third Entry of the Country Cupid was two Shepherds, who singing the best they could before their mistress, had an innocent contest together, of which her heart was the subject.

The fourth Entry of the Cupid of the Court was a foolish Gossip, delivering Letters, Bracelets of Hair and Pictures to four Lovers, without their perceiving it, with which she made her self pleasant with an old fine-friend of hers: and the fourth Entry of the Country Cupid was a young Shepheardess, who having a Sheep of her Flock stray'd away, carefully sought for it, and afterwards receiv'd it from the hand of her Shepherd who brought it back to her, after he had slain a Wolf that would have prey'd upon it.

The fifth Entry of the Cupid of the Court was a Young Lacedemonian virgin, follow'd by four Athenians, who require'd their hearts again of her, intimating thereby that the hatred of Nations does not hinder but love may arise between persons that are enemies: and the fifth Entry of the Country Cupid, was a Young Shepherdess, looking upon three Young Shepherds who strove for the prize of a race: the first running very swiftly without regarding her, arriv'd at the Goal before the rest; the second turning his head to see her, was cast behind; and the third not being able to pass further, stay'd just before her; after which the Young Shepherdess gave a Garland of Flowers to those that had run best, but she gave her heart to the third: at which the others were so discontented, that they went away in great despair.

The last Entry of the Cupid of the Court was men and women of quality, who having danc'd a while, stood in order to hear a Sonnet sung by Youth, which was admirably well represented, and in few words spoke a thousand things in praise of the Cupid of the Court, to whom alone belong'd gallantry, magnificence, and liberality: and the sixth and last Entry of the Country Cupid was several Shepherds and Shepherdesses, who danc't to Songs under Trees, alternately, answering one another. That which they sung was a kind of Dialogue, in which I made a little merry Satyre against the Cupid of the Court, and an Elogium in favour of the innocence of the Country Cupid. After which those of the Court and the Shepherds uniting, and there appearing but one Cupid, who represented something of both the other which had been seen, they acknowledg'd one another, and ended the Mask with a Speech, which concluded, to the honour of Love, and in the name of all those that had appear'd.

Come then and let's adore
At Courts and pleasant Springs,
This lovely Conqueror
Of Shepherds and of Kings.
Unhappy he whose heart
Receives not Cupid's wound,
Without the torments of his Dart,
No pleasure's to be found.

How? (said Plotina) do you think you shall not tell us some of the Verses of the Mask? In good earnest, Madam (answer'd Amilcar) I have the greatest desire in the World to do it, but it does not please my memory; and all that I can do, is only to tell you the four Verses which I made for that young Lacedemonian Virgin who was follow'd by the four Athenians, which requir'd their hearts again of her: yet they did not serve, and I was forc't to make others, because I had Greece so much in my head when I made them, that I did not remember I was in Africa. But they were these.

Why, unjust enemies, do you accuse me?
I've stolen a hundred hearts (so Love refuse me!)
But how can any dwells in Greece not know,
My Country Sparta's Laws do these allow?

No doubt you will say I have studied very deeply, and adde that I have an odde memory; but since I know not how to do otherwise, 'tis better that you do not interrupt me, but suffer me to finish my story. I will not detain you with exaggerating Clorimbes joy;

for

for it was great beyond the possibility of expression. Bostar also was highly contented, Cyrus was extremely satisfied; Pasilia and Delisia, hoping to go to the Court with their Kinswoman, were ravish't with joy; and Lysonice having married a very worthy person that lov'd her ardently, and who she believ'd would shortly carry her to Utica, seem'd as contented as any one in the World. Soon after I was recall'd by the Prince, and oblig'd to leave Cleranisbes with the fair Lysonice. At my taking leave of him, he desir'd me to speak as little as I could of Lysonice when I should be with the Prince, and only to say by the by that her beauty was much improv'd since I had seen her first; but above all, to beware of discovering that he was amorous of her: and accordingly I did as he desir'd, and that with sufficient address. So being oblig'd by the Prince to come away about some affairs of his, I departed as you have known, and left things in that condition.

But I have understood by a Friend of Cleranisbes whom he has sent to me, that the face of things is since much alter'd. For fifteen days after his Nuptials the Prince recall'd him to Utica. Lysonice was desirous to accompany her Husband; but for that he was loth the Prince should see her so soon, he told her, that having as yet no house there fit for her accommodation, it was more requisite for himself to go alone to make preparations; chusing rather to part for some time from the person whom he lov'd, than to venture to have her seen by the Prince so soon after his marriage; for he found that he had not sufficient power over himself to hide his passion for Lysonice, if they should be seen together at Utica. Besides, it is always natural enough to defer a thing which we fear, as much as possibly we can. So he left Lysonice, and promis'd her that he would return to her with all speed. At his coming to the Court, he found the Prince had broken off with his Mistress, was very much offended with her, likely never to love her more. Whereupon Cleranisbes us'd all the industry and address he could to re-engage him, that so having his mind prepossest, he might take less notice of Lysonice's beauty when he should see her: but he could effect nothing. In the interim he writ every day to his dear Lysonice, he sent her Presents continually, and not having ceas'd to be a Lover by becoming a Husband, there was no care which he did not use to please her: he went to see her several times; and as often as he saw her, he found out new impediments of her journey to Utica. One time he said his house was not ready; another, that it was requisite to expect till the Princess of Carthage were reconcil'd with her brother; another, that winter was not a healthful season wherein to go and reside at Utica: so that, though Lysonice accounted the time very long, yet she did not disbelieve what Cleranisbes told her, but hop'd that at least in the Spring she should go to Court. The Winter-time was thus pass'd over, but Spring being come, Cleranisbes found himself sufficiently perplex'd; for Lysonice knowing he had a house in the Country within half a days journey of Utica, she askt him to permit her at least to go thither for a month. Which not daring to refuse her, and judging also that it would be more convenient for him to go and see her there than elsewhere, he consented to. So Lysonice went to that place, and Pasilia and Delisia with her: but as soon as it was known at Utica that she was there, several persons went to visit her, Cleranisbes with all his address being unable to hinder them. Wherefore, seeing Lysonice has one of those surprising beauties, which such as behold the first time cannot refrain from speaking of, all that saw her, highly cry'd her up at their return to Utica, and rais'd such a report of her, that the Prince of Carthage hearing how exceedingly she was extoll'd, was surpris'd at it, calling to mind what Cleranisbes had answer'd him, when he shew'd him Lysonice's picture. Which sticking much in his thoughts, he ask'd one of those that had seen Lysonice whether he remembred to have sometimes seen a picture of her in his Chamber. Yes, my Lord (said that man, who knew nothing of what had pass'd between the Prince and Cleranisbes) but I can assure you without falshood, that Lysonice is a thousand times handsomer than that picture. But are you well assur'd of what you say? (reply'd the Prince) It will be easie for you, my Lord (answer'd the man) to be satisfi'd of it; for 'tis unlikely that Lysonice will never come to Utica. After this the Prince seem'd sufficiently pensive; for coming to consider that Cleranisbes did not cause his wife to come to Court, and that he had seen her while he was in banishment, he began to suspect that he might have told him an untruth; wherefore being desirous to know the certainty, and to be resolv'd by his own eyes, he purposed to go a hunting towards the side where Lysonice's house was; without letting Cleranisbes know of it, to the end he might not remove her. And indeed the Prince us'd so much care to hide his intention, that Cleranisbes was not advertis'd of it till the Prince was on horse-back for the hunting match. This put him to a great perplexity: nevertheless he conceal'd his disturbance, and went to the hunting with the rest. He seem'd also a more forward Hunter than any of those that follow'd the Prince; and whereas 'tis easie to turn out of the way in a chase, without any notice to be taken of it, Cleranisbes, who knew the shortest and most unfrequented passages to go from Utica to his House, separated from the rest in a Wood, and putting his Horse on at full speed, went with incredible diligence to find Lysonice, who was but beginning to dress her Head, and who in the rediousness of solitude did not much mind attiring her self. When she saw Cleranisbes arrive in such apparent haste, she ask him what the matter was, and how it hapned that he arriv'd so early: For you must needs have set forth very betimes in the morning (added she) or else you have travel'd very fast. I have done both (answer'd he) and the cause of my coming in such haste, is, for that I believe the Prince will come hither at the end of the chase. Lysonice being very glad of this news, bid her women advertise Pasilia and Delisia of it; after which, turning her self towards Cleranisbes, You have much oblig'd me (said she to him) in giving me this notice; for otherwise, the Prince would have found me in a negligent dress which would have sham'd you. Go then (added she) and give order to your people to make some handsome preparations for entertaining the Prince, and in the mean time (continu'd she smiling) I will go and dress my self to the best advantage I can, to the end to do you honour. I beseech you Madam (said he to her) enter into your Closet a moment, that I may speak with you there. Lysonice not being able to conjecture what Cleranisbes had to say to her, arise up, and did as he desir'd. She was no sooner enter'd into her Closet, but Cleranisbes looking upon her with very much love and sadness together, I beseech you, my dear Lysonice (said he to her) do not refuse me a request I have to make to you; and when you have granted it me, never ask me wherefore I made it. Since what you say to me (answer'd she) signifies some diffidence, you must permit me to be a little surpriz'd. However, speak, if you please, what you desire of me. I wish (said he to her) that, if you will oblige me, you would feign your self sick to day, and instead of adorning your self, as you intend, be as carelessly attir'd as you can; let the Curtains of your Windows be drawn, let the Pillows of your Bed be depress'd, and finally, let there be so little day in your Chamber that the Prince may not yet know that I am the most happy of all men. How? my Lord, (interrupted Lysonice, blushing with anger) is the solitude then in which I am, an effect of so strange a jealousie, as renders you capable of the most outragious caution that ever was? What? my Lord (added she again) do you believe that if I should excite love in the Prince, it would be easie for him to excite the like in me, now I am your Wife? I confess indeed (continu'd this offended Fair) that being naturally ambitious, if he had lov'd me heretofore, he might have been not ill-treated, even though he were not so worthy a person as he is; but as things are now, you do me an injury which cannot be repair'd. Alas! charming Lysonice (said he to her) I beseech you do not condemn me so lightly. I swear to you I am not jealous; 'tis ambition alone which causes me to act thus, and 'tis only for your sake that I make you a request which seems so unreasonable to you. But grant me, if it be possible, that which I desire of you, without obliging me to tell you the reason which forces me to it; and go not to imagine that I suspect your virtue, or out of a sentiment of jealousie fear, lest the Prince should excite love in you. That which I do has another cause, I swear to you with all the sincerity which I am capable. No, no, my Lord (reply'd she) you can have no other sentiment in your soul, but jealousie, and I see well (added she with tears in her eyes) that I am only to prepare my self to be the most unhappy person in the world. For what means is there to cure a jealousie which foresees the future so far off? and how can such an injury as this be forgotten? I have in a manner seen nothing but Trees since I was your Wife (proceeded she in great passion) I have heard nothing but Birds, and convers'd with none but Pasilia, Delisia and your self; and yet, I see, this does not hinder you from being jealous. I protest to you once again, Madam (said he to her) I am not jealous. But if you are not (answer'd she) tell me then the reason which obliges you to make me so strange a request. The fear of being less lov'd by you Madam (reply'd he) is the sole cause which hinders me from telling you that which you desire. I assure you (said she) this motion of yours is so strange, that you can tell me nothing which is more; and my mind is so disturb'd with the ill-grounded suspicion you have of my virtue, that I think this injury will never be obliterated out of it. Then Cloranisbes seeing Lysonice was extremely incens'd, resolv'd of a sudden to tell her the truth, though he fear'd she would possibly hate him for having hinder'd her from being Princess of Carthage. Nevertheless, he had liv'd so well with her, he was in a dignity so considerable, and she liv'd so well with him that he hop'd it might be advantagious to him to tell her the proceeding he had us'd to attain her. So having made a thousand protestations to her, of a serious affection, he began to tell her, that he had given her a testimony of love which she knew not of, and for which withal, he fear'd she would not thank him. After which he ingenuously confest his whole proceeding to her, as it was done, and so let her know that the love he had for her, had oblig'd him to tell the Prince she was not so handsome as her Picture, and consequently to hinder her from marrying. Cloranisbes told her this with all the art imaginable: but after all, Lysonice knew very well, that had it not been for him, she had been Princess of Carthage; whereupon she could not keep her self from seeming surpris'd and changing colour. Which Cloranisbes observing, Well, Madam (said he to her) had I not reason to be unwilling to tell you the truth? but I beseech you, consider every thing thoroughly which may render me excusable to you. The sole excess of my passion caus'd me to betray the Prince, and the sole excess of my passion has oblig'd me to make the request to you which I have done. For, in fine, if the Prince see you with all your charms, in the condition wherein I know his mind is to day, he will perhaps banish me, and then you will be the Wife of an unfortunate exile, which is certainly the thing you fear most in the World. For my part, I declare to you, if you were of another humor, I should glory in being banisht with you, and be so far from entreating you to hide your beauty, that I should desire you to make it more conspicuous with all that Art can add to Nature, to the end to be rather banish'd and go live in some agreeable Desart, where you would be instead of all things to me, and where I should account my self happy with you alone. But on the contrary, Madam, your inclination leading you to love the world, and being unwilling to restrain it, I conjure to you appear neglectedly this day in the eyes of the Prince, and defer making your self seen with all your charms, till his Love be setled upon some Lady; for when he is amorous, he is prejudic'd against the beauty of all other women. By this means he may see you without knowing that I have betray'd him; and after this, you shall come to Utica, and live there as you please. In the mean time pardon me, my dear Lysonice, the Treason I have committed against you, be contented to reign absolutely in my heart, and consider that if I had not lov'd you, I had not debar'd you of a glory which you deserve. Being you have much wit, my Lord (answer'd she) you turn things as you please. Not but that, what you have done in this occasion (added she) has been the act of a self-interessed, and not at all of a generous Lover; for if you had acted nobly, you should first have told me the truth, and afterwards endeavour'd to perswade me to prefer you before the Prince; but, in fine, let us leave what is past as it is, it being always fruitless to speak of it; but for the present know, I do not cease to believe, after all which you have said, that the request you have made to me is sufficiently injurious.

As Cloranisbes was going to answer, one came to tell him that a great many Hunters appear'd in the Plain; so that believing it was the Prince, being unwilling he should find him at home, he was constrain'd to leave Lysonice in haste, and go forth at a back-door. But before he left her, he said several very passionate things to her, whereto she gave no direct answer. After which getting upon his Horse, he went to fetch a great compass, to come and overtake the Prince, who was not so near as Cloranisbes servants had believ'd; because by thinking to take a shorter way, he lost himself in a Wood. In the mean time Lysonice who is naturally ambitious, could not hinder her self from having a secret anger for the testimony of Love Cloranisbes had render'd her; although she had no design to be reveng'd on him for it in a Criminal way: but she could never resolve to counterfeit her self sick, and appear carelesly dress'd. On the contrary, believing that when the Prince had seen her, she should afterwards go to the Court, she lik'd better that he should see her on a sudden, than defer it longer; and as nothing is more repugnant to a handsome person than to shew her self after a manner disadvantageous to her beauty, Lysonice attir'd her self as well as she was accustom'd, and something better too; though as I said, she had no intention to excite love in the Prince, but only to despite Cloranisbes, and to be afterwards at liberty to live at Court. After she was dress'd, Pasilia and Delisia who had adorn'd themselves too, came to her, and were much surpriz'd to observe that she had some kind of commotion mix'd with anger in her eyes, which denoted to them that she was troubled. So that demanding the cause of her, she told it them with a certain air, which gave them to understand that ambition was always her predominant passion. A little while after, the sound of hunting instruments was heard, which signifi'd the approaching arrival of the Prince. And presently Lysonice beheld a body of persons of Quality, a great number of slaves, and a very magnificent equipage enter into the Court. But this pomp rather afflicted than pleas'd her, out of the thought that Cloranisbes had hinder'd her from being wife to the Prince for whom this magnificence was.

In the mean time Cloranisbes having fetcht a great turn, had overtaken the Prince of Carthage, without his suspecting that he had been at his house; and to act the more cunningly, he made as if he had not known that the Prince intended to go see Lysonice. So that addressing to him, If I had known, my Lord (said he to him) that you intended to hunt on this side, I should have order'd Lysonice to have caus'd a Collation to be prepar'd for you at the end of the Chase; but I conceiv'd it was not fit to dare to propound to you to go to a place where you are not expected. Persons of my condition (said the Prince) are so accustom'd to be expected, that sometimes they delight to go where they are not; and therefore since I am so near your house, I will go see Lysonice. Being she writ to me yesterday that she was a little indispos'd (reply'd Cloranisbes, believing his wife would do as he had desir'd her) I know not whether she will be in a condition to receive the honour which you intend to do her. We shall see that presently (answer'd the Prince) for the hunting does not pleasure me so well to day, as that I have any mind to continue it longer. And so taking the shortest way, the Prince being preceeded or follow'd by all his Attendants, went to Cloranisbes house, which was not inferior to that wherein he first saw Lysonice. But in entring into the second Court, Cloranisbes was much surpris'd to see Lysonice upon the Stone-stairs of the entrance, accompani'd with Pasilia and Delisia, and to see her there in an attire, which though it had little shew of the Country negligence, was nevertheless graceful and magnificent; for he knew thereby that her mind was much exasperated: yet he dissembled his thoughts at that time. But for that Lysonice was handsomer in the open day than in the shadow, the Prince of Carthage and all his followers were so surprised with the rare lustre of her beauty, that they could not contain from testifying their admiration. The Prince of Carthage who was alighted from his horse, assoon as he perceiv'd Lysonice, went towards her with precipitation, and saluted her with a civility which signifi'd to her that he accounted her admirably handsome; for he had almost omitted to salute Pasilia and Delisia, though they were very amiable. I am more oblig'd to Cloranisbes than I thought, Madam (said the Prince to Lysonice) for his constant residence with me; for being so fair a person as I see you are, it would be more acceptable for him to be with you. The pleasure of doing a duty is so great (answer'd she) that 'tis not much to be wonder'd, my Lord, if Cloranisbes prefer you before me. 'Tis a pleasure (reply'd the Prince sufficient roughly) which perhaps he has not always so much lov'd. After this, being enter'd into the Hall, the conversation of the Prince with Lysonice contin'd. The Persons of Quality that accompani'd him discours'd amongst themselves, or with Pasilia and Delisia: and Cloranisbes being in a strange perplexity, spoke sometimes to one and sometimes to another; for his mind was incens'd with Lysonice's proceedings, he fear'd lest the Prince should discover the truth, and he apprehended above all things that Lysonice would love him no more, and that she could not pardon him the deceit his passion had caus'd him to commit. In the mean time the Prince of Carthage finding Lysonice every moment more handsome, could not contain from expressing part of what he thought. For my part (said he to her) I confess I do not understand wherefore Cloranisbes has not told me a thousand times of his happiness, and why he hath not continually discours'd to me of you. 'Tis no doubt (answer'd she coldly) because a husband scarce ever speaks pertinently of his wife. But before he had married you (reply'd the Prince) he spoke to me as little of you; but on the contrary he declin'd speaking of you, and moreover affirm'd to me that a Picture which I had of you, was a flattering Picture. Nevertheless, I see at present that he went far from the truth in speaking so. For my part, my Lord (answer'd Lysonice blushing with indignation) I so little know my self, that I know not whether Cloranisbes had not reason: but I conceive well, he would have done more obligingly for me, by suffering you to believe that I was as handsome as my Picture. I agree with you, Madam (reply'd he) and I think moreover he would have more oblig'd me than you by not opposing my admiration. But to repair the injury that I did your beauty, by believing your Picture handsomer than your self, I will this day begin to admire you anew, and to publish that there is no beauty in the world comparable to yours. Lysonice hereupon so modestly declin'd the praises which the Prince gave her, that she appear'd thereby the more charming. And then she acted with such address, that she drew Pasilia and Delisia into their conversation, which by degrees became altogether general.

After this the Prince with his Company went to walk, and at his return he found a stately Collation, though there was but a very short time to prepare it; and then began the discourse to be about hunting, gaming, and other divertisements. The Prince told Cloranisbes aloud, that it was not just to leave Lysonice so long in the Country, that she was too fit for the world to live in solitude; and that it was requisite to cause her to go speedily to Court. Cloranisbes being unwilling to pass for a jealous husband, answer'd that Lysonice was Mistress of her own actions, and might do what pleas'd her self. I have all my life so little known by experience (reply'd she) what it is to do ones own will, that I know not whether I ought to begin to learn, for fear if I did it once I ſhould deſire to do it all my life. Not that I accuſe Cloranisbes (added ſhe) but all women in general are expos'd to this unhappineſs, and a part of their virtue conſiſts ordinarily in having no other will but theirs to whom the Law of Morality ſubjects them. 'Tis true (ſaid Paſilia) we are born under the neceſſity to obey almoſt always, and never to command. On the contrary (anſwer'd the Prince) all obey beauty, and it belongs only to Ladies to command, Men requeſt all their lives, and never command. In truth, my Lord (reply'd Deliſia) I know not whether they requeſt or command, but I know well they ordinarily do what they pleaſe. In effect (added Lyſonice) aſſoon as young perſons ceaſe to learn to read, they begin to have ſo good opinion of themſelves, as to think they are more able than their Maſters, more deſerving than their Fathers, and more wiſe than the Law: and as for their Miſtreſſes, I aſſure you, they know not very well how to obey them, they love them for their own ſakes only, they ſeek their own intereſt, without caring for the perſons whom they love; and in fine they always do whatever is agreeable to their own humor, without conſidering the will of another. While Lyſonice was ſpeaking thus, Cloranisbes was gone to ſhew a Kinſman of the Prince a very handſome Horſe which he had a deſire to, ſo that Lyſonice ſpoke with liberty of the ſubjection of women. Not that I ſpeak out of diſcontent (continu'd ſhe) becauſe I deſire many things which I do not; but only becauſe there is indeed ſome kind of injuſtice in being eternally ſervile. I account this Law as hard as you do (anſwer'd Paſilia) but I confeſs to the ſhame of my Sex, women many times uſe liberty ſo ill when it is allow'd them intirely, that the folly of ſome excuſes in ſome ſort the ſervitude of all the reſt. For I know a woman in Maſſilia who has done a hundred extravagancies in her life, which ſhe would not have committed if ſhe had not had a too indulgent Husband. Ha! Paſilia (reply'd Deliſia) there was never any that could be call'd ſo. For my part (ſaid the Prince ſmiling) I believe a handſome woman can never have one too indulgent. And for my part (ſaid Paſilia) I conceive a Goſſip and a young imprudent woman can never have one too ſevere. Yet 'tis a ſtrange thing (ſaid the Prince) for a husband to guard his wife. 'Tis a ſtranger (anſwer'd Paſilia) to ſee a man voluntarily ſhut his eyes that he may not ſee how many gallants his wife has that follow her, write to her, ſhew her Letters, boaſt of her favours, and laugh both at her and him. But what ſhould an honeſt man do (reply'd Deliſia) when he is ſo unhappy as to have a wife who has no true virtue nor government of her ſelf? for I do not account thoſe wives virtuous, who becauſe they are not abſolutely criminal, make no ſcruple of beginning ſeveral Gallantries which expoſe them to ſlander, and cauſe them to commit a thouſand follies which render them deſpis'd even by them for whoſe ſakes they do them. You have reaſon (anſwer'd Lyſonice) not to put the leſs criminal Goſſips in the rank of women indued with virtue; for certainly if they be not the moſt culpable of all, they are always the moſt fooliſh. I am of your mind (reply'd Deliſia) but however what muſt a poor husband do, who is ſo unhappy as to have a wife of this humor? If my judgment may paſs (anſwer'd the Prince) he ſhall take his pleaſure on his own ſide as well as he can, and ſee nothing but what he is willing to ſee. And if my judgment may paſs (reply'd Paſilia) a husband that has ſuch a kind of wife, muſt flatter her for ſome time, he muſt endeavour to win her by ſweetneſs, reaſon, and addreſs, to procure her virtuous Friends of her own Sex, to ſee that ſhe have not a ſlave to wait upon her that is not virtuous, to cauſe her to love innocent pleaſures; and laſtly, to cauſe her at leaſt in ſome ſort to fear him, if ſhe cannot love him. If all this prove ineffectual, I allow him to act like a Maſter, to regulate the viſits which ſhe gives and receives, and ſend her too into the Country. For, in fine, I will not have a husband peaceably endure his wife to be a Goſſip. But is there any thing which ſeems more ſtrange (ſaid the Prince) than a jealous husband? people laugh at him and flout him, and ſay that by being jealous, he almoſt deſerves to have his wife a Goſſip. A jealous Sot (anſwer'd Paſilia) is certainly a ſottiſh thing; but a gallant prudent man ought not to be lookt upon as one that is jealous. On the contrary he is to be pitied and eſteem'd: but as for one that is of a jealous nature, who perſecutes an innocent wife without cauſe or colour, I conſent that he be derided for it, and that whatever may augment his jealouſie be wiſh'd to befal him. Were you deſirous to be married ſpeedily at Utica (reply'd Lyſonice ſmiling) you could not ſpeak better than you do, to give a good opinion of your ſelf.

After this, becauſe it was ſufficiently late, the Prince retir'd, but ſo ſurpris'd and ſo charm'd with Lyſonice, that he could not refrain from expreſſing how amiable he judg'd her. At parting, he askt her, whether ſhe would not come ſhortly to Utica, and omitted to tell her nothing which he thought requiſite to teſtifie to her that ſhe pleas'd him infinitely. Cloranisbes having been call'd by the Prince, could not ſpeak to Lyſonice; beſides, loving her ſo much as he did, and the deceit his love had made him guilty of being diſcover'd to her, he knew not very well what to ſay to her; for how diſſatisfied ſoever he was, he was loth to make any ſharp complaint, and ſo he left her without ſpeaking to her.

The Prince of Carthage was ſo penſive all the way as he return'd, that he ſcarce ſpoke twenty words till he arriv'd at Utica. But when he was there, and beheld Cloranisbes alone with him, he lookt ſtedfaſtly upon him, and ſpeaking to him, Confeſs the truth, Cloranisbes (ſaid he to him) when I ſhew'd you Lyſonice's Picture one day, you told me it was handſomer than ſhe, only becauſe you accounted her the handſomeſt perſon in the world? I acknowledge it ingenuouſly, my Lord (anſwer'd he) but if I would I could maintain to you, that I accounted Lyſonice leſs handſome than her Picture; for none could convince me of an untruth; ſince we ſee every day, that which pleaſes one, diſpleaſes another, and opinions are different upon all ſorts of things. Ha! Cloranisbes (reply'd the Prince) that may be in mean beauties, but Lyſonice is not of this rank, and no perſon in the world can pretend to have ſeen any thing, or conceive that a Painter could make a Picture ſo handſome as ſhe: and this was the reaſon (added he) that you would have her be yours and not mine. It was not, my Lord (anſwer'd Cloranisbes) becauſe Lyſonice was fair, that I fail'd in my duty, but only becauſe I deſperately lov'd her. I underſtand it ſo (reply'd the Prince) but if it be true that you betray'd me becauſe you lov'd her, it is alſo true that you lov'd her becauſe ſhe was handſome. However it be, my Lord (anſwer'd Cloranisbes) I did not fail in my duty without reluctancy, and I account my ſelf ſo unhappy in having been Criminal againſt you, that the thought of it diſturbs part of my felicity. Being what is paſs'd cannot be recall'd (ſaid the Prince) let us ſpeak no more of it. But for that it is not juſt for Lyſonice to ſuffer for your ſake, cauſe her to come to Court, and do not keep her longer in a ſolitude, which no queſtion is tedious to her. Cloranisbes then ſpoke all he thought conducive to excuſe himſelf with the Prince, who accordingly made ſemblance of being ſatisfied with him. So that Cloranisbes was now almoſt glad that the buſineſs was over thus; to the end he might be no longer oblig'd to cauſe Lyſonice to ſtay in the Countrey. Yet he was much diſcontented that ſhe had refus'd to be careleſly dreſs'd that day; however believing ſhe had done ſo out of deſpight which had ſomething of noble in it, he ſought to appeaſe himſelf. But ſo did not Lyſonice; for having ſeen the Prince, all that great equipage of hunting, and all his Court, ambition reviv'd in her heart; and ſhe was ſo far from conſidering what Cloranisbes had done as a teſtimony of his love, that ſhe judg'd it as a weakneſs of his paſſion, and an injurious fact. Yet Paſilia and Deliſia did all they could to temper her mind; but all they could obtain was, that ſhe would conſtrain her ſelf as much as ſhe could from teſtifying further reſentment to Cloranisbes. For, in fine, (ſaid Paſilia to her) that which is paſs'd cannot be recall'd; and moreover after all, you are wife of a very worthy man, who loves you dearly, and who being belov'd by the Prince, holds one of the firſt ranks in the Court. I confeſs (anſwer'd Lyſonice) but if I am not deceiv'd, he will not hold it long; and if the art of conjectures be not abſolutely falſe, I am expos'd to many infelicities. Yet I am reſolv'd (added ſhe) to ſupport them with the greateſt conſtancy I can, and to do nothing which may cauſe me to deſerve the misfortunes which I foreſee will befall me. Theſe were the ſentiments of Lyſonice.

Cloranisbes who always lov'd her with the higheſt ardor, and who would not be accounted jealous neither by her, nor the Prince, nor the Court, writ to her the next day to tell her that he deſir'd her to come to Utica, without taking any notice of that which ſhe had deny'd him. This motion ſufficiently pleas'd Lyſonice, who reſolv'd without ſcruple to obey Cloranisbes. So ſhe joyfully left her Deſart, and went to Utica accompanied with her two amiable Kinſwomen. Aſſoon as ſhe arriv'd there, ſhe was viſited by the Prince, all the men of Quality, and all the Ladies; and her beauty was ſo cry'd up in the Court, that ſcarce any thing elſe was ſpoken of. The moſt eminent Beauties willingly yielded to her, and confeſs'd that nothing could equal the charms of Lyſonice. This fair perſon much affecting the world, ſhe was at firſt ſo glad of being there, that ſhe forgot part of her diſcontent. Not but that as often as ſhe ſaw the Prince, or beheld only his Palace or Windows, ſome diſpleaſing thoughts aroſe in her mind.

But now the preſence of Lyſonice, and the deſire to pleaſe her, occaſion'd the making of ſeveral appointments for divertiſement in the Court. Cloranisbes had made indeed ſome obliging reproaches to Lyſonice for having refus'd to do as he had deſir'd her: but being he ſtill lov'd her ardently, this little anger was eaſily appeas'd. But if Cloranisbes was in quier, the Prince of Carthage was not; for though he had a great dearneſs for Cloranisbes, yet after he had ſeen Lyſonice, it came of a ſudden to decreaſe, and ſhortly to be wholly extinct. But which was moſt cruel, at the rate of friendſhip diminiſh'd in his heart towards Cloranisbes, love augmented for Lyſonice, and he became ſo amorous of her, that he had not a moment of reſt. He would have oppos'd his paſſion with a ſentiment of generoſity in the beginning, and of friendſhip too for Cloranisbes; and to fortifie himſelf to that purpoſe, he diſcover'd his ſecret to him that is come hither to find me, whoſe name is Anherbal, and told him that he was the moſt unhappy of all men. For, in fine, (ſaid he to him) I love a perſon, who I know well would have lov'd me out of ambition, if Cloranisbes had not betray'd me, and who perhaps now out of honour will never love me. But, my Lord (anſwer'd he to whom he entruſted the ſecret of his heart) would you have been ſatisfied with it, if Lyſonice had lov'd you only out of an ambitious ſentiment? Believe me (reply'd the Prince) it matters not much to a Lover out of what ſentiments he is lov'd, provided he be ſo; nor ought he much to care whether it be for his good perſonage, for his wit, or for his quality. For my part, my Lord (anſwer'd my Friend) I ſhould be more ſcrupulous than you; for if I were not lov'd for my own ſake, I would not be lov'd at all. That which you ſay (reply'd the Prince) is plauſibly ſaid by one that loves nothing; but when a man is amorous, he turns to another language; and rather than never be lov'd, I would be ſo for a thouſand extrinſecal conſiderations, in which my merit has no part. As for me, my Lord (ſaid Anherbal) I am of opinion the more a man loves, the harder he is to be contented; and ſo, I confeſs ingenuouſly to you, that if I lov'd, I would be lov'd again for my own ſelf; and I ſhould make no eſteem of thoſe favours which I did not owe to a great affection. If it were in my power to chuſe (anſwer'd the Prince) I would wiſh that which you ſpeak; but it being otherwiſe, I content my ſelf with what I can; and there is nothing which I am not capable of ſuffering, rather than to be never favour'd. For the aim of love is the poſſeſſion of the perſon whom we love, and therefore this only ought to be ſought after, and all means whereby it is attainable are good, be it by wit, by merit, or dignity of condition. But, my Lord (reply'd Anherbal) do you not think that Lyſonice undoubtedly loves her Husband, and that Cloranisbes is ſo zealous for your ſervice, that he deſerves you ſhould not deſtroy his felicity? I know all that you ſay (anſwer'd the Prince) but I know alſo that Cloranisbes has betray'd me; and if I ſhall have no regard to his intereſts, I ſhould do againſt him but what he has done againſt me: and whereas you ſay, Lyſonice undoubtedly loves her husband, I have to anſwer you that an ambitious Wife may be more eaſily unfaithful than another; but becauſe I do not pretend to engage her in a criminal love, I will only oblige Cloranisbes, as the Law permits, to reſign her to me, that I may marry her, and he may marry another. How? my Lord (ſaid Anherbal) do you care for having divided favours? if ſo, permit me to tell you with all the reſpect I owe you, that you know not how to love well. For according to the humour I am of, I ſhould like better never to obtain any thing of a perſon I lov'd, provided my Rivals were as unhappy as my ſelf, than to obtain the higheſt favours on condition they were alſo granted to another. Ha! Anherbal (ſaid the Prince) this that you ſpeak is too heroical for me, and I am ſtrongly perſwaded it would be abſolutely impoſſible but a man truly amorous, if he were put to his choice, to be favour'd with another Rival, or never to be ſo at all on condition no other ſhould be more, would chuſe rather to be favour'd in that manner than never to be at all. I know well there ſeems ſomething unreaſonable in that which I ſay (continued the Prince) but however I ſhall never conceive as long as I live, that a man can be unwilling to obtain the favours of a perſon whom he loves. I confeſs it my Lord (anſwer'd Anherbal) but yet aſſoon as I believ'd a woman capable of dividing her favours, I ſhould love her no longer at all. Therefore my ſentiments are not to be wonder'd at, being more truly amorous than yours. Be it how it will (ſaid the Prince) I love Lyſonice; and if ſhe be willing to love me, and Cloranisbes to reſign her to me, I will marry her with joy; and I declare to you, there is nothing which I will not attempt to cauſe my deſign to ſucceed.

Anherbal ſpoke many things further to avert the Prince from this reſolution, but they were to no effect. But that he might have more frequent occaſion of ſeeing Lyſonice, he recall'd the Princeſs of Carthage to Court, who was raviſh'd to obſerve the Prince's paſſion, becauſe ſhe hop'd to make uſe of it to be reveng'd on Cloranisbes whom ſhe did not affect. To which purpoſe ſhe made a thouſand careſſes to Lyſonice, and ſent to invite her to her continually. Cloranisbes ſoon perceiv'd the paſſion of the Prince and the deſign of the Princeſs; ſo that he was extremely afflicted at it, and could not keep himſelf from appearing ſad, what reſolution ſoever he had to diſſemble his diſcontent. Whereupon Lyſonice believing he was jealous, was much offended in her mind at it, becauſe ſhe could not endure to be ſuſpected.

In the mean time the Prince's paſſion augmenting every day, he reſolv'd to diſcover it to Lyſonice, and ſo afterwards to ſpeak to Cloranisbes of it, in caſe he found any favourable diſpoſition in the mind of this fair perſon. Being it is always eaſie for a Soveraign to find occaſion of ſpeaking in private, he ſoon had one to open his paſſion to Lyſonice; though indeed it fell out naturally enough, after a converſation which I am going to relate to you.

The Prince found Lyſonice at the lodgings of the Princeſs of Carthage, where there were alſo Paſilia, Deliſia and divers other Ladies: Anherbal was there too, and ſeveral men of quality. Cloranisbes who attended on the Prince, ſeeing Lyſonice arrive, would have gone away, that he might not ſee ſuch things in the eyes of his Maſter as would extremely diſpleaſe him, though he was not jealous. But the Princeſs of Carthage maliciouſly detain'd him, upon a pretext of having ſomething to ſpeak with him about; for ſhe liv'd very civilly with him, though ſhe hated him. At firſt the diſcourſe was about an inſurrection which was at that time at Carthage; but inſenſibly paſſing from Policy to Love, it came to be queſtion'd, Who is the moſt unhappy, a Lover that receives a thouſand favours from his Miſtreſs, and is jealous of her, or one that obtains none other, and has no jealouſie at all. For my part (ſaid the Prince) I put no compariſon between theſe; for I account it the greateſt of all unhappineſſes not to be lov'd at all, and to obtain no favour from the perſon who is lov'd. Though I am not jealous (anſwer'd Cloranisbes) nevertheleſs, my Lord, I am of an opinion contrary to yours, and ſtrongly perſwaded that a jealous Lover will be a thouſand times more miſerable, though he obtain a thouſand favours, than he who obtains nothing, if he be free from jealouſie. What? (reply'd the Prince) do you conceive a greater miſelicity in love than not to be lov'd at all, and to deſire a thouſand things which you dare not hope? Ha! my Lord (anſwer'd Cloranisbes) there is nothing ſo bold as hope, and nothing ſo impoſſible which a man who loves ardently cannot hope. So that in his greateſt torments he makes a comfort to himſelf which does not forſake him; the future ſeems more agreeable to him than the preſent; and hope never abandoning him, he is never altogether miſerable. But on the contrary, a favour'd Lover, who is jealous, has nothing but fear for an inſeparable companion. Every thing cauſes him to fear, every thing diſquiets and afflicts him; and the very favours which he receives, becoming ſuſpected to him, he imagines then when he is favour'd he is deluded, and that he is not treated well but only to be betray'd. All which you ſay, is very cruel (reply'd the Prince) but do you count it nothing to be continually in fear of being never favour'd at all? 'Tis a very ſevere ſentiment (anſwer'd Cloranisbes) but nothing near that which cauſes a perpetual fear of loſing that which we enjoy and think we have purchas'd with a thouſand ſervices, and can never loſe without injuſtice. Inaſmuch as the fancy always magnifies all ſorts of pleaſures (reply'd the Prince) I conceive that a man not hoping to obtain the ſweetneſſes which he imagines infinite, is more miſerable, than he who fears to loſe a good which he knows what it is. Ha! my Lord (cry'd Cloranisbes) aſſoon as the advantageous pre-conceiv'd opinion ceaſes in love, love it ſelf ceaſes, and jealouſie would ceaſe alſo if it could. But whereas on the contrary, that prepoſſeſſion of the imagination increaſes at the ſame meaſure that jealouſie does, a man by continuing jealous, comes at length not only to believe that the good which he enjoys is the greateſt of all goods, but withal to perſwade himſelf that all the people in the world believe it ſuch, deſire it, ſeek after it, and are ready to raviſh it from him. Judge therefore, my Lord, if there be any compariſon between an unhappy Lover free from jealouſie, and a favour'd Lover who is jealous. No (anſwer'd the Prince) there is none; for an unhappy Lover without jealouſie, is ſo much the more jealous, in that he can never cauſe his unhappineſs to ceaſe; becauſe it does not depend on himſelf. Whereas a jealous Lover, and who is jealous without cauſe, needs only to make a great reſolution, and to make uſe of his reaſon to cure his evil. Ha! my Lord (cry'd Cloranisbes again) you ill underſtand jealouſie, if you believe a jealous man able to cure himſelf of the evil which perſecutes him. On the contrary he increaſes it every inſtant, by falſe conjectures, ill-deduc'd conſequences, a thouſand groundleſs ſuſpicions, continual fears, cruſtleſs reflexions, and imaginations void of all probability. A jealous man accounts nothing impoſſible, he believes he ſees what he does not ſee, he believes he hears what he does not hear; there is not one of his ſenſes but is liable to betray him, and his very reaſon, being perverted by his fancy, and no longer underſtanding the art to diſtinguiſh truth from falſhood, ſerves further to delude him, and render him more miſerable. You ſpeak ſo well of jealouſie (ſaid the Princeſs of Carthage maliciouſly) that certainly you muſt needs have been very very jealous: I ſay, have been (added ſhe) for the vertue of Lyſonice is too great to permit you to be ſo ſtill; and ſhe is too fair to ſuſpect you of having any other affection. Lyſonice bluſht at this diſcourſe, and to hide her colour turn'd away her head, and fell to ſpeak to Anherbal. As for Cloranisbes, he ſaid gallantly enough, that the queſtion was not about a jealous Husband, but a jealous Lover, and that in what manner ſoever the caſe were conſidered, he was wholly unconcern'd in the conteſtation. After this, there came ſome Ladies, who caus'd the converſation to change, and propounded to the Princeſs of Carthage to go take the air upon the Sea-ſhore, in a place where it is as ſtreight as a and where it is as even as the courſe of the Olympick-Games. So that this motion being agreed to, all the Ladies went in Chariots, and men on horſe-back, excepting Cloranisbes, who went not along with the company. When they were arriv'd at the Sea-ſhore, all the Court walkt a foot in the handſomeſt place of the World; for when 'tis calm, the Sea as gently drives its billows upon the ſhore, as if it were no deeper than a ſmall River. The ſand of it is of a fair Colour, the ſhells which are ſeen on that ſide are very agreeable, and the herbs which the waves caſt upon the banks delight the eyes with their lively and various colours. Beſides, this vaſt extent of Sea which ſeems to unite with the Heaven, has a kind of grand aſpect which pleaſes, and inſpires reſpect. On the other ſide ſtands Utica which makes a handſome ſhew, and ſeveral other Villages, and many Cottages of Fiſhermen who by their ruſticity adorn this maritime proſpect. In one place people are ſeen drying their Nets, and others mending them; in another, women making Baskets of Bulruſhes which ſerve for fiſhing; otherwhere Fiſher-boats ſcatter'd upon the Sea, and men ſitting upon the Rocks, who holding lines in their hands, are as attentive and immovable as the Rocks upon which they ſit. But however, obſerve what a place it was in which all this fair Court went to divert themſelves. The Sun was then ſetting, and his laſt rays guilding all the ſurface of the Sea, and painting all the Clouds almoſt with the very colours of the morning, preſented ſo fair a ſight to the eyes of Lyſonice, that leaving all the reſt of the company to go forward, ſhe ſate down by the Sea ſide upon a Rock cover'd with verdant moſs, and fell to conſider with pleaſure theſe ſeveral effects of the declining Sun. But ſhe had ſcarce began to muſe, when the Prince leaving Anherbal to whom he was ſpeaking, went to her, and reſpectfully interrupted her. I beſeech you Madam (ſaid he to her) tell me whether you decide the queſtion in your mind, of which Cloranisbes and I lately diſputed. In truth, my Lord (ſaid ſhe to him and riſe up) I was not thinking of it, but I was only conſidering at this inſtant whether the Sea were not more graceful than the Sky. That's but an inconſiderable queſtion to entertain the mind of a fair perſon (anſwer'd he) who has a thouſand other things to think of: however, being this ſight pleaſes you, ſtay where you are, and only ſuffer me to be with you. And ſo Lyſonice placing her ſelf again upon the Rock where ſhe ſate, the Prince ſeated himſelf upon another which was right againſt her, and began to diſcourſe to her. I wiſh, Madam (ſaid he to her) whilſt your eyes are diverted with ſeeing all thoſe tremulous lights which the waves beating upon one another ſhew you, you would really tell me, what ſentiment you were of a while ſince during our diſpute, and whether you would not more pity a Lover that were not jealous and had the unhappineſs not to be lov'd, than one that were favour'd and extremely jealous. I am ſo perſwaded (anſwer'd Lyſonice) that ſuch as are cauſleſly jealous deſerve all the torments which they ſuffer, that I need not deliberate to determine my ſelf in favour of an unhappy Lover, who is not jealous, and to grant him my compaſſion rather than to a favour'd and jealous lover, who almoſt ever becomes the moſt inacceptable Lover in the world, aſſoon as he is poſſeſs'd with a vehement jealouſie. I am oblig'd to you, Madam (ſaid the Prince to her) and I owe you many thanks. In truth, my Lord (anſwer'd ſhe) you have no great obligation to me, ſince I only ſpeak my opinion ſo as it is. I have more than you believe (reply'd he) and to leave you no ground to doubt of it, know, I am one of thoſe unhappy Lovers, who love with favours and without jealouſie, but who love ſo deſperately, that never was any lover ſo miſerable as I. When I engag'd my ſelf to have compaſſion (ſaid ſhe) I did not imagine, my Lord, that you were concern'd in the caſe. That knowledge, Madam (anſwer'd the Prince) ought not to cauſe you to change that mind; on the contrary, I am perſwaded there is not one of my Subjects for whom you ought to have ſo much compaſſion as for me. Methinks (reply'd ſhe ſmiling) it would be a want of reſpect for any to dare to ſay they have pity on their Soveraign; and therefore, my Lord, you ſhall permit to ſeek out ſome other expreſſion which may agree to you better. That you may find a more exact one (anſwer'd he) ſuffer me to tell you the greatneſs of my evil, for you cannot be ignorant of what nature it is, and no doubt you know, that after having lov'd your Picture which was leſs handſome than your ſelf, I love you ſo ardently, that I have almoſt ceas'd to love Cloranisbes who has debarr'd me of that which belong'd to me, and hinder'd you from being Princeſs of Carthage.

Lyſonice no doubt, was much amaz'd at this diſcourſe of the Prince, though ſhe knew he was amorous of her. But her ambition made it a little leſs ungrateful to her; Cloranisbes diſcontent incens'd her mind, and ſhe was infinitely troubled with the thought of his being jealous. But after all, the ſame temper which inclin'd her to ambition, caus'd her to love honour, and hinder'd her from being able to conſent to a criminal love. Nevertheleſs, being ſhe believ'd Cloranisbes guilty of diſloyal proceeding both towards the Prince and her ſelf, and alike deficient in generoſity to them both, ſhe did not reject the Prince with ſo much ſeverity as ſhe would have done in another caſe. I grant, my Lord (ſaid ſhe to him) I am oblig'd to you for the love you had for my Picture, and I ought as long as I live to acknowledge the advantageous intention you had for my fortune at that time; but the caſe is not the ſame in reference to the love you ſay you have for me at preſent, which cannot be but injurious to me. Therefore, my Lord, do not deſtroy that firſt obligation by an injury; for as ambitious as I am, that paſſion is incapable of exciting me to commit an unworthineſs. I beſeech you, Madam (ſaid the Prince to her) do not ſuſpect me of offering to do an injury to a perſon whom I adore; I will but only love you, and I promiſe you too, to do all I can, that I may deſire nothing elſe; but if I cannot give bounds to my paſſion, my deſires and my hopes, I will do all I can to obtain your permiſſion to demand you of Cloranisbes; for if you and he be ſo willing, the Laws will permit me to marry you. There are examples of this kind, and you may ceaſe to be wife of Cloranisbes, and ſtill become Princeſs of Carthage. I know not, my Lord, whether the Laws allow what you ſpeak of (anſwer'd ſhe and riſe up) but I know well, honour does not allow me to hear you further. Alas! I beſeech you, Madam (cry'd the prince, offering to detain her) do not make me deſperate; for if you do, I ſhall hate Cloranisbes, I ſhall revenge my ſelf of him, and be carried to the ſevereſt extremities. Conſider that he minded his own contentment and not your advantage, but I require nothing of you which is not glorious unto you. No, no, my Lord (anſwer'd ſhe and began to go towards the Princeſs of Carthage, who was coming to them) all the ambition of my heart ſhall never cauſe me to do any thing againſt my duty; and therefore I conjure you not to perſiſt obſtinately in a deſign which will never ſucceed to you. The Prince could not anſwer her, becauſe Lyſonice having joyn'd with the Princeſs of Carthage, did not leave her all the reſt of the evening.

But Lyſonice ſeem'd ſo diſcontented and ſo penſive to Paſilia and Deliſia, when ſhe was return'd home, that they did not leave her in quiet till ſhe told them the cauſe of her melancholy. Whereupon, having related to them the diſcourſe ſhe had had with the Prince; Well, too inquiſitive Friends (ſaid ſhe to them) do not you think I have reaſon to be melancholy? Is not my Deſtiny ſtrangely ſevere, to expoſe me to unhappineſſes made purpoſely for me, and which come under the apparences of good Fortune? When Cloranisbes married me, I was ſo weary of being in Exile, that I believ'd I was going to be happy. Nevertheleſs, I paſs'd from Exile to ſolitude, and I found I had only chang'd my diſcontent. After that, I came to Court, but there I have liv'd with a continual melancholy to ſee that Cloranisbes whom I thought had lov'd me well, has lov'd only himſelf, and hinder'd me from being Princeſs of Carthage. However, being he is a perſon of merit, perhaps I ſhould at length have reſolv'd to cure my ſelf of my ambition and pardon him, if I had not obſerv'd in his heart, that if he is not jealous he may be: and for my utmoſt unhappineſs, the Prince is become amorous of me, and propounds to me to ſeparate from Cloranisbes and marry me. Judge then in what a condition I am; for although I am ambitious (added ſhe) yet certainly I have affection for Cloranisbes; and ſhould my anger have diminiſht it, I confeſs to you, I could not reſolve to marry the Prince of Carthage. Such as marry again after the death of their husbands, I can by no means fancy; judge then whether I am capable of reſolving to forſake Cloranisbes to marry another. But ſince 'tis ſo (anſwer'd Paſilia) I ſee no need you have to be greatly perplex'd. I am of your mind (added Deliſia.) But for my part (excepted Lyſonice) I am not at all. For do not you conſider that if I be rigorous to the Prince, he will baniſh Cloranisbes; and if I keep fair terms with him, I ſhall increaſe his paſſion, and excite jealouſie in Cloranisbes, who perhaps will ſend me back into the Countrey? Cloranisbes is ſo good a man (anſwer'd Paſilia) that you may always do what pleaſes you. Cloranisbes loves himſelf ſo highly (reply'd ſhe) that 'tis for his own ſake only that he loves me with ſuch ardency, and ſo he will conſider nothing but his own felicity. But what would you have him do? (ſaid Paſilia.) I would (anſwer'd ſhe) that if the Prince propoſes to him to marry me, he love me ſo well, as to come and tell me that he will conſider nothing but my ſatisfaction, and if I deſire it, conſent to our ſeparation, that ſo I may be Princeſs of Carthage. Ha! Lyſonice (reply'd Deliſia) if Cloranisbes could part with you to the Prince, he would love you too little. But ſince you ſay (added Paſilia) you would not be the wife of two husbands, what matters it to you whether Cloranisbes conſent or no to a thing which you do not deſire? It is ſo great a matter to me (anſwer'd ſhe) that I find I ſhall be much diſſatisfied with him, if he be not ſo generous as to do what ſhall pleaſe me without exception. It 'muſt be confeſs'd (ſaid Paſilia) the ſentiments of people are very different; for if I had a Lover or a Husband who were capable of parting with me to the greateſt King in the world, I ſhould hate him. I am not of your opinion (anſwer'd Lyſonice haſtily) for if Cloranisbes conſider only himſelf, I ſhall repine at him in my heart; and though I am reſolv'd to continue his wife till death, yet I ſhall be ſo without any contentment; for I cannot endure thoſe people who love only with reſpect to themſelves, who conſider nothing but their own pleaſure, and mind nothing elſe. Such were the ſentiments of Lyſonice.

In the mean time the Prince's love augmenting from day to day, and the Princeſs of Carthage (who ſought only to remove Cloranisbes from the Court) ſubtilly promoting it, ſhe brought the matter to the utmoſt extremities, and took upon her to ſpeak to Cloranisbes in behalf of the Prince, to perſwade him to reſign Lyſonice to him. The diſcourſe ſhe made uſe of was ſubtle and crafty; ſhe made ſemblance of pitying his unhappineſs; ſhe accus'd the Prince of injuſtice: but at laſt ſhe gave him to underſtand that it was neceſſary for him to part with Lyſonice. Cloranisbes appear'd ſufficiently ſurpris'd at this diſcourſe; for though he well perceiv'd the Princes love, yet he did not believe the matter would have gone ſo far. His greateſt diſcontent was, for that he imagin'd Lyſonice could not but have given way to the Prince to make this propoſal to him. However, he knew the buſineſs could not be effected without him; becauſe the Law requires that both the Husband and Wife equally conſent to their Divorce. But this did not hinder but that his mind was extremely perplex'd. I know, Madam (ſaid he at length to the Princeſs of Carthage) that I owe all things to the Prince, yet this does not hinder but that there are many things which I may deny him without injuſtice; for, in fine, every thing which is impoſſible, is no part of my duty. I confeſs it (anſwer'd the Princeſs) but you can part with Lyſonice, and conſequently you ought, ſince the Prince cannot live without her, and you owe all things to him. I wiſh I had never lov'd Lyſonice (reply'd he) and the Prince had married her. But, Madam, ſeeing the Gods have permitted that I am her husband, I ſhall be ſo till death. If the Prince will take away my life, I conſent to it; he needs only chuſe ſuch a puniſhment as he pleaſes, I ſhall ſuffer it; but as for Lyſonice, I will never ſurrender her, no, though ſhe her ſelf ſhould conſent to the Prince's deſign. Have a care what you do, Cloranisbes (ſaid ſhe to him.) I do all which I ought, Madam (anſwer'd he) inaſmuch as I do all which I can. After this, this ſubtle Princeſs feigning to pity him, craftily confirm'd him in the reſolution which he took, that ſo he might exaſperate the Prince againſt himſelf. Which being done, he went to his own houſe, where the Prince had newly been, on purpoſe to tell Lyſonice what what he had caus'd to be propos'd to Cloranisbes. 'Tis certain she very ill receiv'd him in spight of all her own ambition, and told him peremptorily, she would never be his Wife, though she much regretted that she was not. Assoon as Cloranisbes enter'd, he understood Lysonice knew of the proposition which was made to him; and assoon as Lysonice saw Cloranisbes, she perceiv'd he had been spoken to about the Prince's design. So that being both sufficiently perplex'd, they remain'd some time without speaking; but at length Cloranisbes breaking the sad silence, Well, Madam (said he to her) will you be so generous as not to be offended if I desire that you continue in the enjoyment of the unhappy Cloranisbes all your life, and if I cannot consent that you be Princess of Carthage? You are so accustom'd not to love me but for your own sake (answer'd she) that 'tis easie for me to conjecture what answer you would have me give you. 'Tis as easie too (reply'd he) for me to guess what you would have me say to you; but I confess it, ambitious Lysonice, my love for you is still as great as your ambition; and therefore do not think it strange if I cannot resolve to part with you to the Prince. I know I destroy both my own fortune and yours, but I know I cannot resolve to lose you. 'Tis true (added he) perhaps I endanger displeasing you by not resigning you, and losing your heart by desiring to retain your person; but though you should hate me, I cannot cease to love you, nor consent that the Prince be happy with my loss, and enrich himself with my own treasure. But alas! whence is it that your love is not equal to mine? if it were, you would suffer banishment, and the subversion of your fortune would not trouble you: but to speak sincerely, you lov'd the Favorite of the Prince of Carthage when you lov'd me, without confiding in the person of Cloranisbes, and so 'tis no wonder if you love the Prince better than the Favorite. I hear all which you say (answer'd Lysonice coldly) as so many new signs of a self-interested love; however, to assure you that I will not marry the Prince, know, I have this day depriv'd him of all manner of hope. Ha! how happy am I (interrupted Cloranisbes) if you speak truth! Do not be so forward to thank me (answer'd she) for I do it more out of honour than affection; for, in fine, I confess to you, Cloranisbes, I am not satisfied with yours. You have been diffident of me, and could not resolve to tell me, that I might recover the fortune which you caus'd me to lose by your fraud. However, content your self, that I refuse an advantage which would certainly have affected my heart, and do not pretend I have any obligation to you for a deed which is likely to render both of us unhappy. The worst is, the mischief has no remedy, and our strange destiny will have us prove infallibly miserable. For being you love me only for your own sake, when time shall have a little chang'd me, you will likewise be chang'd towards me; and so I shall see my self without your affection, and you, perhaps, with repentance for having lov'd me. But be it how it will, I must resolve to seek my consolation in my self. If you lov'd me as well as I love you, and shall love you as long as I live (reply'd Cloranisbes) you would speak after another manner; but I am not so happy; and 'tis left only to my choice to be more or less miserable. You would certainly have been more happy (answer'd Lysonice) if you had less studied to be so.

As Cloranisbes was going to answer, one of his Friends came to inquire for him, to give him notice that the Prince of Carthage was extremely incens'd against him, and that his love of Lysonice was so violent; that it was capable to carry him to any kind of injustice. If he take away my life (answer'd he without being mov'd) he will oblige me; but to pretend to deprive me of Lysonice, is that which I will never endure. But you must know the Princess of Carthage (who design'd only to ruine Cloranisbes, and would not that her Brother should marry Lysonice) caus'd it to be told this fair person that the Prince intended to take her away by force; not doubting but this would oblige her to withdraw her self from Utica. For though she well understood she was ambitious, yet she knew too that she tender'd honour above all things. And accordingly Lysonice no sooner receiv'd this information, but shutting her self into her Closet with Pasilia and Delisia, she told them she absolutely resolv'd to go and return to her Father and Mother, in that fortified place which they held, without imparting her purpose to any person, not even to Cloranisbes himself; And then telling them what intelligence had been given her, I shall be so secret (said she to them) in my flight, because if the Prince should violently seise upon me, all the World would believe I was the cause of it my self, and nothing but death could manifest my innocence. 'Tis the best course therefore not to venture the having need of so violent a remedy. Not, that flight and solitude are of more value to me, but I shall at least have the advantage of making it apparent that I know how to over-rule my inclinations when I please. Pasilia and Delisia would have perswaded her to tell Cloranisbes of her purpose; but she was inflexible: No, no, (said she to them) 'tis best that he be able to say with truth that he knew not of my departure; that so the Prince may not accuse him of it. Wherefore without further delay, she pretended the next morning she would go spend the day at the house of a Lady which was her friend, standing without the City: but instead of doing so, she took a by-way which led towards the place where she chose her retreat. At night a slave came to tell Cloranisbes that she would lye at her Friend's house: but Cloranisbes said nothing to it, though it was not her custom; and the Prince being indispos'd that day, did not go to seek her. The next morning indeed he sent a complement to her to know her health; and when it was told him, she lay out of the City, he took a resolution to go visit her in the afternoon. But he was much astonisht to receive a Letter from Lysonice, in which he found these words.

Lysonice to the Prince of Carthage.

ACcuse me not Cloranisbes of my departure; for I protest to you, my Lord, he knows not that I am gone: 'tis a design which I have put in execution without imparting it to him. But I believ'd I could take no better course for your quiet and my own, than to take a person from your sight who can never render you happy, but might render you unjust. I do not pray you to pardon me, but only not to hate Cloranisbes.

No

No ſooner had the Prince read this Letter, but he was ſtrangely tranſported both againſt Lyſonice and Cloranisbes. So that as he is of a violent temper, he commanded ſome perſons to ask Cloranisbes from himſelf where Lyſonice was, and to ſecure him, if he did not tell preciſely. Anherbal, who receiv'd this order, was very much perplex'd; for juſt as he arriv'd at his houſe, Cloranisbes had done reading a Letter which Lyſonice had written and ſent to him, and was conceiv'd almoſt in theſe terms.

Lyſonice to Cloranisbes.

YOu will ſee by my flight that I do not care to be Princeſs of Carthage, and you will ſee by all my actions that you ought to have had more confidence in my generoſity. But as for affection, expect none from a perſon whom you have never lov'd but for your own ſake only. No doubt I will always do all whatſoever honour requires me, but look for no more from me. I juſtifie you as much as I can to the Prince; 'tis all can be done for you by an unhappy perſon who will let you know the place of her ſanctuary when ſhe is at diſtance enough to be no longer in fear that the Prince of Carthage ſhould violently ſeize upon her.

As Cloranisbes ended reading this Letter, Anherbal enter'd, and told him what order he had receiv'd from the Prince. Did I know where Lyſonice is (anſwer'd Cloranisbes) I would not tell you; ſince I underſtand by a Letter which I juſt now receiv'd from her that the Prince had a deſign to ſeiſe upon her by force: but in truth I have no hand in her flight, and I come to learn it by a Letter which ſhe has writ to me. Anherbal being of late become one of his intimate friends, he accordingly ſhew'd him Lyſonice's Letter, at which he was amaz'd. Wherefore he took upon him to go tell the Prince that which he had ſeen, without ſecuring Cloranisbes. But the Prince interpreting all that was ſaid to him as a colluſion, fell into choler againſt Anherbal, and forthwith ſent away the Captain of his Guards to arreſt Cloranisbes, who was now extremely glad to know Lyſonice was no longer at Utica. However, the Prince ſent after her; but being ſhe travell'd all the day and night before, and took an unfrequented way, thoſe whom he ſent after her could not find her. Whereupon, he grew into a rage which nothing could appeaſe, or equal; unleſs it were the griefe of Cloranisbes, who in the midſt of all thoſe misfortunes reſented more the diſpleaſure he had in not being lov'd by Lyſonice, than any of the reſt.

Aſſoon as this fair perſon was got to Boſtar, this generous African writ to the Prince to complain of his violence, and giving him to underſtand that if he us'd Cloranisbes ill, he would make his peace with the King of Maſſilia, and forſake his part. But on the other ſide, the Prince of Carthage, who intended to cauſe Lyſonice to come back to Utica, anſwer'd him that Cloranisbes ſhould never be at liberty unleſs Lyſonice return'd, and that he would not promiſe for his life, if he deſerted his party to take that of the King of Maſſilia. Lyſonice ſeeing things in this condition, remain'd reſolute, and always declar'd that ſhe would not return to Utica; notwithſtanding Cyrene her Mother ſo repreſented to her, that perhaps ſhe would be the cauſe of her husbands death, that ſhe reſolv'd to write to him by a ſecret way which was preſcrib'd to her; and ſhe writ in this manner.

Lyſonice to Cloranisbes.

SEnd me word whether you had rather ſee me a priſoner than be ſo your ſelf; if you had, I will go to Utica to deliver you; for though you love me not but for your own ſake, I will act generouſly for my own.

This Letter was ſecretly delivered to Cloranisbes, who anſwer'd to it in theſe terms.

Cloranisbes to Lyſonice.

YOur liberty is a thouſand times dearer to me than my own; therefore take no care to deliver me, which perhaps death will ſhortly do, and then you will be Miſtreſs of your ſelf. If my Vows be heard, you ſhall be Queen of Maſſilia, but never Princeſs of Carthage. And when I ſhall be no longer in being, remember I have never diſpleaſed you but through exceſs of love.

You may judge that this Letter did not oblige Lyſonice to change her mind, and ſo ſhe did not go to Utica: but neither did the Prince of Carthage ſet Cloranisbes at liberty. Divers perſons have beſtirr'd themſelves in negotiating to accommodate ſo great a difference: but for that the Princeſs of Carthage has ſo great a power over the Prince her Brother, he is obſtinate not to deliver Cloranisbes, againſt whom crimes of State are forg'd which he never committed, to the end the people may repine the leſs. Wherefore this Prince having declar'd that unleſs Lyſonice change her mind within four months, he will put Cloranisbes to death, this fair perſon believing I have ſufficient influence over the Princes mind, has ſent one of my friends to me to deſire that I would return ſpeedily, to endeavour the calming of this great ſtorm; and by a rare chance, the Prince, not knowing any thing of Lyſonice's deſign, has given order to the ſame man, to come and command me in his name to return aſſoon as poſſible I can. But being uncertain whether I were in Sicily, or here, he paſs'd through Agrigentum, where by the way he ſaw the generous Prince of that place.

Oh! I beſeech you (ſaid Plotina interrupting him) tell me ſome news of him if you know any; for the Prince of Agrigentum ſeem'd ſo worthy a man when the Hiſtory of Artemidorus was related to us, that I ſhould be glad to know whether you have heard any thing concerning him, and whether the amiable Philonice his daughter be ſtill among the Veiled Virgins. 'Tis certain ſhe is there ſtill (anſwer'd Amilar) and a Lady a very faithful Friend of hers whom ſhe left in the world, regrets her continually. But as for the Prince of Agrigentum, he is married again to a perſon ſo accompliſht that nothing can be deſir'd more more to her. For there lives not a handſomer perſon in the world, and there never was any whoſe vertue has been more ſolid and more generally acknowledg'd, nor whoſe deportment has been more uniformly prudent, nor whoſe goodneſs has been greater or more agreeable. All the lineaments of her countenance are wonderfully handſome, her eyes have as much lovelineſs and ſweetneſs as the moſt exquiſite Painters can fancy; her mouth is very graceful, the ſhape of her viſage very noble, her complexion admirably fair, her hair of a rare bright colour, her ſtature proper, her deportment comely, her aſpect very modeſt, ſweet, and diſcreet, her neck graceful, her arms pure, and her hands well ſhaped; and he that would repreſent vertue, muſt draw the Picture of the admirable Artelicia. All the world has approv'd the choice of the Prince of Agrigentum, whoſe generoſity is perpetually the ſame. But, in fine, amiable Plotina, you ſee reaſon and generoſity require me to take a voyage into Africa, to ſerve an unfortunate Friend, and to give the Prince an account of the ſtate of affairs in Sicily. But being Love does not require it, I know not what will be done, and beſides I feel I know not what kind of ſecret motion in my Soul, which tells me I ſhall not return into Africa. However, I would fain know a little better than I do all the beginning of your life. Content your ſelf (anſwer'd Plotina) in knowing that you are much diſavour'd in my heart, and let me leave what is paſs'd, and that which we can have nothing to do with; but at present I have a great deal of pity for Cloranisbes. I pity him as much as you (ſaid Valeria) and Lyſonice alſo; for had ſhe a little leſs ambition, ſhe would be perfectly amiable. She is more ſo than you can imagine (anſwer'd Amilcar) and 'tis no wonder that Cloranisbes is ſtill her Lover though he be her husband, and that the Prince loves her ſo far as to be unjuſt for her. But how came it (ſaid Plotina) that you did not love her? As I never had any great paſſion before I ſaw you, Madam (anſwer'd Amilcar) ſo I became not much more amorous than I was willing to be; and therefore having regard to my friendſhip with Cloranisbes, I over-rul'd my heart in ſpight of all Lyſonice's charms, and left it for ſome days between the hands of Paſilia or Deliſia; for to ſpeak ſincerely, I know not to which of the two I made moſt courtſhip; but this I know with certainty, that I have never lov'd any ſo much as you: and aſſuredly it ought not to be much wonder'd at; for it is not ſo frequent to meet with extraordinary perſons who can inſpire great paſſions. Youth excites nothing but delight; beauty, nothing but deſires; vertue alone, eſteem and reſpect; great wit, admiration; eminent goodneſs, friendſhip: So that to frame a perſon who may produce at the ſame time delight, deſires, eſteem, reſpect, admiration, friendſhip, and love, it is requiſite that ſhe be indu'd with all that I have mention'd, and together with all theſe, with an inexpreſſible pleaſingneſs, ſuch as you have. For, as for my part, I could ſooner diſpenſe with the want of extraordinary youth, and great beauty, than that I know not what charmingneſs which is found in your eyes and in your wit. And, in fine, I ſpeak boldly to the diſparagement of beauty, I have all my life profeſs'd I would have a Miſtreſs who could pleaſe me without ſeeing her, with whom I might walk in the dark without tedioufneſs and melancholy, and who was alſo fit to be an agreeable Friend, in caſe it ſhould come to paſs that I lov'd her no longer as a Miſtreſs. You ſpeak very prudently (reply'd Plotina) but to be as wiſe as you are (continu'd ſhe) I think I ſhould have done well not to countenance the affection of a ſtranger; for I begin to fear your departure more than conſiſts with my quiet. Ha! charming Plotina (ſaid he) how delightful to me is this which you ſay, and how powerful to retain me eternally with you! While he was ſpeaking thus, one brought a Letter, the ſuperſcription of which was addreſs'd to Plotina: but having open'd it, ſhe found that it was not intended to her, and contain'd only theſe four Verſes:

Charming Hermilia I here at Rome, I deem'd
I only as a friend had you eſteem'd:
But now I find your abſence does diſcover
This truth unknown before, I am your Lover.

Plotina had ſcarce done reading them, but Hermilia enter'd, and gave her a Letter open'd; Certainly (ſaid ſhe to her) Octavius muſt needs have been miſtaken, for he directs a Letter to me which does not ſute with me. You will be confirm'd in that opinion (anſwer'd Plotina) by reading this which I give you, which will manifeſt to you, that my brother is really miſtaken. Hermilia took it and read it; but as ſhe was reading it, ſhe bluſht, and her melancholy renewing at that inſtant by the remembrance of her Brother and her Lover, the tears came into her eyes. Which nevertheleſs ſhe reſtrain'd, and returning Plotina Octavius's Letter, I am ſo perſwaded (ſaid ſhe to her ſoftly) that in the condition I am in, I am fit only to excite pity, that I cannot think I have been able to excite Love. Beſides, if it were ſo, Octavius would be more unhappy thereby: for in truth I love my grief ſo much, that I believe I ſhould hate whoſoever would comfort me of it. Plotina would have anſwer'd Hermilia if Telanus had not arriv'd, who brought Theomenes to them, and told them that at the very time he was ſpeaking, Galerita, the Princeſs of the Leontines, the generous Melintha, the charming Herſilia, all the friends of Aronces and Titus too, were ſpeaking in his favour to Porſenna; and he promis'd that the next morning he would let them know what the ſucceſs was. But who is this Herſilia you ſpeak of? (ſaid the fair and melancholy Hermilia) What? (ſaid Plotina looking attentively upon her) did not you take notice, the day the Queen of Hetruria came hither, of a very fair perſon who was with her, to whom Melintha was almoſt continually ſpeaking, and who has ſo lovely an air? I aſſure you (anſwer'd Hermilia) I obſerv'd nothing, but had my mind fill'd only with my own ſorrow, whilſt that great Court was here. Were it but only to do ſomething new (ſaid Amilcar) 'tis fit to draw you the Picture of a perſon whom you ſaw and did not ſee. For my part (ſaid Plotina) who am charm'd with her beauty, I ſhall be raviſh'd to underſtand a little more accurately who ſhe is: and as for me (ſaid Valeria) ſeeing ſhe is Melintha's friend, and does Aronces ſervice, I am very curious of all that relates to her. Theomenes can better content your deſire (anſwer'd Telanus) than any one, for he is Herſilia's intimate friend. I am ready to do what the company pleaſes (ſaid Theomenes) but if the fair Hermilia has not the ſame curioſity, I ſhall ſpeak nothing of her perſon, but only of her wit and vertue. 'Tis true (anſwer'd this illuſtrious Siſter of Brutus) few things in the world can make me curious; but being I am conſcious that it is not juſt to moleſt all the world continually with our grief, and that when we ſeek not to cure it by death, we ought to over-rule it, and learn at leaſt to live, without appearing incivil and humorſome; to reproach my ſelf of my weakneſs in not being able to overcome my melancholy, I will confeſs ingenuouſly, that I know not whether Herſilia is brown or fair, tall or low; and next, I will demand of you, what manner of perſon it is whom you eſteem, and who (I underſtand) is univerſally eſteem'd. Know then, Madam (ſaid Theomenes) Herſilia is of a very comely and agreeable ſtature. Her hair is the faireſt brown in the World, her viſage oval, her eyes large and handſome and of ſomething a darkiſh blew, which renders them more ſparkling and agreeable. She has a handſome mouth, pure teeth, and the air and caſt of a ſprightly perſon, of a perſon of condition, and of a perſon of the Court. Her Phyſiognomy is noble, there is luſtre and delicateneſs in her beauty; ſhe has no affectedneſs neither in her looks, nor words, nor actions; and though ſhe has ſometimes I know not what little diſcontented and fierce air, yet it ſerves rather to render her amiable than diminiſh her Charms. Her gracefulneſs is enforc'd, ſhe dreſſes her ſelf very exquiſitely, and eſpecially her head to the beſt advantage without ſhewing too much or too little art therein. One thing is very peculiar to Herſilia, namely, that without appearing moroſe, never any other Beauty was ſo averſe from all thoughts of Gallantry. In effect all the Court renders homage to her vertue, and has an extraordinary eſteem for her. Herſilia's heart is naturally very noble, and her mind of good temper; ſhe ſees things as they are, and acts always as ſhe ought. She is naturally magnificent too and generous, ſhe is faithful, ſecret, and diſcreet; and though ſhe is not the freeſt perſon in the world of her careſſes, nevertheleſs ſhe is always very civil. She loves few people ardently, although otherwiſe ſhe is a very generous Friend. She is much affected with merit, and carefully ſeeks all opportunities to ſerve ſuch as are deſerving. She underſtands handſome compoſures exactly, and without making oſtentation of her wit, they that write Verſes well cannot judge of them better than ſhe. She is skill'd in divers Foreign Languages, ſhe ſpeaks very agreeably; and there is ſomething I know not what ſo charming both in her perſon and in her mind, that ſhe cannot be too much extoll'd. Having a conſiderable charge under the Queen, ſhe has many times occaſion to give proofs of her conduct, addreſs, and judgment; but whatever occaſion ſhe meets with, ſhe always comes off with glory; and it may be ſaid, in brief, that Herſilia is a Lady infinitely amiable. When ſhe does not eſteem any one, ſhe is ſufficiently put to't to conceal it; and ſhe is more abſolutely Miſtreſs of her inclination than of her averſion. Her piety is ſolid, and not like theirs, who affect a certain outſide auſterity which ſcarce ever reaches to the heart: and it may be ſaid without untruth, Herſilia is ſo accompliſht, that no greater perfections can be deſir'd in any perſon. Moreover, ſhe is highly reſpected by the generous Artander her husband, who has an eminent Office and a very conſiderable Government under the King, and who no doubt deſerves to have ſuch a vertuous wife as Herſilia. For he is of an illuſtrious family, has an heroick mind, great judgment, and capacity to manage the moſt difficult affairs. He is honorable, juſt, and valiant as any mortal can be; he has done ſeveral great and glorious actions in the Wars, which have acquir'd him a fair renown. But his valour produces neither vanity, nor pride, nor inſolence in him; and no man can be found that exceeds him in modeſty and prudence. He has ſome backwardneſs in his firſt addreſſes; but being very civil too, his ſerious humor does not diſoblige any; and in fine, it may be concluded that if Herſilia is worthy of Artander, Artander is worthy of Herſilia. All which Theomenes has ſpoken is ſo true (ſaid Telanus) that if he be deficient in any thing, 'tis in not ſpeaking enough of thoſe two excellent perſons. I acknowledge it (anſwer'd Theomenes) but the cauſe of it, is, becauſe I am ſo accuſtom'd to the modeſt humor of Herſilia, who will never have any to commend her, that I dare not ſo much as praiſe her in her abſence; ſo great a fear I have of ſtirring up that amiable little frowardneſs, which ſhe is ſometimes in railery reproacht with, and withal which ſo well becomes her. But I would know (ſaid Amilcar) whether the fair Hermilia, who ſaw her and did not ſee her, the day the Queen of Hetruria came hither, has not heard that which Theomenes has ſpoken, and not attended to him. No (anſwer'd this fair Virgin) and I know now ſo well what a perſon Herſilia is, that if I ſtill took any care for the World, I would with all my heart reſemble her. You have no doubt wherewith to comfort your ſelf without reſembling her (ſaid Plotina) but 'tis true, if you ought to ceaſe being ſuch as you are, you would have reaſon to deſire to be ſuch as ſhe is; ſince ſhe is certainly a very lovely and excellent perſon. It needs be no wonder then that the generous Melintha loves her ſo much. Yet their humors are not alike (ſaid Amilcar) but having both of them very prudent wits, they never claſh, even in ſuch things wherein they do not agree. The truth is (ſaid Telanus) Melintha is much taken with the delights of ſolitude, which Herſilia does not care for: but this diverſity of ſentiments produces only an innocent conteſt, which occaſions them to ſpeak very agreeable things. When Herſilia (added Theomenes) is for ſome days at a little place of retirement, which my Siſter much affects, ſhe reproaches her pleaſantly for taking more pleaſure, in ſeeing from her Windows great Boats loaden with ſeveral Countrey-commodities paſs by, than in ſeeing ſome ſtately Horſe-race. For my part (ſaid Plotina) I ſhould ſide with Herſilia in this conteſt againſt Melintha: And I ſhould help Melintha (ſaid Valeria) to defend her ſelf againſt Herſilia. For I think nothing more delightful than to ſee Boats afar off going to and fro upon a great River, to behold the Flocks diſpers'd in the Meadows, the Shepherds playing upon ſome ruſtick Inſtrument, and the Shepherdeſſes dancing at the corner of a Wood. Then you would like Melintha's little houſe well (ſaid Telanus) for all things there are ſolitary, Country-like, and agreeable. In what place is this lovely ſolitude? (demanded Valeria.) It is near Cluſium (anſwer'd Theomenes) but I undertake not to deſcribe it to you; Telanus muſt do that, if you deſire to know what manner of place it is. I willingly conſent thereto (reply'd Telanus) for I confeſs to you, I am extremely pleas'd with it. Tell us then preciſely how it is (ſaid Plotina) but have a care what you ſpeak, for I advertiſe you, Amilcar who hears you, knows how to make the deſcription of a handſome place admirably. I am ſo accuſtom'd (anſwer'd Telanus) to yield to Amilcar, that I ſhall not be ſurpris'd if I be inferiour to him in the art of making deſcriptions. For my part (ſaid Amilcar) I confeſs to you, I ſhall be much troubled if you ſurpaſs me. Happen

and

what will (ſaid Telanus, after he had been deſir'd to repreſent the houſe of Melintha) I ſhall tell you the ſolitude I am to deſcribe has ſomething ſo pleaſing in it, that all Palaces muſt yield to it. But that which is more remarkable in this matter, is, that the admirable Melintha has made ſo conſiderable an alteration in this place, that it may be ſaid ſhe has almoſt wholly transform'd it. The firſt time I was there, I could not conceive it could become agreeable, the Garden behind the houſe was ſo exceedingly narrow, and all the ground was ſo declining and uneven that one would have thought he walkt upon the ſide of a precipice. So that though the proſpect of this place was very handſome, yet it was enjoy'd from ſo incommodious a ſtation, that this diminiſht part of its delightfulneſs. Nevertheleſs in a very ſhort time and with no great expence, Melintha has render'd it ſuch as I am going to deſcribe to you. The Court is of a largeneſs proportionable to the houſe, all which is ſeen of the building appears new and of a graceful plainneſs. There is a Hall which has a Chamber at one end and a kind of little Gallery at the other. It is open in the midſt of the ſide towards the Garden, which two ſtages of ſtone-ſtairs lead into, from whence is ſeen a green plat terraſs'd, of a very reaſonable greatneſs, a ruſtical Garden beneath, which leads inſenſibly deſcending into a little Grove, whoſe ſhadineſs is ſo much the more agreeable, for that there is heard from thence the murmur of a very pleaſant River which paſſes hard by. But to return to the ſtone-perron whence I have drawn your imagination, conceive, that you ſee from thence not only the terraſs'd green-plat, the ruſtical Garden, and the little Grove, but above twenty miles diſtance, with ſo charming a variety of objects, that nothing is more agreeable. For beyond all that I have mention'd there is ſeen a delightful River, in which are ſeveral little green Iſlands embelliſhing it in that place, between which many little Boats are ſeen paſſing to and fro. But a hundred paces from thence, this pleaſant River goes toward the right hand to diſcharge it ſelf into a greater, which is ſeen coming afar off; and being it comes winding, it is ſeen in ſeveral places at a great diſtance. So that beholding the water on both ſides, this little corner of Land wherein many Flocks are feeding, ſeems almoſt an Iſland between two Rivers which make an admirable ſhew; and beyond which are ſeen many handſome Villages, till the ſight loſes it ſelf: and on the left hand a ruſtick bridge and a little houſe beyond, whoſe irregular ſtructure contributes ſomething to the handſomneſs of the proſpect, as well as ſeveral remote Temples which are ſeen in divers places of the Plain. But having deſcrib'd this pleaſant Landskip to you, which is ſeen from all the apartments of the houſe, I muſt lead you up a curious and goodly ſtair-caſe, and cauſe you to enter into a Chamber, the hangings of which are blew and ſilver, and the Windows reach from the top to the bottom, that ſo the ſight may be more free. Next, I muſt lead you into a little place in which there is nothing but chains, a little Table, two admirable Pictures with guilded frames, the deſigns of which having ſome correſpondence to ſolitude, agreeably fill the imagination. For in one of them is ſeen a very handſome woman, repreſented in a wild Country, wherein no living thing appears but this fair perſon, who ſeeming to be driven out of the World, leans upon a Tree in a careleſs manner, which manifeſts that the light it ſelf is no longer the object of her view, ſo retir'd ſhe appears into her ſelf. Her graceful fair hair is diſhevel'd upon her ſhoulders, the whiteneſs of which cannot be ſurpaſs'd but by the complexion of this ſolitary fair, in whoſe countenance is ſeen ſo ſweet a ſorrow, that joy it ſelf never caus'd any thing ſo agreeable. Her whole poſture has a negligence full of ſadneſs, which correſponds to her ſentiments. As much as is ſeen of her body is admirable, the little clothing which appears is natural, the Landskip is done to the life, and, in fine, this piece is worthy of the excellent Painter who drew it, of the amiable place wherein it is, and of the admirable perſon to whom it belongs. But from this ſo delightful Cabinet you paſs into a little Chamber, the moſt pleaſant that ever was ſeen. The furniture of it is Grey, Iſabella and White; there is alſo a very handſome ſolitary Landskip, the Bed ſtands in a little room apart: On one ſide of which is a large Window open from top to bottom, like all the reſt, which have an Iron-rail to lean upon, of exquiſite workmanſhip; and on the other, another great Window which opens into a little Cloſet, painted and guilded, where there is a Tablet in which Jupiter is pourtray'd, and where Melintha performs her devotions to the Gods, on ſuch days as ſhe cannot go to the publick Temples. But to conclude the deſcription of this retreat of the admirable Melintha, you muſt know, that returning out of this little Chamber and the Cabinet where the Picture of the fair Hermite is, you go into a Chamber, the Tapiſtry whereof is ſilver and blew, and from thence enter into a Cabinet which is the handſomeſt in the World, out at a great Window of which is ſeen the ſame proſpect which I deſcrib'd to you before. The form of this Cabinet is ſquare; it is neither too high nor too low roof'd, it is hung round with goodly Pictures whoſe frames are richly guilded, and which being of two different ſizes, are plac'd in a very agreeable order. The fretwork has a very handſome piece in the midſt, wherein the Painter has admirably repreſented ſincerity, under the figure of a fair woman holding her heart in her hand. All the ornaments which encompaſs this piece are very exquiſite, and all the other pictures which are ſeen in this Cabinet, by the deſign of the excellent Painter who drew them according to Melintha's order, repreſent ſeveral kinds of Landskips, and ſolitary perſons inhabiting them. Such melancholy objects are ſeen in ſome of them, that they move the hearts of the Spectators; in others, ſo ſweet a ſolitude, as makes the ſolitary inhabitant envied; and, in brief, there is ſo lovely a variety in all theſe pieces, that Nature has not more in her productions than the admirable Painter has expreſs'd in his works. But amongſt the reſt, there is a piece which hangs over a Couch, in which deſigning to repreſent ſeveral ſorts of grief, he has done it ſo admirably, that it cannot be ſufficiently commended. I forgot to tell you that on the ſide the door is of which is oppoſite to that of the Window, hangs a Looking-glaſs, which receiving all the objects of the proſpect, gives a pleaſant ſight of it to one that looks not upon it. In a corner of this Cabinet a little Bay is contriv'd within the thickneſs of the Wall, to place Books in, where alſo Melintha would have a piece put, whoſe ſight alone ſhould excite ſentiments of piety, notwithſtanding any indiſpoſedneſs thereto: but this is not ſeen, but when one pleaſes. To conclude, this Cabinet is ſo handſome, ſo uniform and ſo ſtately, that there is no Palace in the World wherein it might not be admir'd. Thus I have ſhew'd you this little houſe, which pleaſes Melintha far more than a greater and fairer, which ſhe has caus'd to be built at Cluſium. I wonder not if it pleaſes her (anſwer'd Plotina) for as you repreſent it, I think I ſhould delight to ſee Boats, Shepherds, Shepherdeſſes and Flocks of Sheep out of that amiable Cabinet: eſpecially (added Valeria) if there be good company. I agree with you (anſwer'd ſhe) that agreeable company does no hurt; but, humor may add to the delight of the handſomeſt Deſart in the World. But however, 'tis fit to do juſtice to Telanus, and confeſs that if he does not ſurpaſs Amilcar in deſcriptions, he may pretend to equal him. I beſeech you (ſaid Amilcar) do not determine things ſo preciſely, but rather give an ambiguous judgment, ſo that either of us may believe he has the advantage. Be it how it will (ſaid Theomenes) you may be both commended without our fearing to miſplace our praiſes.

As Theomenes was ſpeaking thus, there was heard a great noiſe from without the Tents, which Telanus going to ſee what it meant, found it was caus'd by Souldiers quarrelling about Aronces, ſome of them ſaying the Camp ought to make an inſurrection to deliver him; others, that it behov'd always to obey Porſenna, who knew well what he had to do. Telanus would have appeas'd and accorded them, but an old Souldier addreſſing to him, How? my Lord (ſaid he to him) ſhall we let Aronces periſh without attempting to deliver him, who is all our hope? No, no, it muſt not be; Porſenna may remember that heretofore himſelf was not deliver'd but by violence. We are newly told (added he) that the King ſpeaks of putting him to death aſſoon as he has found Mutius: but it muſt not be endur'd that he commit this injuſtice, and we ſhall ſerve him, in ſerving Aronces. Hereupon Telanus judging it might be dangerous for Aronces to have the Army ſhew too much ardor for him; to pacifie the incens'd Souldiers, told them he knew the Prince would ſhortly be cleared, and freed from his impriſonment: whereby he repreſſed part of their violence, and went to re-aſſure the fair Romans, whom the noiſe had alarm'd.

This evening and the next morning, the Queen of Hetruria, the Princeſs of the Leontines, and all the friends of Aronces made their utmoſt inſtance for him to Porſenna; but to no effect: for he was ſo perſwaded Aronces and Mutius had conſpir'd againſt him, that he could not have been more, if himſelf had been an ear-witneſs of their Confederacy. And therefore (ſaid he to the Princeſs of the Leontines) 'tis only out of regard to the formalities of juſtice, that Aronces is not yet dead; and aſſoon as Mutius is found, and they whom I have in cuſtody ſhall maintain before him and Aronces that they were the inſtruments of this horrid Conſpiracy, which Love excited them to, nothing ſhall be able to hinder me from giving that great example of juſtice, which I owe to Poſterity and my own preſervation. All Aronces's Friends perceiving reaſons, ſentiments of nature, and prayers prevail'd nothing with this prejudic'd Prince, told him he hazarded to ſee Rome againſt him, and to cauſe his own Army to mutiny. If you are minded to haſten Aronces death (anſwer'd he) you need but ſpeak as you do; for if my Subjects rebel for the Criminal Aronces, 'tis a ſign that he is a rebel himſelf, that they look upon him as their head, and that the beſt courſe I can take is to puniſh a Parricide ſpeedily. The friends of Aronces would have reply'd, but the cruel Tullia arriving, they could not; becauſe the King ſignifi'd that he was minded to be alone with her. Yet they repin'd ſo loudly that Tullia heard their murmurs: but being us'd to complaints and curſes, ſhe was not mov'd at them, but made ſhew of not having heard them. As for Tarquin, he continu'd at his Quarter, that he might keep his Forces in their duty, whilſt Tullia promoted her diſmal negotiation. Titus indeed was much devoted to Aronces intereſt, and was continually active for him: but as for Sextus, he had nothing in his heart but love for Clelia, and was ſo tranſported with it that he thought of nothing elſe. For whilſt all the Camp was in Alarm, Tarquin and Tullia were contriving to deſtroy Aronces, and all the Friends of this Prince in the Camp or at Rome were ſtudying to ſave him, Sextus was deviſing to carry away Clelia; for in this confuſion the Hoſtages were guarded with leſs circumſpection, though Porſenna on the contrary had commanded they ſhould be kept moſt carefully. In order to which, Sextus corrupted ſome of the Souldiers which guarded Clelia, aſſur'd many to him of the King his Fathers, and whereas the Tents of theſe fair Romans were upon the bank of Tyber, he gave order to have Boats in readineſs to convey her away by night. He prefix'd a day and hour to do it, and hop'd ſo well to carry on and accompliſh his purpoſe, that it might be believ'd Clelia was carried away either by the Romans, or by the friends of Aronces, for fear Porſenna ſhould treat her rigorouſly. Moreover, he reſolv'd to ſend her to Cume, becauſe he had an intimate friendſhip with the Tyrant which raign'd there at that time. On the other ſide Amilcar going and coming continually from Rome to the Camp and from the Camp to Rome, divers conſultations were held in both theſe places for the deliverance of Aronces; but no ſure courſe could be found out for bringing about ſo juſt a deſign. Some judg'd it beſt to get the Prince out of Priſon, that ſo he might afterwards juſtifie himſelf in freedom; but ſuch as knew him well, believ'd that ſhould his Guards be forc'd or corrupted, he would not have recourſe to flight, for fear it ſhould argue him to be criminal. Others thought it moſt expedient for the Camp and Rome to riſe of a ſudden, and go demand Aronces of Porſenna with Arms in hand; but a Treaty having been made with this King, and Rome not being in a condition to venture a ſecond Siege, the Senate would not have conſented that the Pacification ſhould be infring'd. Beſides, the twenty fair Romans who were given in Hoſtage, having Lovers at Rome, they were not forward to ſuffer any ſuch reſolution to be taken as might bring them into danger. Some there were alſo who propounded to go to Tarquin's Quarter, and following Mutius's example, kill the Tyrant with the execrable Tullia: but this Propoſition was not approv'd. However, that ſomething might be done, it was reſolv'd that Artemidorus and Themiſtus, being two great Princes, ſhould go to Porſenna the next day, to tell him a very conſiderable truth: for he interpreted Mutius's departure to be a flight, and it was at length diſcover'd to proceed only from a deſpair of Love. For the laſt converſation Mutius had with Valeria made a deep impreſſion upon him; ſo that being deſirous to try whether, whilſt ſhe was at the Camp, he could more eaſily bring Publicola to be favorable to him, he went to him, and ſpoke to him with an air ſo little ſubmiſſive, that it was apparent he betray'd himſelf like the deliverer of Rome. At which Publicola being diſpleas'd, anſwer'd him with a generous ſincerity which caſt him into deſpair; for he ſo clearly intimated to him, that he ſhould

not take his daughter from Herminius, that he became desperate, leaving Publicola in a great fury, and soon after departed from Rome. Whereby it was easie to judge that Love was a greater cause of his absence than any other consideration. It was therefore resolv'd that Themistus and Artemidorus should go to Porsenna the next day, and tell what they had understood from Publicola, to the end Mutius's departure might no longer pass for an evidence against Aronces. Not, that what they had to say was a convincing truth, but it was at least a favourable presumption; and being they could do no better, they did as people use to do in great misfortunes, namely, rather to do a hundred things unprofitably, than fail of doing one thing which may be beneficial.

But whilst all in Rome or the two Camps, were devising to destroy or save Aronces, this unfortunate Prince indur'd the greatest torments an amorous heart which loves honour is capable of. He saw himself accus'd of a horrid crime, by a father whom he had deliver'd from a long imprisonment, and whose life he had sav'd, and by a father whom he respected still notwithstanding the injustice he did him. But that which afflicted him most, was, that the letter he receiv'd from Clelia, perswaded him either that she believ'd the accusation charg'd upon him, or else accus'd him her self of something; and to augment his grief, he saw he had lost the Letter, which might be of some ill consequence to him if it were in the hands of Porsenna: so that his affliction was more than can be imagin'd. But he did not suffer alone; for Clelia's mind was more disquieted than ever any persons in the World. She lov'd Aronces more than her self; but she could not but believe, or at least fear, that he was unfaithful to her. She wisht nothing with more ardor than to hear Porsenna was appeas'd, and nevertheless she could not hear without indignation that Lysimena acted with that generous confidence which led her to speak to Porsenna whatever she believ'd might advantage Aronces, without considering that this augmented Zenocrates's jealousie: for being she knew her self innocent, she conceiv'd it would be easie for her to justifie her self at any time; and therefore she continued to act the same generosity in so important an occasion. Which so disgusted Clelia, that she almost wisht the prayers Lysimena made to Porsenna would take no effect, that so Aronces might not owe his life and liberty to her. Plotina and Valeria being the confidents of all her sorrows, she spoke of nothing else to them when they were alone, especially at nights; for these three fair persons lay in the same place, not, but that it might be said that these twenty fair Romans were in one and the same Tent, because they had communication one with another; but nevertheless, they had in a manner every one their own. Clelia, Valeria, and Plotina being one evening together lamenting their misfortunes, Clelia told her Friends she had still more cause to fear some greater, than they knew of; For I beheld (said she to them) or thought I beheld the virtuous Lucretia last night, and I imagin'd too I heard her voice. Being unhappy people (said Valeria) seldome have pleasing Dreams, 'tis not to be wonder'd if that dismal Idea came into your fancie. 'Tis true (added she) considering what befel her illustrious Lover, these kind of advertisements seem not altogether to be rejected; for if you remember, Lucretia appear'd to him. Tell us therefore in what manner you thought you beheld that fair but unfortunate Lady. My discontents, as you may imagine (answer'd Clelia) strangely possess my mind, so that I never sleep but out of weariness. Hereby it hapned, that it was almost break of day before I shut mine eyes. In this condition I know not whether my heaviness forc'd me to sleep, or whether I was really awake; but me thought I beheld a good great light, which nevertheless was somewhat dusky too; a moment after Lucretia appear'd to me fairer than ever I saw her; her hair was dishevell'd, she was cover'd with a large white Robe, and held a bloody Ponyard in her hand. In this posture methought I heard her voice, which was something terrifying. Flee, Clelia, flee (said she to me) but flee speedily; for I advertise you that the Tyrant, who caus'd me to have recourse to this Ponyard, has a design against your honour as he had against mine. Have recourse therefore to flight, and bring not your self into the necessity of being oblig'd to have recourse to death. After this, the light disappear'd, Lucretia vanish'd; but the sound of her voice has made such an impression upon my mind, that all this day I have done nothing else but think upon what I imagin'd I saw and heard, and had not so much power as to tell it you: besides, having not seen you alone, I was unwilling to speak of a thing which seems only fit to make me suspected of having a mind something weak.

Clelia had scarce done speaking this to her Friends, when one of their Guards enter'd into their Tent, with a certain hasty air which signifi'd he had some important matter to tell. I beseech you, Madam (said he to Clelia) pardon me the liberty I take of entring into your Tent; if Lucilius or Telanus had been come back from the King, I would have addressed my self to them; but being they are not here, and I cannot tell that which I have to say, to him that commands us in their absence, I addres to you, to advertise you that Sextus will carry you away by violence, if you do not take care to prevent it. I have not been able to learn whether he intends it this night or the next; but I know infallibly he hath laid all his contrivances for that purpose; several of my Companions are to be assistant to him, he that commands us is his Creature, he has Boats in readiness, and is himself to serve in this violence. Wherefore, Madam, conceiving I could never serve the Prince better than by serving you, I come to give you this intelligence. The business is urgent (added he) and I understand the design as fully as possibly one can. But by what means came you to know it? (said Clelia much affrighted.) One of my companions, Madam, (answer'd he) who would have engag'd me in this criminal design told me of it, and I made shew of consenting to it, to the end I might give you notice of it. Valeria, Plotina, and Clelia, askt this man divers other Questions, who answer'd them with so much ingenuity, that they were assur'd he did not lye. They thanked him for his generosity, and desir'd him to tell Telanus, assoon as he came from the King, that they must necessarily speak with him; and in case Telanus did not return speedily, to come himself to speak with them. Well, my dear Sister (said Clelia to Plotina) the apparition of the virtuous Lucretia is but too true, and am not I very unhappy in seeing my self lov'd by the most infamous of men? Was not I sufficiently oppress'd with the misfortunes of Aronces and his infidelity, without being more so by mischiefs more dreadful to me than death? But, in fine (added she) I am not resolv'd to await this dismal adventure;

I muſt go from Tent to Tent to awake all my Companions, oblige them all to ſtay with me, till the return of Telanus, and engage them by Oath to ſtick to me, and rather tear me in pieces, than ſuffer me to be carri'd away by the infamous Sextus. If Telanus comes (ſaid Plotina) it is abſolutely neceſſary that he give way for us to eſcape; for in the condition things are, we know not who to have recourſe to. For my part (ſaid Valeria) I know not whether we ſhould do well to violate the Laws of Nations by going to Rome though we might, or whether it would not be better to have recourſe to the Princeſs of the Leontines. No, no, (anſwer'd Clelia) I will not be oblig'd to that Princeſs; and as things now are, I believe ſhe would not be as ſerviceable to me as ſhe is to Aronces; and beſides, do you think Porſenna will at preſent believe any thing againſt a Son of Tullia? We muſt therefore begin to aſſemble all our Friends together; and ſo Clelia cauſing a maid-ſlave to light her, was follow'd by Valeria and Plotina through the lines of Communication which went from Tent to Tent, where they awaken'd Hermilia, Colatina, and all the reſt. But after they were come together into one and the ſame Tent, the Soldier who diſcover'd the plot to Clelia, came to tell her that Lucilius and Telanus had ſent notice that they would not lodge there that night, becauſe ſome affairs requir'd their preſence elſewhere. Wherefore Clelia interpreting this as an artifice of Sextus, who caus'd them to be retain'd, that he might the better effect his deſign, was in a very terrifi'd condition, and the death of Lucretia coming into her mind at the ſame time, ſhe thought every moment ſhe beheld Sextus entring with his Soldiers to carry her away. All her Friends partaking of her fear, counſell'd her the beſt they could; but ſhe having a great heart, No, no, my Companions (ſaid ſhe, beholding ſome of them with tears in their eyes) 'tis to no purpoſe to weep, we muſt this day ſhew that we are Romans, that we love honour, and that death cannot daunt us; for do not imagine (added ſhe) that this deſign regards only me; all they that ſerve a raviſher, are raviſhers themſelves; and I do not queſtion, but the infamous Sextus has promis'd you to ſuch as are to be his inſtruments in ſo criminal an action. But were it otherwiſe (continu'd ſhe) I will believe that the affection you have for me, and the ſenſe of honour would lead you to be willing to ſave me, and to take a reſolution to make an eſcape from this place, where we cannot but every moment be expos'd to the inſolence of the two mutinous Camps, which in all probability will ſhortly fall foul together. Let us then make a daring and generous reſolution; our Tents are upon the Bank of Tyber, and there is no way to eſcape but by the River. If we dye, we ſhall die with greater glory than Lucretia, ſince it will be in avoiding an unhappineſs, which ſhe would not out-live. I know it will be ſaid at Rome, that we violate the Treaty; but every thing may be lawfully done to ſave our honours. Nevertheleſs that you may not think (added ſhe) I will cauſe you all to be drown'd for my preſervation, and expoſe you to an inevitable danger, hear what courſe I conceive fit to be taken. You know when we came out of Rome, we were adorn'd like publick Victims to be ſacrific'd to the peace; ſo that we have many Jewels amongſt us: let us promiſe all we have to the Souldier who gave us this intelligence, on condition he will be ſerviceable to us; let us not wait for the return of Lucilius or Telanus, nor tempt them to be unfaithful to the King of Hetruria, who committed us to their cuſtody; but let us only deviſe how to deceive our Guards; we may eaſily do it, provided that Soldier and ſome of his companions be for us; let us ſend to him who commands in the abſence of Lucilius and Telanus, to deſire permiſſion to bathe our ſelves at break of day, which without doubt he will grant us; for being perhaps 'tis the night following wherein he intends to convoy me away, he will believe this will facilitate his deſign. But when we come to the Water ſide, you ſhall do what you ſee me do; ask me no more, but leave me to manage this enterprize; I require no more of you, but of what I will my ſelf ſhew you an example: but above all things, to continue your ſelves in the generous reſolution which I ſee you inclinable to, conſider always, I conjure you, that the buſineſs is no leſs than to keep our ſelves from being under the power of the murderer of the virtuous Lucretia, that glory attends us on the other ſide of the Tyber, and that we ſhall eternally diſhonour our Country, if we be ſo puſillanimous and weak as to incur a misfortune which we may avoid.

Clelia ſpoke with ſo much courage and eloquence, that all her companions haſtned to give her their Jewels, ſwear not to forſake her, but to follow her example and pleaſure implicitely. After this ſhe went to ſpeak to the truſty Souldier, and communicating her deſign to him, ſhe gave him ſome gratuities, and promis'd him more; which done, he went to the Officer who commanded the Guard, and whoſe name was Minutius, to demand his permiſſion for all theſe fair Virgins to go and bathe themſelves in the Tyber about break of day. He made no ſcruple to grant this requeſt; and gave orders to ſuch as were to conduct them, without ſuſpecting any thing of the deſign; for Rome being on the other ſide of the River, he could not think theſe Ladies would imagine it poſſible to get thither. Beſides, being Hoſtages, and Sextus deſign in all probability unknown to them, he was on the contrary very glad of their beginning to bathe themſelves in the River, inaſmuch as it might prove convenient for his enterprize. But to bring it ſo to paſs as to ſend ſuch Souldiers the next day to conduct them, as were privy to this Plot, he ſent others this day; the order of Military duties requiring ſucceſſive attendance of ſeveral perſons. In the mean time the Souldier whom Clelia had gain'd, provided Planks, Hurdles, and Bavines; it not being poſſible to get either Boats or Horſes: he alſo ſuborn'd ſome other Souldiers to aſſiſt him, with the Jewels Clelia gave him, and in brief, he did all that was in his power. Now when break of day was come, theſe twenty fair Virgins having ſpent the whole night without ſleep, went forth under the conduct of thoſe that were order'd to guard them. It was no lighter when they left their Tents, than juſt enough to diſcern things, and to perceive the agitation of the River through the Willows which grew upon the Bank of it in this place. The place was unfrequented, agreeable, and fit for the execution of Clelia's deſign. The Souldier who was of intelligence with them, haſting to bring them to the place where Tents were erected for them in the River, led them through a way beſet with Willows, whoſe tops were interwoven together, and ſeem'd to make a kind of rude Canopy; and at length they arriv'd at the place where they made ſhew of intending to bathe themſelves. They who guided them ſtay'd at a diſtance out of reſpect, to leave them to undreſs themſelves; and ſome of them too were corrupted to do so by Clelia's Complotter. But the Ladies not thinking them remote enough, desir'd them to retire a little more back; which they did. And assoon as they saw them at a good distance, the honest Souldier who was hid behind a bush to assist them, shew'd them the Planks, Hurdles and the Bavines, which he had caus'd to be brought thither secretly, and had so well fitted that each of them could bear up a person in the Water. But when Clelia counted them, she found there was one fewer than needed; at which she being nothing abash'd, No, no, (said she) my companions, trouble not your selves who it shall be that wants something to support her in the water, my courage shall support me, and the Gods will assist me. Let us not therefore lose time (added this magnanimous Lady) the moments are precious; this valiant Souldier whom you see shall help the weakest, and I am so perswaded Heaven will be aiding to us, that I doubt not in the least but we shall all happily get to Rome. The God of Tyber sav'd Horatius when he leapt into it in his Armour; he will save us perhaps as well as him.

After this, Clelia having invok'd the God of the River, without expecting the answer of her companions, cast her self couragiously into the water, and turning towards them, If you love glory (said she to them) you will follow me; and so abandoning her self to the stream of the River, she was carried from the shore. There was no delay, but her companions instantly did the same; and the Souldier, having so handsomly ty'd some to the Planks, others to the Hurdles and Bavines which he had provided, that there was no fear of sinking, he leapt into the Water after them, and sometimes helpt one, and sometimes another: their cloaths also were of some use in this occasion to bear them up. But there hapn'd a remarkable accident; for as Clelia turn'd her head now and then to see whether her companions follow'd her, she found a Horse in the midst of the River, which had scap'd from one that led him to drink; whereupon this couragious Lady got hold of his Bridle, and made shift to mount upon his back. By which means advancing her self above the water, and day being much clear'd up, the Souldiers who had guarded her, were extremely amaz'd to see her and all her companions about her, whom the officious Souldier help'd forward as much as he could; for they who were not corrupted, believ'd these twenty fair Virgins were in the Tents prepar'd for them upon the River. On the side of Rome, they who perceiv'd a woman upon a Horse swimming in the middle of the River, and follow'd by others who were supported by Planks, Hurdles, or Bavins, knew not at first whether they were not men disguised in the habits of women, and whether this were not some subtle project of Tarquin: so that they were thinking to shoot Arrows at them; and had indeed done so, if Horatius and Herminius had not happily arriv'd. For, as Lovers know their Mistresses at a greater distance than others, they were no sooner upon the Bank of the River, but they knew Clelia and Valeria. Which sight so surpris'd them, that they were thinking to cast themselves into the River, to go and meet them; but this first sentiment being pass'd, reason caus'd them to take some Boats which were there to go meet these couragious Ladies, most of whom were so weary that they receiv'd this succour with joy. In the interim the Souldiers who had guarded these fair Romans, having given the Alarm all about, the Bank of the River was in an instant beset with an innumerable multitude of Souldiers on the side of the Camp, that of the City was as much throng'd with the Inhabitants. Now because these fair Virgins were not in condition to go through the Streets, Horatius and Herminius led them to a house standing near the side of the River, where they dry'd themselves and chang'd their clothes for others which they sent for from their Parents houses. After which, they all went to the first Consul, to give an account of their escape, and to desire him to inform the Senate of it. But they were follow'd with an incredible throng of people, who by this time knowing Clelia was she that undertook this adventurous action for the preservation of her honour, gave her a thousand praises, and extoll'd her above all the Heroes of Antiquity. When Publicola beheld this fair company arrive, he was surpriz'd at it; for though the rumour of it was brought to him before, yet he did not believe what was told him. Clelia, as principal of the enterprize, went formost, and assoon as she saw Publicola, My Lord (said she to him) if that which my companions and I have done seem unreasonable to you, I conjure you to lay the blame only upon me, for they have done no more but followed me; and if the Senate conceive me culpable, I am ready to undergo such punishment as shall seem good to them to inflict upon me; for I dread neither pains nor death, I fear nothing but infamy. After this Valeria beginning to speak, inform'd Publicola of the violence intended by Sextus, and omitted nothing that might serve to justifie the action which they had done. Your fact is so glorious (answer'd Publicola, speaking to Clelia) that were it unjust, it would nevertheless deserve to be eternally commended; nothing undoubtedly being more heroical, than to preserve one's honour with the hazard of death. But since you have acted for yours, you must suffer Rome to act also for hers, and therefore I enjoyn you all to stay here till the Senate have deliberated upon the action which you have done.

Then Publicola leaving them to the charge of Domitia, gave order that the Senate should be extraordinarily assembled. In the mean time Clelius, Sulpitia, Octavius, Racilia, Flavia, Salonina, Artemidorus, Themistus, Merigenes, Æmilius, Spurius, Acrisius, Sicinius, Damon, and all the relations of these fair virgins, came to visit them, every one making a complement to them according to their humor or inclination, and all extolling Clelia with a kind of contest. Horatius was extreme joyful in this occasion, and found such pleasure in the glory of his Mistress, that he had not greater when he perform'd that grand action of the Sublician Bridge. He fanci'd that Clelia's leaping into Tyber as he had done, was a happy presage to him; and it was some delight to him, to think that Clelia fled from a place where Aronces was. But if his own thoughts gave him hope, the looks and words of Clelia gave him none at all: but on the contrary having spoken a moment with her apart, he found her mind still firmer to her old resolution. At least, Madam (said he to her) do not make me unhappy before the time, leave Fortune to act as she pleases, and act your self as you are minded; but do not forbid me to hope that perhaps you will one day find your self forc'd by destiny not to hate me. All humane prudence can foresee nothing, three days ago you would not have believ'd you could have attempted to cross the Tyber without a Boat, and nevertheless you have done it with an heroical magnanimity. 'Tis true (answer'd she) none can foresee their own actions; but such as are prudent, prudent, cannot and ought not to change their ſentiments. Nevertheleſs (reply'd he) 'tis frequently requiſite to conform our ſelves to matters according to the time. As for ſuch Wiſdom (anſwer'd Clelia) I renounce it with all my heart: that which is juſt once, is always ſo; I never ceaſe to love that which I love; and even the infidelity and death of Aronces ſhall never cauſe my heart to change. I ſay more (added ſhe) for ſuppoſing what is abſolutely impoſſible, that I could ceaſe to love Aronces, and have ſuch an affection for you as you deſire, you would not be the happier for it; for a pure ſentiment of honour would hinder me from expreſſing any thing of it, and I ſhould die a thouſand times rather than do any thing that might make me liable to the reproach, that I lov'd twice in my life. But, Horatius, matters are not in theſe terms; and I ſpeak to you as I do, only to put you out of all hope, and ſo to oblige you to be hereafter contented with my eſteem and friendſhip. Alas! Madam (ſaid he to her) if you could but ceaſe to love Aronces, I ſhould not want much of being happy: for I conceive it not poſſible that a heart diſengaged from all paſſion could reſiſt mine. Have I not told you (anſwer'd ſhe) that though I ſhould love you (which yet can never happen) you would not be the leſs miſerable? Ha! Madam (reply'd Horatius) if you lov'd me, you would be no longer Miſtreſs of your own ſentiments, but ſpeak after another manner. But, alas! I am not yet ſo happy, and perhaps never ſhall.

Whilſt Horatius was ſpeaking thus to Clelia, Herminius was converſing with Valeria; but for his unhappineſs, it was in the preſence of Æmilius and Spurius. Plotina was alſo importun'd by Sicinius, Acriſius, and Damon. As for Octavius, he addreſs'd to Hermilia, who though ſhe did not receive him rigorouſly, yet ſhe gave him greater cauſe of deſpair than if ſhe had been more ſevere: for after divers paſſionate expreſſions which he us'd to her, To teſtifie to you that I eſteem you (anſwer'd Hermilia) I will diſcover to you my real ſentiments. I confeſs then, that conſidering things according to the courſe of the World in general, it would be very advantagious for me if I could love you; and the illuſtrious and unfortunate Brutus would no doubt have judg'd your affection very glorious to me; for that your Birth is noble, you have wit, courage and virtue; but, generous Octavius, having loſt the Prince of Pometia, whom all the world knows I did not hate, I cannot, I ought not to love any hereafter. When a Lover is loſt by his own inconſtancie, I conceive in proceſs of time another may be admitted; but when a faithful Lover is loſt by death, fidelity ought to be reſerv'd to his aſhes, and never any thing lov'd but his Memory. Theſe, Octavius, are my true ſentiments; you know in what manner I have loſt an illuſtrious Brother and an illuſtrious Lover, help me to lament them, and I promiſe you all my friendſhip; but deſire nothing more of me. Had the Gods heard my vows, I ſhould have miſcarri'd in croſſing the Tyber; but though I did nothing toward ſaving my ſelf, the too-kind River bore me up whether I would or no. For my part (ſaid Plotina, who overheard theſe laſt words) I aſſure you I neglected nothing to preſerve my life, and certainly I muſt needs love honour and Clelia ardently, to have indanger'd my ſelf as I did: but however, I do not wonder to ſee ſo many brave Warriors (added ſhe) for no doubt example ſerves much to beget courage; at leaſt, I know, if I had been all alone, I ſhould not have had the power to put my ſelf into the Tyber, without other help than a pitiful plank to which I was faſtned: but when I beheld my ſiſter courageouſly leap into the water, without plank or hurdle, Valeria as reſolutely follow her, and Hermilia haſten to do ſo too, I would not be the laſt, but left Collatina the honour to bring up the rear. 'Tis true (anſwer'd that fair Virgin) I was the ſloweſt, but I aſſure you, the reaſon which you imagine, was not the cauſe of it, but rather for that I was not unwilling the generous Souldier who did us ſuch good ſervice, might be near me when I enter'd into the water. I perceive (ſaid Plotina) neither the love of Honour nor the greatneſs of danger do deprive you of your judgment. I am leſs aſtoniſht at that (ſaid Valeria) than to ſee that nothing abates your joy. I aſſure you (anſwer'd Plotina agreeably) that the joy which appears this day in my words is an habitual joy, wherein my heart is not much concern'd. Whilſt theſe fair Virgins were diſcourſing thus together, Domitia told them ſeveral times, it would be beſt for them to betake themſelves to ſleep; but they had too great a deſire to know what the determination of the Senate would be. And indeed it was a matter extraordinary and important enough, to make them curious and ſolicitous about it.

When the Senate was aſſembled, Publicola faithfully reported the buſineſs as he underſtood it from Clelia and her Companions; he highly commended the courage of theſe generous Virgins, and eſpecially of Clelia, who attempted ſo daring an action. Then he added, that the people being much taken with extraordinary adventures, would declare themſelves for Clelia; and that as he paſs'd the ſtreets, he obſerv'd they approv'd what this generous Lady had done. After which, it belongs to us (ſaith he) to conſider what we have to do, both for the good of the Commonwealth, and for our own honour; for though I have a daughter amongſt thoſe who have certainly offended Porſenna, yet I am not backward to declare, that for preſerving the Publick-faith, it is requiſite to remand them to him again. Some Senators leſs generous than Publicola, who had daughters or Kinſwomen amongſt theſe Hoſtages, decry'd it as cruelty to ſend theſe Virgins again under the power of an incens'd Prince, who was capable of putting his own Son to death. But Publicola anſwer'd, that events ought to be left to the will of the Gods, and that in all caſes our duty is to be perform'd. Which advice of Publicola prevailing, the Senate ordain'd that theſe twenty fair Virgins ſhould be ſent back to Porſenna, to whom the true caſe of their eſcape ſhould be manifeſted, thereby to oblige him to guard them more carefully: but it was however reſolv'd too, that a Statue on Horſe-back ſhould be erected to Clelia in the high part of the Sacred ſtreet. Even Clelius himſelf though much afflicted to ſee Clelia return to the Camp, was of opinion that ſhe ſhould be remitted thither. But as for Horatius and Herminius, they would not deliver their minds in this occaſion, being unable to determine to ſay any thing that might intrench upon their honour or their love.

When the Aſſembly was broke up, Publicola return'd to his own houſe, follow'd by Horatius and Herminius; as he was entring in, he ſaw Amilcar amongſt theſe fair Romans, who came from the Camp, and inform'd him that Porſenna being exaſperated by Tarquin, Tullia, and Sextus, was in a high indignation at the action of Clelia, that the next day he would ſend Embaſſadors to redemand the Hoſtages, and that if they

they were refus'd to him, he had ſworn to break the Peace and deſtroy Rome. Amilcar added, that Porſenna imagin'd Clelia did this action only out of fear leſt ſhe ſhould be forc'd to tell what ſhe knew concerning the pretended Crime of Aronces, and that all things therefore deſerved to be carefully examin'd. He added too, that it was a very great unhappineſs for Aronces that Mutius was abſent. Amilcar ſpoke this to Publicola in the preſence of theſe twenty fair Virgins who with much impatience expected that the firſt Conſul ſhould inform them of the deliberation of the Senate. But they were aſtoniſht to hear two ſuch different reſults; for Publicola firſt told them what honour the Senate had done to Clelia; and then (which increas'd their wonder) that it behov'd them to reſolve to return to the Camp the next day. At the firſt News Clelia caſt down her eyes out of modeſty; but at the ſecond, ſhe bluſht out of indignation; nevertheleſs, having conſider'd the Publick-intereſt which caus'd the Senate to act ſo, ſhe recollected her ſelf, and beginning to ſpeak, We muſt obey, my Companions (ſaid ſhe looking upon them) and if I find my ſelf in danger of a new unhappineſs, inſtead of flight I will have recourſe to death, and never ingage you to follow me. Clelia ſpoke this with ſo reſolute and generous an aſpect, that all who beheld her, judg'd ſhe deſerv'd greater honour than the Senate had decreed to her. Horatius's affection receiv'd new flames hereby; for if beauty produces love, 'tis only virtue which preſerves and augments it long after its production. However becauſe Clelia was willing to avoid Horatius, and perceiv'd her Companions and her ſelf needed reſt, they retir'd into the ſeveral Apartments which were prepar'd for them; for, being they were to depart early the next morning, to return to the Camp, they would not ſeparate themſelves: wherefore though the houſe Publicola now dwelt in, was not ſo ſtately as that which formerly he ſo generouſly deſtroy'd, nevertheleſs, theſe fair Virgins were well enough accommodated in it. But before they retir'd, Clelia inquir'd of Amilcar concerning Aronces, and underſtood by his anſwer that he had none but unwelcome News to tell her of him; ſo that ſhe withdrew with Valeria in the greateſt melancholy in the world. Come (ſaid ſhe to her) let us go prepare our ſelves to dye, and perhaps to ſee the unfortunate Aronces put to death. After which, ſhe went into the Chamber which was provided for her, leaving Amilcar ſpeaking to Plotina and Ceſonia; but ſhe went with ſo deep a ſadneſs upon her countenance, that it excited grief in all that beheld it.

CLELIA

The Fifth and last Part.

BOOK III.

LOVERS scarce ever forbear to speak of their passion to their Mistresses when they find opportunity for it; wherefore Clelia was no sooner retir'd, but Amilcar seeing himself alone with Plotina and Cesonia, us'd such discourse to them as sufficiently manifested the sentiments of his heart. I know well (said he to Plotina) I am requir'd by reason to leave you, but for my consolation I will go pass the evening with Cesonia, that I may speak of you, and that with a person who loves you. For my part (said she to him) I am so weary by having watch'd so long and pass'd over the Tyber without a Boat, that I dare not promise you the like; for how melancholy soever all my companions are, I believe they are so sleepy, that should I desire to speak of you, I should find none to hear me. But dispense with me at this time, even for thinking on you; for sleep has the priviledge to make us forget every thing, without a crime. However (said Amilcar) permit Cesonia to tell me all which I desire to know concerning you. I consent to it (answer'd she as she was going away) but take heed your curiosity give you not more trouble than pleasure; and besides it is not incident to persons addicted to jollity to have great adventures; but all extraordinary events are reserved for the melancholick. Assoon as Plotina had said this, she follow'd her companions, and Amilcar went with Cesonia. When he came into the Chamber of this amiable Lady, he pray'd her she would please to relate to him all she knew of the adventures of Plotina's life. As for her birth (said he) I know it already; but that which I earnestly desire of you, is the History of her heart; that is, in one word (added he) I would know by whom Plotina has been lov'd, and whether she ever lov'd any person much. Being Plotina has permitted me to content your curiosity (answer'd Cesonia) I will do it, and the rather because I have no great number of events to relate to you, and I am well inform'd of all that has pass'd in Plotina's heart. And so Cesonia giving order for none to disturb her, began in these terms to speak to Amilcar, who dispos'd himself to hear with extraordinary attention.

The History of Plotina.

WHereas you know already how Plotina believ'd her self Niece of that wise Friend of Clelius (whose name is Rutilius) and accounted his Wife, Ersilia, her Aunt; I need only tell you that my Mother's house (for my Father was deceas'd) was next to that of Rutilius, and that there was a great friendship between Ersilia and she to whom I owe my life. I will not detain you with describing the manners, customs, or gallantry of Ardea, being I conceive you may easily judge there cannot but be very commendable people in the place where Plotina could become such as you see her. For it must be said to her glory, she ows none of her perfections to Rome. Besides, I remember Plotina related my adventures to you heretofore; and so I doubt not but she told you, our City was built by Danae, though some conceive it was a Son of Ulysses and Circe that founded it: but this last opinion has no other ground, but that as Ulysses was very eloquent, and Circe well skill'd in the knowledge of all the Vertues of Herbs, so they speak more politely at Ardea than in any other City, and better understand the good or bad qualities of all Plants. I know also she told you that since the shower of gold Jupiter made use of, such women as affect glory accept nothing from a gallant in which there is gold; and that for magnificence, elegancy of manners and gallantry, it exceeds all other places in Italy; and that Poetry and Painture are more in request and famous there. This being suppos'd, I am to tell you, that Plotina has always been so amiable, that assoon as she was six years old, her wit was spoken of with admiration. She us'd to speak a thousand surprising and ingenious things, and that with all the graces of childhood, and with so charming an air, that it was not possible to see her without loving her. Though I was two years elder, I could not live without seeing her; all her answers were pleasant, innocent and witty, every thing in them was natural, and she spoke nothing but of her self. She had a quick fancy and a sprightly wit, she danc'd gracefully even before she learnt; and whatever she did, it was becoming and pleasing. As she was one day in a Temple, where the whole History of Danae is admirably represented, and beheld the golden shower falling into the Tower where Danae was inclos'd, she ask'd what the meaning of it was. Herfilia telling her that Jupiter being become amorous of Danae transform'd himself into that precious rain for her sake, that so he might get to see her; she said this invention did not please her. Because (added she) it would have been a better course, for Jupiter to have imploy'd his gold to corrupt those that guarded Danae; and then he might have appear'd with the more grace before his Mistress. Another time, observing one Cupid represented with a Torch in his hand, and another with a Bow, she was askt which of the two she lov'd best: at first she said, she lov'd neither one nor other, as all children use to do. But when she was press'd to tell which of them she thought to be the most dangerous, she answer'd immediately, I fear him that burns more than him that wounds; for I have heard a shot with an Arrow may be cur'd, but if my heart were reduc'd into ashes, I believe there would be no remedy for it. I could tell you a hundred more pleasant things of Plotina's childhood if I would, but 'tis best not to insist upon them. Yet I cannot but tell you something of a conversation which we had together when she was about twelve or thirteen years of age, and how impatient she was to be no longer treated as a child by them which discours'd with her. For my part, my dear Cesonia (said she to me one day as we return'd from a great Feast) I am so weary of being a little Girle, that I wish I could have bought the two years by which you exceed me, with the ten last of my life. I assure you (said I to her) I account your place better than mine; and in reference to years, 'tis better to be preceded than to precede others: for you will infallibly be fifteen years old if you live, and I am pass'd being thirteen any longer. For my part (answer'd she with a pretty discontent) I was a thousand times more happy when I was but six, for I did not care then in what manner I was treated. I play'd with a thousand little trifles, and provided I were not hungry, sleepy, chidden, or too much instructed to have a good carriage, I was the merriest person in the World. But now I am thirteen years of age, and to my unhappiness have my reason of seventeen years at least. I am displeas'd almost with every thing, and I see scarce any people whom I do not hate. But wherefore do you hate them? (said I to her) all the World commends you, caresses you, and speaks to you. 'Tis true (answer'd she) but all the World commends, caresses, and speaks to me as to a child. So that I had rather a thousand times, be neither commended nor caressed, nor that any person would speak to me. But, I beseech you (said I to her) what are really your discontents? In the first place (answer'd she) all men I meet with are nothing but Fortune-tellers concerning me, foretelling the future, but speaking not the least word of the present. All the Girls which are but sixteen years old, scarce take any notice of me at all. Assoon as I come into any place with Hersilia, they speak of giving me some edibles to employ me with, and think I would be displeas'd if I did not eat; and as for men, they, as I told you, do nothing but make predictions of me; though these are the most civil, for the others, minding their affairs, look upon me as a little child, to whom they know not what to say. But who are these Fortune-tellers? (said I to her, laughing, and pretending not to understand her.) All men which I know and which you know (answer'd she:) yesterday Turnus, only seeing me enter into your house, cry'd, Ha! she will be a dangerous Lass one day. Periander the other day said in my presence, I would certainly be very handsome, when I became a little more fatter and taller. Lycastes added, I would shortly be of a handsome stature; Martius, that when I came to have my Neck longer, I would be much more charming; Livius, that assoon as I knew I was handsome, I would be infinitely more amiable; and my Mother also, speaking of me to her particular Friends, says sometimes, I shall one day be witty if I will; so that all my charms are in the future. But if these Prognostications (added she) speak true, and that I prove terrible, hereafter, unless they be dead of age before, I will make them all dye of love, and so ill treat them, that I will be fully reveng'd on them for the little care they have at present to please me. If I be not deceiv'd (said I to her) it will one day be in your power to revenge your self. Well (answer'd she hastily) do not you make Predictions of me too as well as the rest. Thereupon I laught heartily at the choler I had put Plotina into unawares; for indeed she never lov'd that kind of commendation which regarded only the time to come. You may judge by what I tell you that Plotina had a forward wit, and was already very agreeable. But in a little time she made it appear sufficiently, and most of those that had made such advantageous predictions were in a condition to speak to her only of the present time, and of the torments her beauty caus'd them to suffer.

This passage (said Amilcar interrupting her) puts me into the greatest fear in the world; for I am ready to dye out of conceit that you are going to tell me Plotina has been lov'd by many more deserving persons than my self; and I am afraid too, you will inform me she has lov'd some one of my Rivals more than she loves me.

Do not fear so much as you pretend (answer'd Cesonia) lest I tell you Plotina has had more worthy Lovers than your self; and for the rest, you may judge what you ought to believe of it, when I come to the end of my relation. I shall therefore proceed to tell you (added she) that the merit of Plotina soon made a great report, and she saw all those makers of predictions speak to her only of the time present. Yet it must be said to the honour of Plotina that she did not suffer her self to be dazled with the applause of the World, but with very great modesty receiv'd the first praises that were given her. And indeed she was very debonair without folly, pleasant without extravagance, young without imprudence, witty without pride, and handsome without affectation. Then it was that I began to converse with her as with a true Friend; I first intrusted little trifling secrets to her, and perceiving she us'd them discreetly, I imparted to her the greatest secrets I had in my heart. Whereby our friendship became so great and intimate, that in speaking of us people were many times pleas'd to mention us by the name of the two Friends. At that time there were very many worthy persons at Ardea; for besides Turnus, Periander, and divers others, there were three of undoubted merit. The first was named Martius, the second Lycastes, and the third Clorantus. This last has a noble, but very sweet and civil aspect, though sometimes his air seem a little cold and careless. He has brown hair, a very handsome head, somewhat a long visage, a pale complexion, black and small eyes, but nevertheless his looks are very ingenious, and even his silence speaks him such; for in discourse, he hears, like one who admirably well understands that which is spoken to him, and who could speak more than he does. All his deportments are such as become a man of his quality, and his mind is perfectly fram'd for converse with the world: he loves ingenious compositures, and their Authors; he has a melancholy aspect, and nevertheless loves all pleasures. His Soul is naturally passionate; and though the outside of his person and his mind speak him one of those faithful Lovers which the world so rarely affords, yet he is always a serious wanton, or if you will, a tolerable inconstant; for no doubt some are not such. However he maintains confidently that he is faithful, because he says he never deserted any woman who gave him not cause of complaint. He is one of those who account it no infidelity to make little affections occasionally by the by, which arise in their heart during their greater passions. But this is constantly true, where he loves, he loves ardently, he minds nothing but his passion, he is very inclinable to jealousie, jealousie, he resents the least unpleasing things with a strange vehemence; and, in fine, is acquainted with the greatest delights and the extremest rigours of love. As for Martius, he was a man who lov'd very passionately, was incapable of relinquishing one Mistress to love another, but whose affections could only abate by time. He was very handsome, infinitely ingenious, and endu'd with a pleasing kind of wit. And then for Lycastes, he was a very agreeable person, but he was naturally so inconstant, that it was reckon'd amongst the wonders of Love, if any one could engage him to love constantly once in his life. Being we were known to all the virtuoso's of Ardea, and there were few in the City more consider'd than Plotina, and I, we were present at all the Gallant Feasts which were made. One was made at that time in honour of Circe, who is termed Goddess in Homer, in which were represented divers of those prodigious transformations which are attributed to her, and in which Plotina appear'd so charming, that her beauty and debonarity made the discourse of all persons. That day she made two remarkable conquests, which caus'd her to be call'd for some time after the new Circe. For she who sometimes wrought such extraordinary changes by the vertue of simples whose proprieties she so admirably understood, never did any more deserving wonder. But to manifest this, you must know, that till that time Lycastes had made publick profession of being inconstant, and that Martius had formerly been very amorous of a very fair Lady by whom he was also lov'd; yet afterwards according to the general course of the world, it was believ'd this passion was grown so temperate, that it could be call'd love no longer without doing him a favour. So that when she was dead, he appear'd very much afflicted first, but suffer'd himself to be comforted by time and his Friends; and indeed it was thought he lamented her rather like a Friend than a Lover. 'Tis true, after her death he had not appear'd amorous; yea, he seem'd very indifferent; but at length on the day of this famous Feast of Circe, Lycastes and Martius ceas'd to be what they had been before; that is, the first learnt to love constantly, and the other ceas'd to be insensible, and began to love again. But such beginnings of love being usually not so discernible as to be known the first moment they attaeque the heart, Lycastes and Martius did not believe they could be very amorous of Plotina, and their Friends perceiv'd it before themselves. Now Plotina being of a free and merry humor, these two Lovers were sufficiently at a loss for an occasion to give her seriously to understand they lov'd her, when they perceiv'd it: for she so handsomly put off all that they said to her, that it might seem their love was nothing but a piece of Gallantry, in which their hearts were unconcern'd. But at length they found that they lov'd ardently. For their passion began to manifest it self by jealousie: they could no longer endure one another but with trouble, they minded nothing but Plotina and how to please her. They frequented none but her, abandon'd all their acquaintances, and in brief had nothing but their passions in their heads. On the other side, Plotina having always been averse to Marriage, and now unwilling to commit a criminal Gallantry, did certainly all she could to deprive these two Lovers utterly of hope: but this rigour augmented their love in stead of diminishing it. Wherefore Plotina being loth to trouble her self longer to no purpose, left them to follow their own inclinations, without being kind or favourable, or considering one more than the other. Yet one day she gave Lycastes a severe check in the presence of Martius, Persander, and Lucia (who is a very amiable Lady) for she profess'd it absolutely impossible for her to love a Lover that has been inconstant. If any of those rambling Lovers (answer'd Lycastes) should become a faithful adorer of you, wherefore would you not love him, provided he have otherwise desert? Because (reply'd she hastily) that which has hapned once may happen a hundred times, and nothing would be more insupportable to me than to be abandon'd by a man to whom I had given permission to love me. Therefore, not to venture that mischief, 'tis best avoid giving it to any: for the world is so full of inconstant Lovers who dissemble fidelity, that it is easie to be mistaken. Plotina spoke this with an air that intimated to Lycastes, it would be a hard matter for him to win her heart. Nevertheless, he found he had so well shaken off his old inconstancy, and that he should love Plotina faithfully, that he hop'd time would mollifie her. For my part, I confess my inclination then led me to favour Lycastes; and though Martius was a very worthy, handsome, and agreeable person, yet I was more concern'd for his Rival. But I perceiv'd one day Plotina was not of the same mind, but had a little more inclination for Martius than for Lycastes. However, she carefully conceal'd it; but for all her care, not only I, but Lucia, Lycastes's Kinswoman and Friend perceiv'd it too. This person had formerly seem'd an intimate friend of Martius's Mistress, she saw the beginning, progress, and end of this love, in which she had an interest, which I shall tell you presently. As we were both one day with Plotina, we hapned unwittingly to speak of the power of inclination. For my part (said Plotina) I do not believe it so powerful as 'tis reported, at least I am perswaded I never yet lov'd any thing without reason. You believe this (answer'd Lucia smiling) and yet at the same time I am speaking to you, your inclination prepossesses your reason, to the disadvantage of one of my friends. Perhaps, 'tis yours (reply'd she) which is prepossels'd. If you will let Cesonia be judge (said Lucia) I will explain my self more clearly. I assure you (said I to them both) I am very equitable. 'Tis a great vanity in you to believe your self so (answer'd Plotina) for I know nothing more difficult than to please others and ones self too, and 'tis observable that such as speak best of Justice are usually most unjust. But I beseech you, why do you accuse me of suffering my self to be prepossessed by my inclination? Is it not true (said Lucia) that I have heard you say a hundred times, you could never endure the affection of a man that has been inconstant? I confess it (answer'd she) and 'tis for that reason I am not mov'd with the merit of your Kinsman, and never shall be. But wherefore (said Lucia) will you suffer Martius more favourably? I assure you (answer'd Plotina) I do not treat Martius much better than Lycastes: but if I did, I could maintain it were out of reason and not through inclination; for Martius has never been inconstant. Martius never inconstant? (reply'd Lucia hastily) Ha! Plotina, you are but badly skill'd in inconstancy, if you believe as you say; for I maintain on the contrary, that that inconstancy, which Martius may be reproacht with, is more criminal than that whereof Lycastes has been accus'd before he lov'd you. But I do not remember (said I then to Lucia) I ever heard it ſaid that Martius lov'd any perſon but Plotina, ſince the death of Lyſimira, of whom he was ſo amorous, and who was indeed infinitely amiable. 'Tis true (anſwer'd Lucia) but after Martius had lov'd that amiable perſon five or ſix years, and receiv'd a thouſand teſtimonies of innocent affection from her, he came by degrees to have only ſo luke-warm an amity for her, that ſhe is dead with grief, although he was not perfidious to her, but preſerv'd his formalities to her. Perhaps (reply'd Plotina) that perſon as lovely as ſhe was, had ſome bad humor, which caus'd the Love in Martius's heart to be extinguiſh'd: but though it were not ſo, yet I ſhould not conclude that Martius ought to be call'd inconſtant; for 'tis ſo ordinary to ſee time abate Love, that I ſtill make a great difference between Lycaſtes and Martius. For my part (ſaid I) I confeſs I term all changing, inconſtancy; and 'tis a miſtake not to call any inconſtant but ſuch as love ſeveral perſons. For is not that luke-warmneſs which comes after an ardent love, a kind of inconſtancy? and is it not ſufficient to deſerve the name of inconſtant, if we ceaſe to love that which we once affected? I know not very well whether you have reaſon and I am miſtaken (anſwer'd Plotina) but I know well, I do not regard Martius and Lycaſtes alike. That's it (reply'd Lucia) you are unjuſt in. Should you ſay (added ſhe) Martius is more ingenious, deſerving, and agreeable, I ſhould be patient; but to treat Lycaſtes ill for inconſtancy, and to ſuffer Martius, who ceas'd to love one of the moſt charming perſons in the world, is a thing which I cannot approve. But Lycaſtes (ſaid Plotina) has forſaken a hundred. I grant it (anſwer'd Lucia) but ſhould he have forſaken a thouſand, he would be leſs culpable than Martius who has deſerted but one. For Lycaſtes never did more than begin to love, till now; his heart no ſooner inclin'd on one ſide, but it was ſway'd to the other by ſome new inclination; wherefore having promis'd ſcarce any thing, nor lov'd long enough to cauſe himſelf to be lov'd, his inconſtancy ſeems to be free from a Crime, though it may be referr'd to levity. But as for Martius, he lov'd, divers years together, he was lov'd again, and that ardently, and poſſeſs'd her heart whom he lov'd. A thouſand reſpects ought to have faſtned the tyes of his affection; and nevertheleſs, without cauſe, reaſon, or pretext, his paſſion has ceas'd to be paſſionate; that which formerly delighted him no longer affects him, his Miſtreſs is ſcarce his friend; and ſo changing his ſentiments without any extrinſecal cauſe, he becomes in my opinion, the moſt criminal of all inconſtants. But, perhaps you will except, that he was not lov'd correſpondently as he lov'd; to prove what the paſſion of that unfortunate Beauty was, read, I beſeech you, an Elegy, which that charming perſon made under feigned names, during a ſhort abſence of this Martius whom you would excuſe. And that you may judge her more paſſionate, know, that after Martius had given a thouſand teſtimonies of Love for ſeveral years, and receiv'd as many from that incomparable perſon, he came by degrees to have an unequal Love (if I may ſo ſpeak) that is, to do things ſometimes which denoted a violent paſſion, and ſometimes others which might make him ſuſpected of having almoſt an indifference in his ſentiments. Yet he lov'd her all this while, and ſometimes even unto fury; but after all, there were times in which his paſſion lay hid, and wherein he was willing to find occaſion to complain. During one of thoſe intervals of his Love and his abſence, the Elegy I am going to repeat to you was made.

ELEGY.

HEnce, diſmal melancholy from my breaſt,
Which haſt too long my quiet diſpoſſeſt.
Thoſe pangs I feel, I can no longer bear:
My pleaſures paſt but cauſe my preſent fear.
And my afflicted Soul, ſince hope is gone,
Sees and preſages nought but griefs to come;
Griefs, which diſtract me, and continue ſtill
To murder daily what they cannot kill.
Love! cruel Love! the ſource of all my tears;
Unhappy they in whom thy power appears.
But happy he, in whoſe untroubled breaſt
No ſtorms of Love diſturb his Halcyon reſt;
Not bleſt with pleaſures, yet ſecure from woe,
And jealouſie and rage that with it go.
We ſhould not then by dear experience ſee,
What fits of heat and cold in Love there be;
How near the brink of death and dire deſpair, Th'imagin'd ſweets of Love and pleaſure are:
Nor thoſe eternal torments ſhould we know,
Which who leaſt merits moſt ſhall undergo.
'Tis true, a ſad and cold indifference
Makes us behold the World with negligence;
That without love there no deſires can be,
Without deſires too, no felicitie.
That even with fortune we are drunk; and cloy'd
With plenty, which by ſurfeit is enjoy'd.
But 'tis a poor and deſpicable grief,
So light, from tears it ſeeks for no relief.
Slight cares, which the wild notes of birds allay,
And purling ſtreams that o'er the pebbles play.
But yet that jewel liberty is kept,
And the lull'd Soul of too quick ſenſe bereft.
The headlong paſſions huſh'd in careleſs dreams,
Fall from the force of their too fierce extremes.
Then 'tis the pleaſure of the day's our own,
The glorious Sun, and all he ſhines upon.
But yet is this a life depriv'd of love;
And can the Soul a greater torment prove,
Than not to love, or not belov'd to be,
And all its paſſions circumſcrib'd to ſee
Within it ſelf? without the joy to know
The price of ſighs and tears that gently flow,
Of amorous regards and thouſand charms
That change to pleaſures, griefs moſt fierce alarms?
Ev'n ſorrows have their pleaſures, tears their time
Of joy: Vain Fools, that think ſweet love a crime.
A conſtant love will ſtill a'vertue be.
Then let us Daphnis ſtill affect, though he
All cool and temperate, with equal fires,
Meets not my flames; my more refin'd deſires
Feed on thoſe pleaſures which my love inſpires.
Wretch that I am! but is it juſt my love
On ſwifter meaſure than his paſſion move?
Suffering ſuch ills his careleſs heart can ne'er
Reſent, that heart which ought thoſe ills to ſhare:
Whom duty binds for me alone to live,
And no juſt cauſe for my complaints to give.
He that a thouſand ſolemn Oaths hath ſwore,
He knew no bliſs, but only to adore;
That time and age ſhould find him ſtill the ſame,
His heart for ever burning in my flame;

Nor

Nor ſhould his paſſion ever know an end,
Or any elſe to love ſo well pretend:
Yet this ingrate my abſence can ſupport,
Whilſt my weak ſpirit makes its laſt effort,
To bear his want; would he my ſorrows weigh,
Obdurate as he is, he could not ſtay.
But judging Eliſmena's heart by his,
He ne'er can underſtand her miſeries.
Inſenſible, he never feels my woe,
Though yet, methinks, he cannot chuſe but know
The griefs I bear; careleſs of my complaint,
Perhaps he makes a Court to ſome new Saint.
His abſence ſhews he muſt inconſtant be;
That day, kind powers, let me never ſee.
Obliging fate firſt end my days, before
I hear the perjur'd Daphnis loves no more.
Away fond jealouſie; he cannot prove
A faithleſs lover to a faithful love.
An amorous heart can ne'er forego its chains;
Since for his ſake I ſuffer amorous pains.
Daphnis, my cauſleſs jealouſie forgive.
Daphnis for me, and I for him do live.
Our faith ſhall late poſterity approve,
And ours ſhall be the meaſure of their love.
Yet (ſpight of hope) ſuſpicion and deſpair,
By turns my hearts divided Empire ſhare.
But ſtill thoſe chagrins, doubts, deſpair, and fears,
Injurious words, hard thoughts, and ſighs and tears
Are loves effects, and with one voice they cry, Daphnis, for thee, Daphnis, for thee I dye.

Aſſoon as Lucia had done repeating theſe Verſes to Plotina, Ha! Lucia (ſaid this amiable Virgin) if you think you have hurt Martius by repeating theſe Verſes to me, you are miſtaken; for, I find them ſo dear and paſſionate, that I am perſwaded he that could inſpire a very excellent perſon with ſuch amorous ſentiments, muſt needs be ſuch himſelf, and one that knows how to love; for ſuch Verſes as theſe would never have been made for an indifferent. How? Plotina (cry'd Lucia) can you reaſon in this manner? and eſteem a man, who has been capable of changing his ſentiments, and having only a faint and languiſhing affection for a rare perſon whom he ardently lov'd, and by whom he was always dearly affected? For a perſon, I ſay, who had abſolutely given him her heart, and who (as you may ſee by the Verſes I have recited to you) had the moſt tender ſentiments in the world for this inconſtant Lover? Be it how it will (ſaid Plotina) I cannot place a Lover who ceaſes to have an ardent love, in the rank of inconſtants. If you account him not in that rank (anſwer'd Lucia) then you muſt reckon him amongſt the perfidious; for as I conceive, 'tis perfidiouſneſs to ceaſe to love a perſon who always loves you with the ſame ardency. For my part (ſaid I) I am perſwaded all change may be term'd inconſtancy; and though a man become not ſervant to another Miſtreſs, yet if he ceaſe to love the firſt without cauſe, he is inconſtant. I know not very well (reply'd Plotina) whether according to exact reaſon, that which you ſay be inconſtancy; but I know the cuſtome of the world calls ſuch a man as Lycaſtes unconſtant, who has lov'd ſeveral Miſtreſſes one after another, and ſometimes ſeveral together; but ſuch a one as Martius is not ſo term'd, who has only diminiſh'd his diligences. But would you like well (ſaid Lucia) that Martius ſhould ceaſe to love, after you had married him? I ſhould not (anſwer'd ſhe) but I conceive the Lovers who ceaſe to be ſuch after they have married their Miſtreſſes, are not always in fault; for indeed moſt women, when they are married, are negligent, refractory, and perverſe towards their husbands, and many times too guilty of levity and cauſleſs jealouſie. So that it is not to be wonder'd, if the husband finding them ſo different from what they were before marriage, change their ſentiments towards them. Flatter your ſelf, Plotina, flatter your ſelf (ſaid Lucia with ſome earneſtneſs) 'tis the cuſtome of all fair and young perſons to believe their charms will have more power than thoſe of others; but let me tell you once more, Martius is an inconſtant perſon, and more dangerous than Lycaſtes. In truth, Lucia (anſwer'd Plotina) I do not much fear either of them, for marriage is ſo much fear'd by me, that I hope that thought will help me to defend my heart againſt the merit of theſe two Rivals, and I dare ſay too, againſt any light inclination I have for Martius.

Thus you ſee what Plotina's ſentiments were, and how ſhe defended Martius to the diſadvantage of Lycaſtes. In the mean time they both lov'd her extreme paſſionately; nevertheleſs, they durſt not declare it openly to her: but without having ſuch deſign, they did this office one for another, although there was now as great a ſecret hatred between them as there had been formerly friendſhip. For it hapned one day that theſe two Lovers were in a garden amongſt many other perſons of Quality, and both of them by the inſtinct of their affections endeavour'd to approach to Plotina: but Lucia meeting them fell into diſcourſe with Martius, that ſo ſhe might oblige Lycaſtes whoſe friend ſhe was. On the other ſide a Kinſwoman of Martius obſerving the cunning of Lucia, made as if ſhe had ſome important affair to ſpeak to Lycaſtes about; ſo that theſe two Rivals were alike unhappy for more than an hour; but at length Martius quitting himſelf ſomething rudely from the converſation of Lucia, came to find Plotina with whom I was walking and another of my Friends: but being the walk we were in was very narrow, Martius ſoon became alone with his Miſtreſs; for I ſtopt to entertain that friend I mention'd, though we ſtay'd ſtill in the ſame Walk. Plotina being of a very pleaſant humor, at firſt fell to tell Martius ſeveral divertiſing things ſhe had obſerv'd in the company. For my part (ſaid he maliciouſly to her) I have ſeen nothing more remarkable, than Lycaſtes ſo employ'd in ſpeaking to a friend of mine in a place where the amiable Plotina is preſent. But perhaps (anſwer'd ſhe ſmiling) Lycaſtes does not talk to your Friend, but your Friend to Lycaſtes. Be it how it will (reply'd Martius) if he lov'd you as much as he would have you believe, he would be as incivil to the Lady who entertains him, as I was but now to Lucia who held me in diſcourſe. But to ſpeak truth (added he) profeſſed inconſtants, ſuch as Lycaſtes, have no violent affections. But who told you Lycaſtes is in love with me? (demanded Plotina) I have not perceiv'd it. Being I know no perſon whatſoever (anſwer'd Martius) who does not or has not lov'd you, I ſuppoſe a man who is accuſtom'd to love, out of inconſtancy only, cannot fail but love the moſt charming perſon in the World. And moreover, amiable Plotina (added he) the eyes of a Rival, and a conſtant Rival, diſcover things much better than thoſe of other people. I aſſure you (reply'd ſhe making as if ſhe did not hear Martius)

I have not perceiv'd that Lycaſtes loves me more than the other Ladies he converſes with. However (anſwer'd Martius) I know if he does love, he will not love you very long, for it is not poſſible for him to love the ſame perſon any conſiderable time: and I remember I have heard he once writ to a Lady in the Countrey to deſire a private conference with her; but when the anſwer arriv'd, and permiſſion to go ſee and ſpeak with her in private was granted him, he had no longer any thing to ſay to her, becauſe he had chang'd his ſentiments towards her. Ha! Martius (cry'd Plotina, bluſhing, as if ſhe had been angry it could be believ'd that any one could not love her long) that which you ſay can never come to paſs.

I ne'er inſpire but an immortal love,
And ſuch, (if any) will Lycaſtes prove.

Then I am very miſerable, Madam (anſwer'd Martius) by being out of all hope ever to be cur'd of the ill which torments me. But where had you thoſe two Verſes which denounce to me not only that I ſhall love you as long as I live, but always have not one but a thouſand Rivals as dangerous as Lycaſtes? I aſſure you (reply'd ſhe) they came into my mind without thinking of them, and I ſpoke them unawares, for I would have you know (added ſhe, minding to turn the diſcourſe into railery) I do not at all pretend to Poetry, but to ſpeak truth, I could not allow you to believe that I cannot keep a heart when I have conquer'd it. And beſides (continued ſhe ſmiling) I take ſo little care in conquering them, that I am ſomething jealous of my power. After this, ſhe ſtood ſtill and call'd me; ſo Martius could diſcourſe with her no longer, but was oblig'd to go and entertain himſelf with other Ladies. By this time Lycaſtes, having diſengag'd himſelf from her that talkt with him, came to us, and that ſo opportunely, that Plotina going to paſs over a little Bridge which lay croſs a Brook, gave him her hand, and ſo he continued leading her afterwards. Being a perſon infinitely ingenious, and ſubtle to prejudice a Rival, I know not (ſaid he to Plotina looking upon her) whether the converſation you have had with Martius, was very diverting, but be talkt with you in a place, where what paſſion ſoever he has for you, he ought rather to have ſigh'd out of grief than love; for I have been told, that the firſt time the fair and charming perſon whom he deſtroy'd declar'd ſhe was very willing he ſhould love her, it was in this very place, where perhaps he entertain'd you with the love he has for you. I know not whether Martius loves me or no (anſwer'd Plotina) but I know how to make my ſelf ſo much reſpected as that none dare ſpeak any thing to me but what I am willing to hear. What? Madam (cry'd he) can you eternally hinder ſuch as adore you from declaring it to you? No, no, (added he) if Martius has not yet told you he loves you, he ought to have done it. But I confeſs to you, that to prove to you, that he knows how to love, it behov'd him to entertain you only with ſad diſcourſe in this place. I beſeech you (ſaid Plotina) tell me in what place of the World you have had opportunity to ſpeak of Love, and have not done it? you, I ſay, who are accus'd of having made a thouſand declarations of love! But, Madam (anſwer'd he) I have lov'd only women that did not love me; but as for Martius, he has been lov'd again, and lov'd conſtantly, and the abatement of his affection has caus'd the death of the perſon whom he lov'd ſo much. As for what you ſay (reply'd Plotina) that you have never been lov'd again, it is not much to be wonder'd at, for you do not give your Miſtreſſes leiſure to love you. Ha! As for you, amiable Plotina (cry'd he) I promiſe to give you all the leiſure you can deſire; for I perceive I ſhall love you as long as I live. If it be ſo (anſwer'd ſhe ſmiling) I ſhall not be much diſpleas'd, becauſe it will give me occaſion to revenge all thoſe that you have deſerted, and to manifeſt that there may be eternal rigour as well as eternal love. Plotina ſpoke this with a certain deriding air, which ſenſibly afflicted Lycaſtes, ſo that he could ſpeak to her no more all the reſt of the day, becauſe ſhe joyn'd and continued with the reſt of the company. After that time Martius and Lycaſtes neglected nothing which they thought fit to do, to pleaſe Plotina; yet they continu'd a civil reſpect one towards another, becauſe they knew ſhe deſir'd it, and nevertheleſs us'd all artifices to their mutual diſadvantage. Lycaſtes knowing Lucia had ſeveral Letters of Martius to his firſt Miſtreſs, and from her to him, importun'd her to ſhew them to Plotina, as ſhe had the Elegy before. And accordingly Lucia going to viſit her one afternoon, and finding her alone, acted ſo cunningly that ſhe made her curious to ſee the Letters ſhe pretended to have. I will ſhew you them (ſaid Lucia to Plotina) but if you profit no better by them than by the Elegy which you have ſeen already, no doubt I ſhall repent of it. For is there any thing more ignoble, than after the death of a perſon infinitely amiable, and infinitely vertuous, to ſee the moſt ſecret teſtimonies of her affection become publick through his negligence who receiv'd them? I confeſs (ſaid Plotina) if people could always think of being liable to this danger, they would never write any thing but what might be ſeen by all the World; but the miſchief, at the time ſuch obliging Letters are pen'd, they have ſo good an opinion of them to whom they are written, that they fear not the falling out of ſuch a miſadventure. There are ſome women no doubt who write all that they think, through the reaſon you mention (anſwer'd Lucia) but there are others, who out of natural imprudence and the deſire to have flattering and courting Letters, write not to one alone but to many men, and ſpend one half of their lives in writing Love-letters, and the other in receiving thoſe of their gallants. There are ſome too that know how to diſguiſe their hands ſeveral ways, and others who never write in their own, that ſo they may deny all when they pleaſe. As for theſe women (ſaid Plotina) I allow that their Letters be ſhewn to all the World, for certainly they are not worthy to be diſcreetly dealt withal. But as for a vertuous perſon, in whoſe heart is nothing but an innocent affection, 'tis inhumanity to publiſh ſuch things of theirs as may be ill interpreted. Yet this comes to paſs ſo frequently, that I think to refrain from writing any thing too kind, 'tis beſt to forbear to love; for prudence is not much liſtened to by ſuch as love, and diſtruſt is ſo contrary to perfect love, that ſcarce any thing which is not criminal can be refus'd to a perſon that is lov'd. I believe alſo, that the more an affection is innocent, the more the Letters are obliging; for they that rely on their own innocence, write with more liberty: therefore to avoid being expos'd to ſuch a great unhappineſs, and to forbear writing, it is requiſite for me (as I ſaid before) to keep my ſelf from loving. But that I may be confirm'd in this ſentiment (added ſhe) ſhew me in what manner Martius writ to Lyſimira, and how Lyſimira writ to Martius. I will

Madam

Madam (said Lucia) and the better to manifest to you how deceitful or inconstant men are, I will shew you Letters written at divers times, from Martius to Lysimira. See here then a Letter which Martius writ to Lysimira some time after she had permitted him to love her, and he had requested some slight favour of her which she refus'd him, at which he seem'd angry, and left her rudely. And so Lucia read to Plotina that which I am going to read to you, for I kept copies of all Martius's Letters, because they appear'd to me very amorous.

Martius to Lysimira.

I Do not defer, Madam, to acknowledge, repent of, and beseech your pardon for my fault, till you reproach me for it. I have offended, I confess, I am culpable, I cannot plead any thing in excuse of my capricio, but excess of love. For who am I, Madam, that I should not be contented that the divine Lysimira knows I love her, though she give me no testimony of an affection equal to my own? Have I deserv'd the other kindnesses you have had for me? would not a thousand persons of greater merit than I be satisfied with the condition you permit me to enjoy? Alas! I cannot deny it: But, I beseech you Madam, be not offended with me, and add not more rigorous and cruel punishments to those I cause to my self. If ever person lov'd more tenderly, more respectfully and more ardently than I, I am willing that you refuse the pardon to me which I desire of you: but since that cannot be, grant it me, Madam, and believe I shall with eternal fidelity own the command you have laid upon me to be faithful. Yet I cannot divine wherefore you recommended it more to me the other day than at any time before; but can you divine that I am more so this day, than ever I was in my life? when you tell me your secret, I will tell you mine. But, alas! whe shall I have the joy to speak to you? I know I shall this day have the honour to see you, but in a place where I can do nothing less than entertain you with my love. Pity me therefore, Madam, pity me, and imagine how great a torment it would be to you, if you were oblig'd to hide the most violent and innocent passion in the World.

I confess (said Plotina) Martius's Letter is very amorous, and 'tis hard to conceive how a man that writ in this manner, could cease to love without cause. See this other Letter (answer'd Lucia) for 'tis something more passionate than the first: and accordingly Plotina read this following.

Martius to Lysimira.

HOw I love you, Madam! what an amiable person you are! and from how great pains has your Letter of this morning deliver'd me! What can I do to repay you as much joy as it has given me? Tell me, Madam; for if no more but dying for your service be requisite, I will not refuse it. Nothing can equal the delight of being lov'd by the most excellent person of the World; and being I love you as I do, I am sometimes extremely sorry, you cannot receive a pleasure equal to mine. But I beseech you, Madam, let this pleasure accompany me to the grave, let Fortune never ravish it from me, but make her learn there is a felicity greater than all she can give, over which she has no power. In acknowledgment of such a multiply'd goodness, Madam, there is nothing which I refuse, not even the constraining of the violent passion I have in my soul, though it be altogether innocent, if at least it be any thing displeasing to you. Let us not then afflict our selves before the time; Fortune perhaps will favour our love, and we shall not be so unhappy as you apprehend. And though we should, you know what I told you in the beginning of my passion; I am not now capable of denying, that it is the most predominant of all my faculties, and is to me instead both of soul and life; Only love Martius, who will be eternally yours, in spite of all obstacles in the World; and let his great love Madam supply his want of merit: pardon him if he dares speak to you of the goodness of the divine Lysimira, he does not therefore esteem himself less unworthy of it; and this confidence diminishes nothing of his respect, though it infinitely augments his love.

Ha! Lucia (cry'd Plotina) I will not have Martius write to me; for certainly he writes too passionately and too well for me; but I beseech you shew me one of Lysimira's Letters. I am going to shew something more (said Lucia) for I will let you see the Verses she made during Martius's absence, who a little while before he departed gave her a flourishing Myrtle set in one of those earthen pots which are so admirably made at Rome. For using to entertain her melancholy near that Myrtle, to which she address'd thus.

Fair Myrtle, often water'd with my tears;
Fair Myrtle, witness of my griefs and fears;
Upon thy wounded Bark let Daphnis see An heart more wounded than thy Bark can be.
Tell him what fears my Love-sick heart have rent,
What griefs I suffer'd since my Daphnis went;
Tell him I feel whatever torments Love,
And joyn'd with absence, strong desires can move.
Then if thou canst my amorous flames express,
May happy Lovers characters still bless Thy sacred Rinde; no tears be ever known
To water thee, but what Heavens sheds alone.

These Verses are undoubtedly of a very passionate strain (said Plotina) but how came they to Martius's hands?

hands? At the return of this Lover (answer'd Plotina) he found the excellent Lysimira had so favourably spoken of him during his absence, that all her other Lovers were jealous of him. So that the first time that he visited her, this amiable person was attaqued with railery by some of the company in his presence. Which at first she put off very pleasantly; but, truth being a thing of powerful operation, she was at length constrain'd to pretend she had forgot something in her Closet, that so the disturbance of her mind might not be observ'd in her countenance. On which occasion Martius desiring to speak a few words to her, follow'd her and jesting with her, as he was going, because she could not endure the railery made to her. But as he follow'd her, he took up these Verses which she had let fall unwillingly; and so getting them without her knowledge, he folded them up, and did not read them till the evening. You may imagine what joy they gave him, and the next morning he writ Lysimira the following Letter.

Martius to Lysimira.

THe jealousie of many Friends and Rivals, has no other effect, Madam, but increases my love; and my joy is great beyond expression, when I consider I possess a heart, in which so many illustrious persons esteem me happy to have a place; a heart, the most generous and noble in the world. Ah! Madam, is not this too much for Martius? Yet I swear to you he had rather dy than be content with less, and should infallibly dye, if any other could have as much honour as he. No, Madam, that unhappiness shall never befal me, your admirable Verses assure me of it, and I cannot forbear to give a thousand kisses to those favourable testimonies of the tenderness of your heart. Should I undertake to render you the most humble thanks I ow you, it would be impossible for me. I shall only tell you, or to speak better, I shall swear to you, that I will eternally love the divine Lysimira, but so as she desires and deserves to be lov'd. Moreover, to return you two Verses in stead of your own, which I account for a hundred thousand, be pleas'd to know that whilst my journey lasted, I said a hundred and a hundred times.

'Tis a weak love which absence can deface;
Mine is immutable by time or place.

Ha! Lucia (cri'd Plotina) I can no longer believe Martius loves me, because whatever you say, I cannot think he has ceas'd to love Lysimira, as dead as she is. Yet you see him very pleasant in your presence (answer'd Lucia) had but he been unfaithful only to the ashes of Lysimira, the practice of vulgar Lovers might be alledg'd to excuse him. But, in fine, after a thousand Letters more obliging than those I have shew'd you, his love could insensibly abate, though he continu'd civil to her. But certainly by becoming happy he absolutely ceas'd to be a Lover; and since the loss of Lysimira, which notwithstanding he sensibly regretted, then, you see your eyes have afforded him sufficient consolation. In good earnest, Lucia (said Plotina) you are a cruel person, and I will be reveng'd upon Lycastes for all the mischief which you do to Martius. You will be unjust if you do so (answer'd Lucia.) Believe me (reply'd Plotina smiling) injustice is something agreeable in certain occasions. However, I declare to you (added she) I will see no more of those Letters, for they would force me either to love or hate Martius, and I am resolv'd to do neither. There is no great resemblance between those two passions (added Lucia.) I grant it (answer'd Plotina) but yet I feel my mind capable of both. That you may avoid both (reply'd Lucia, smiling) love the poor Lycastes, who adores you, and have only indifference for Martius, who has too much merit to be hated; and too little constancy, to be lov'd. As for Lycastes (answer'd Plotina) I declare to you that I can neither love nor hate him; for he is too agreeable a person to cause hatred, and too inconstant to excite my love. If it be so (said Lucia) infallibly you will love Martius. I should be very sorry then (answer'd Plotina) for I desire to love nothing but honour, my friends, and my self. They that love themselves well (reply'd Lucia) sometimes love others too for their own sakes. I assure you (answer'd Plotina) I am perswaded that such as understand their own interests well, affect no person in the way of love; but as for friendship, our lives would be irksome without it. 'Tis so difficult to have Friends at your age (repli'd Lucia) that you are very prone to have disguis'd Lovers, and be of the humor of those women who are not offended but with apparences, and admit of love under the name of friendship. For my part (said Plotina) I am not oblig'd to examine the hearts of my Friends so narrowly, provided they tell me nothing that displeases me. But I am not gone so far yet (added she) and but hitherto I have had only acquaintances, and would not yet make choice of Friends. Nevertheless I perceive my heart inclin'd to have some; and if my reason did not oppose it, I should have one already. However (said Lucia) take heed of the disguised Lovers I speak of, for there is nothing more agreeable or more dangerous than a lover that resembles a Friend. I shall endeavour to make use of your Counsels (answer'd Plotina.)

Thus you see, Amilcar, how the mind of this amiable Virgin stood affected towards her two Lovers. The next day after this conversation, Martius hapning to be at a Walking where Plotina was, and from which Lycastes was absent, found an opportunity to speak to her a little more openly of his love than he had done. At first Plotina rejected him with sufficient rigour; No, no, Martius (said she to him) do not conceive that your merit shall hinder me from forbidding you to speak to me of your pretended passion; for if you love me not, you do me an injury to tell me so; and if you do, I have such a respect for you, as not to cherish you in a fruitless hope. But, do you think, Madam (answer'd he) 'tis in your power to extinguish the passion you have excited in me, or so much as to hinder me from hoping? Love is far more capricious than you imagine (added he) it entertains hope against reason; and you attempt in vain to keep me from believing that one day you will love me, whether you will or no. Yes, Madam, the greatness of my passion, and my perseverance will infallibly mollifie your heart. There is much boldness in your words (reply'd Plotina:) I assure you, Madam (answer'd he)

he) there is more love than boldneſs, ſince I truſt only in the greatneſs of my paſſion. But, Martius (ſaid Plotina) think you I can ever love a man that could ceaſe to love a very amiable perſon, by whom he was ardently lov'd? Who told you, Madam (ſaid he) I ever ceas'd to love the charming perſon whom I have loſt? All the World (anſwer'd ſhe) and beſides, I gather it by my own obſervance; for if you had not ceas'd to love her, you would love nothing but your grief. Ha! Madam (cri'd Martius ſighing) why will you force me to reveal a ſecret to you which I had reſolv'd never to diſcover? I aſſure you (anſwer'd Plotina) I have no intention to force you to tell me any thing of private concernment. Yet you force me to it (repli'd Martius) by reproaching me that I have ceas'd to love the perſon whom I have loſt, thereby to have a pretext to forbid me to love you. Nevertheleſs it is certain, if I had not lov'd her beyond the grave, perhaps I ſhould not have been your Lover. But, Madam, believe me upon my word, without obliging me to give you a particular account of things. Plotina being then ſufficiently curious to know what Martius meant, treated him ſo fiercely, that he became conſtrain'd to tell her more than he was otherwiſe willing to do. I beſeech you charming Plotina (ſaid he to her) hearken to an unhappy perſon who adores you. Yet I find much regret to relate what I am going to inform you of; for I muſt renew all my ſorrows, and cannot avoid bringing my ſelf into danger of being ſuſpected of vanity and little diſcretion. Know then, that I was undoubtedly lov'd by Lyſimira, who was one of the moſt amiable perſons in the World; and I can ſwear to you, I have not ceas'd to love her a moment; 'tis true, after our affection was ratifi'd by a thouſand Oaths, I chang'd my deportment towards her, becauſe decency and her ſelf requir'd it: but as for my heart, it continu'd immutable. Nevertheleſs (ſuch was my unhappineſs) Lyſimira believ'd Lucia had formerly not hated me, and did not hate me ſtill; ſo that by degrees ſhe came to be poſſeſs'd with a ſecret jealouſie which deſtroy'd her. How? (interrupted Plotina) has Lucia, whom I know, lov'd you, and does ſhe love you ſtill? At preſent (anſwer'd Martius) I believe Lucia hates me, but at that time Lyſimira believ'd ſhe did not, and fear'd I lov'd her, though 'tis moſt certain my affection to her was no more but a certain civility which a ſincere man may diſpenſe with where he thinks he is not hated. In the mean time Lyſimira being willing to diſſemble her diſcontent, and keep me from converſing with Lucia alone, choſe rather to ſee her every day though ſhe hated her, than not to ſee her and be in fear leſt I viſited her in private; ſo that ſhe became inſeparable from Lucia. I will not ſtay to tell you, Madam, how great diſcontents the poor Lyſimira endur'd, without communicating any thing to me (for ſhe had a great mind, and car'd not to complain) and how great diſquiets I caus'd her innocently by the civility I ſhew'd to Lucia, who as you know, has a very commendable Wit. 'Tis ſufficient to ſignifie to you, that Lyſimira by little and little became very languiſhing and melancholy. At which I was much afflicted, and enquiring the cauſe of her, I underſtood her mind was as ſick as her body. I entreated her, I begg'd her to let me know the cauſe of her diſcontent; but ſhe would never tell it me. The Gods are witneſſes, I omitted nothing I believ'd might pleaſe, cure or comfort her. I did one thing too of no ſmall difficulty; for having at length underſtood by an intimate friend of Lyſimira the true cauſe of her ſadneſs, I never ſaw Lucia but when I could not avoid it, and I gave her all the aſſurances of my affection I could expreſs. But (to her own unhappineſs) ſhe doubted the ſincerity of my Oaths, and fell into a ſickneſs which ſhortly after ended her days; at her death ſhe perſiſted in her jealouſie to her laſt breath, and left me written with her own hand in the Tablets which her Friend gave me after her deceaſe, the ſad words which I am going to recite to you.

'I have liv'd enough Martius; ſince I have teſtifi'd 'to you that I lov'd you more than my life; 'But if I have had any power over you, uſe your ut-'moſt endeavours to marry Plotina when time ſhall 'have dry'd up your tears. She is the only perſon whom 'I can ſuffer to ſucceed me in your heart. Do not refuſe 'me this laſt favour which I deſire of you. And if you 'cannot win her affection whom I have nam'd to you, 'love nothing but my memory, I conjure you.

But, Martius (ſaid Plotina) can this which you ſpeak be true? I will let you ſee it, Madam, when you pleaſe (anſwer'd Martius ſighing) I aſſure my ſelf (added he) you conceive well the unfortunate Lyſimira deſign'd principally to hinder me from loving Lucia, by commanding me to uſe my utmoſt endeavours to marry you; for ſhe did not know you intimately. But ſhe needed not to fear it; for conſidering Lucia as the cauſe (though innocent) of Lyſimira's death, I went no more to viſit her after I had loſt that amiable perſon, whom I regretted with a ſenſibility of heart which I am not able to expreſs. Indeed I reſolv'd never to love any perſon more; and though ſhe had commanded me to do what I could to marry you, yet I made a determination to be faithful to her aſhes, ſpend the reſt of my days with very great indifference. But (as deſtiny is inevitable) after time had diminiſh'd my grief, your beauty, the charms of your mind, and a thouſand agreeable qualities which all the World admires in you, diſpos'd my heart to obey Lyſimira; ſo that finding my duty conjoyn'd with my inclination, I have lov'd you, and I love you both for the ſake of Lyſimira and your own. And judge now, charming Plotina, whether I am an unfaithful Lover; for I ſwear to you with all the ſincerity of a man of honour, that beſides your ſelf I ſhould never have lov'd any thing but the aſhes of Lyſimira; and unleſs Lyſimira had permitted me to love you, I ſhould have ſo timely oppos'd the paſſion I have for you, that perhaps it would not have overpower'd my reaſon. Moreover, one unhappineſs there befel me which afflicted me ſenſibly; for amidſt the diſorder whereinto Lyſimira's death had brought my reaſon, I was rob'd of a Casket, in which Lyſimira and I had put all that we had written to one another, becauſe ſhe durſt not keep my Letters: and for my part, I have ever believ'd Lucia caus'd it to be ſtoln from me, that ſo I might be depriv'd of everything which ſhould put me in remembrance of Lyſimira. I expreſs'd ſo great ſorrow for this loſs, that my intimate Friends know well that I am not an unfaithful perſon. Martius related this with ſo paſſionate an air; and ſo like a man that ſpoke truth, that the novelty of this adventure made a ſufficient impreſſion upon Plotina's mind. She call'd to mind then all that Lucia had ſaid to her againſt Martius, and in favour of Lycaſtes; ſo that not doubting but that it proceeded from the ſecret inclination ſhe always had for Martius, Plotina became a little leſs ſevere to this Lover. Nevertheleſs ſhe did not permit him to love her, but yet did not ſo abſolutely forbid him as to make him deſpair of obtaining her permiſſion one day. And accordingly he us'd

so much care to please Plotina, that she suffer'd him sometimes to tell her something of the sentiments he had for her, which yet was always in such a manner as engag'd her to nothing; for being of a merry humor, she easily evades all difficulties. Now after her conversation with Martius, Lucia became wholly out of her favour; and whereas she conceal'd nothing from me which befel him, she told me all she had learnt from Martius, and I perceiv'd by the air with which she spoke, that this Lover was happier than he thought. Not that Plotina had a great passion in her heart, but he had always the advantage to be better thought of than any of his Rivals: and therefore she told me he was her first Friend. In the mean time Lycastes was very unhappy, and if Lucia had not comforted him, and continually encourag'd him with hope, I believe he would have cur'd himself. But this person designing to serve Lycastes, chiefly that she might prejudice Martius, omitted nothing to bring her purpose to pass; for though Plotina lov'd her no longer, yet out of prudence she continu'd to visit her. Martius became more chearful as he became more happy; so that he took care every day only to give Plotina new divertisements. Nevertheless, he was sometimes discontented to see he made no more progress in the heart of this fair person: but the unhappiness of Lycastes was a very efficacious consolation to him. About this time divers pleasant things fell out; but because I do not love long narrations, I will shorten this as much as I can. Yet, I must not omit to tell you, that Plotina and Martius having laid a Wager, my Friend lost, and gave Martius a very prety Seal, which he receiv'd with joy; but how careful soever he was to keep it, he dropt it once as he was walking in a Meadow with some Ladies; but it was his happiness that I found it again and restor'd it to him. Some days after he lost the Writing-Tablets which I gave him, and which had been Plotina's; but he was so happy as that Plotina found them and return'd them to him; but she sent him these Verses with them which had reference to a conversation they had together the day before, in which Plotina maintain'd that a lost friendship might be reviv'd, but never a lost Love for the same person. The Verses were these,

'Tis true, good fortune is your constant friend,
And what you lose, still back again doth send.
Howe'er 'tis fit henceforth more care you show;
Remember that Plotina told you so.
For if an Heart in Love's Realm goes astray,
Poor Heart, 'tis lost for ever and a day.

Martius answer'd to this gallantly, with very much wit; but because I do not well remember either his Verses or his Letter, I will not attempt to repeat them to you. Shortly after, being these Verses were not made any secret, they made Lycastes so jealous, that he quarrell'd with Martius; and that in so high a degree, that it came to a Duel. So they fought, and were both wounded; Martius, but slightly; but Lycastes so dangerously, that it was presently judg'd he would die. Whereupon, though he had been the Challenger, Martius was forc'd to flee from Ardea, and that without bidding adieu to Plotina, who would not grant him a private conference. So that he was fain to be contented with writing to her, and receiving only an Answer of some Lines. Some days after his departure, Lycastes dy'd without being lamented by any of his Mistresses excepting Plotina, who piti'd him, and was very sorry he dy'd, chiefly because his death banisht Martius. During his absence, he writ very diligently to Plotina: but being Lucia knew that in love, absence is the fittest time to prejudice a Lover, especially when it is long, and the Mistress is very young, and loves mirth and pleasures, she did not despair of being able at length to ruine Martius in the heart of Plotina. Now it hapned that a Brother of hers returning from a long Voyage, and having seen Martius for some time in the place which he chose for his retreat, she oblig'd him to gratifie her by committing a wickedness. He was young, and of no very good nature; he did not love Martius neither, he delighted to cause disturbances, he did not hate lying, and had lov'd Plotina a little from his Childhood: Wherefore Lucia having plotted with him what he should say concerning Martius, he came to make me his first visit; and being told I sate for my picture that day to give it to Plotina, he came to the place where I was; but because it was at the house of no ordinary Painter, and the Conversation which was made there chang'd Plotina's mind toward Martius, I must tell you something concerning that excellent man.

His reputation (said Amilcar) has no doubt arriv'd at me; for if I am not deceiv'd, he is a man that makes pictures in black and white Crayon, and in little, and his name is Nelanthus. 'Tis the very same (answer'd Cesonia.) But is it possible for such pictures (said Amilcar) to be as like & as lively as those that are drawn in colours? I assure you (answer'd Cesonia) a Looking-glass does not more exactly represent those it reflects, than the Crayons of this excellent man; for he dives into the very hearts of people, to animate their pictures. He makes their minds and humors visible, he expresses even the least motions of their souls in their eyes, the smallest observable Action does not escape him; he preserves too the perfect resemblance of the cloathing, with his black and white he makes brown hair distinguishable from fair, lively colors from pale complexions; and, in fine, all his portraits are inimitable: he knows so well how to dispose light and shadows, and so perfectly represents the air and life with his Pencils, that all the skilful in Painture are amaz'd at his work. The heads he makes are so round (or rising) that the eyes are mistaken in them, and they are drawn with a certain softness which so admirably imitates Nature, that he cannot be sufficiently commended. As for his person, Nelanthus is tall, well proportioned, and of a good presence; he speaks well of every thing, he delights those he draws with the variety of his discourse; he loves ingenuity extreamly, and has written the precepts of his Art very commendably. Moreover, he makes very agreeable and exquisite Verses, when he draws a person that pleases him, and whom he would commend; but which is strange, at the same time he makes his admirable Crayons, which deserve to be admir'd by all the world, he talks with the same jollity and freedom of mind, as if he had nothing to do but to divert the company; and nevertheless there is nothing more handsom and exact than that which he is doing. And therefore he has drawn all the persons of high quality, illustrious and learned in Italy. And this is the man at whose house I was one day with Plotina to sit for my picture, when Lucia's Brother I told you of came to find me. Being it is an usual custom to make questions to a man who comes from a long voyage, I set my self to enquire divers things of Celius (for so is Lucia's Brother call'd) but Plotina having a secret design, ſign, made mockery of my demands, and counſell'd Celius not to anſwer me at all; or if he did, not to tell me the truth. For indeed (ſaid ſhe to him) me thinks there is nothing more troubleſome than to be oblig'd to give an account of your Travels, to every one that you meet. For is there any thing more tedious than to meet ſuch people as deſire to know even the leaſt Circumſtances of the Country which you have ſeen, who expect you ſhould know the difference between the Piſmires of Egypt (ſo fam'd for bigneſs) and the Piſmires of Italy, and who raiſing queſtions upon queſtions know not wherefore they would know that which they enquire of. But for my part, who care neither for the Elephants of Aſia, the Piſmires of Egypt, nor the Crocodiles of Nilus, I will only ask Celius whether the women of Italy are as lovely as thoſe he has ſeen elſewhere; and whether the honeſt men of this Country do not equal thoſe of other. Being to ſpeak to the two moſt charming perſons in the world (anſwer'd Celius) I have not liberty to ſay there are any elſewhere that equal them; but if I were to ſpeak in another place, having firſt excepted you, I would freely acknowledge that the Greek Ladies have ſomething very attractive, and that their glances are ſo amiable, that his heart cannot ſee them much without loving them, unleſs the heart be otherwiſe pre-engag'd. Then you have lov'd ſome Greek beauty? (reply'd I.) Having been ſo long abſent (anſwer'd he) 'tis eaſie to imagine that I cannot but have lov'd in ſome place of the world; for certainly people become amorous more eaſily in other Countries than in their own; for ſuch as are abſent, are always free from buſineſs; and idleneſs is a great preparative to love. Yet I know ſome Abſents (reply'd I looking upon Plotina) who I dare ſwear are not amorous in the place of their baniſhment. In truth (ſaid ſhe, bluſhing) that is not to be ſpoken ſo affirmatively; for few know how to deport themſelves in abſence as they ought. And yet I know nothing more obliging than to do as I mean. But to ſpeak truth, I do not find many perſons but who accuſtom themſelves to diſpenſe with ſeeing ſuch as they love beſt. Which nevertheleſs is that which would diſpleaſe me moſt of any thing in the world (added ſhe) for as many as I eſteem, I am confident time could not accuſtom me to want patiently the ſight of a perſon whom I lov'd much, but I ſhould be always more ſad and careleſſly dreſs'd, deſire his preſence every moment, have no delight in thoſe very places where others find moſt, and every day would encreaſe my melancholy. For all this, we uſually ſee, two days after a Lover is out of his Miſtreſs's ſight, he is comforted, he decks himſelf as formerly, he walks, converſes, diverts himſelf, every day leſs remembers the perſon he loves, and is no longer afflicted than while he is writing to her. I confeſs (anſwer'd Celius) moſt men do thus; but you muſt confeſs too that moſt women comfort themſelves as ſpeedily as men. I confeſs it ſincerely (ſaid Plotina) but according to the humor I am of, if I were ſo unhappy as to love one of thoſe contented or comforted Abſents (if I may ſo ſpeak) and knew it, I ſhould ſo well comfort my ſelf with his loſs, that perhaps I ſhould in time render him incapable of Conſolation; for moſt of ſuch abſent perſons ſpeak at their return, as if they had been all the while the moſt miſerable men in the world. 'Tis true (ſaid Nelanthus then continuing his work too) moſt part of Travellers are great Lyars; for one day I ſaw an abſent Lover who oblig'd me to copy in little, a great picture of his Miſtreſs whom he left at Volaterra, whence he was. And being he took ſome pleaſure in ſeeing me work, he came very frequently to viſit me; and I remember one day among the reſt, I beheld him very merry. He related ſundry divertiſements to me, at which he had been preſent in the preceeding days; he ſung, he made pleaſant Verſes upon a picture which I had drawn, as I did alſo in my turn, and feign'd my ſelf an African to divert him and my ſelf: after which, he remembring it was the day on which to write to Volaterra, he ask'd me what he ſhould write about. When he had half done his Letter, one came to ſeek him to go to a walking appointment; whereupon he left his Letter half finiſht, and went to walk with certain Ladies, without minding the finiſhing of his Letter, though he could not have the like opportunity till four days after. When he was gone I took the Letter which he had begun, and withal, I confeſs I read it. But I was ſurpriz'd to find that he was writing to his Miſtreſs, as the moſt ſad, melancholy and afflicted man in the world by reaſon of his abſence. For he told her, he avoided the world, took pleaſure in nothing, and led the moſt irkſom life that ever was. And which was rare, at his return from the walk he came to my houſe again, and without thinking of his Letter, deſir'd me to lay aſide the picture I had begun, and the next morning to begin that of one of the Ladies he had been walking with that afternoon. And therefore ever ſince, I have not given much credit to the Letters of abſent perſons. For my part (ſaid Celius) I never yet ſaw an abſent perſon long melancholy. Yet I know one (anſwer'd I) whom you cannot have ſeen very chearful; for being he is baniſht about an unhappy affair, I imagine you muſt have found him ſad. I perceive (reply'd Celius) you mean Martius; but ſince they report (added he maliciouſly) his heart is a Conqueſt which the amiable Plotina has rejected, I ſhall not fear to ſay that I have ſeen a fair perſon in the place where he is who boaſts of being greatly lov'd by him. I ſay, who boaſts, becauſe ſhe is a woman, that eaſily enough publiſhes the Conqueſts which ſhe makes. They who boaſt ſo eaſily of taking hearts (ſaid Plotina bluſhing) ſeem not to underſtand the art of conquering them. Be it how it will (anſwer'd he) ſhe ſhew'd ſome very pleaſant Letters, and I ſtole one from her without her perceiving it. Martius writes ſo well (reply'd Plotina) that I have a great curioſity to ſee ſome of his Letters, eſpecially concerning love, for I have not ſeen any. Celius ſeeing Plotina's mind ſo diſpos'd as he deſir'd, ſhew'd her accordingly a Love-Letter of Martius which Lucia had given him, for ſhe had a hundred in her keeping which had no names to them. So that Plotina knowing Martius's his hand and ſtile, believ'd he was inconſtant, and did not ſuſpect Lucia of this guile of Clelius. Wherefore being of quick reſentment, and high-minded, ſhe regretted this adventure more than you can imagine. But ſhe reſented it with indignation; and inſtead of complaining to Martius of his inconſtancy, ſhe took a reſolution to do all ſhe could to drive him out of her heart. And the next day ſhe anſwer'd only in theſe few words to a very obliging Letter he had writ to her.

Plotina to Martius.

THey who divert themſelves very well in the places wherein they reſide, need not ſeek pleaſures elſewhere. Therefore for your own conveniency and mine, forbear to give your ſelf the trouble of writing to me any more; but forget not, I conjure you, that I told you heretofore,

That when an heart in love's Realm goes aſtray,
That heart is loſt for ever and a day.

You may judge how extreamly this Letter ſurpriz'd Martius, who was really very faithful. Not but that there was a fair perſon in the place where he reſided, who gave pretext to the lie of Celius; for ſhe was one of thoſe goſſiping women who have a thouſand little inventions to force virtuous men to ſay more to them than they would, and than they think. Martius nevertheleſs writ ſeveral times again to Plotina, but ſhe anſwer'd him no more. And therefore I often told her ſhe was unjuſt to condemn Martius upon the bare report of a man who was a kind of Lover, and who beſides was Brother to Lucia, who ſought only to prejudice Martius. I believe perhaps more than you (anſwer'd Plotina) Martius is not ſo culpable, as I make ſemblance to believe: but to ſpeak truth, being I ſhould be loth to have a great paſſion in my ſoul, now my reaſon is a little ſtronger than it was, I ſeek my ſelf to accuſe Martius, and to improve my anger. I thought heretofore (continued ſhe bluſhing) it was poſſible to be lov'd by a virtuous man without loving him more than was convenient; but I have now undeceiv'd my ſelf, and I find that unleſs I take care, I ſhould come perhaps to love Martius more than he lov'd me. Therefore to avoid ſo great an unhappineſs, I conjure you never to tell me any thing that may ſerve to juſtifie Martius. He is abſent, I may ſuſpect him of inconſtancie, I am ſenſible of my honour, I love liberty and joy; ſo that there needs not much more to cure me. Plotina ſpoke this with a certain fierce and angry air, which made me believe ſhe would have more difficulty to drive Martius out of her heart than ſhe thought. However, I did as ſhe deſir'd, and ſpoke no more to her concerning Martius.

After this, many alterations hapned in Plotina's fortune (which I will not detain you with relating) both by reaſon of his abſence whoſe Daughter ſhe believ'd her ſelf, and by the death of her whom ſhe took to be her Mother. But at length, when I chang'd my condition, Plotina came to live with me, a little before Tarquin came to beſiege Ardea. This adventure ſo amaz'd our City, that I cannot repreſent to you how great a terror there was at firſt amongſt the people. But for that the inhabitants of Ardea are very couragious, they ſoon took heart again, and reſolv'd to make a ſtout defence. As things were in this poſture, Martius making uſe of this occaſion, and knowing an attempt was to be made to bring a ſupply into the City, he put himſelf in the head of thoſe that guarded it, and did ſuch brave exploits, that it may be ſaid 'twas he alone that procur'd the entrance of the Convoy into Ardea. Aſſoon as he came thither, he went to the Governors of the City, and with much eloquence and boldneſs told them he was come to deſire to die for his Country. This Action ſeem'd ſo noble, that in ſpight of Lycaſtes Relations, Martius had liberty to ſtay in Ardea, where there was great need of ſuch perſons as he. Whereupon he addreſſed again to Plotina, but found not ſuch reception as formerly. At that time Horatius had brought Clelia to Ardea, and all the world was ſo charm'd with her beauty and virtue, that though ſhe was very melancholy, ſhe caus'd her ſelf to be ador'd. Plotina and I were the two perſons to whom ſhe teſtifi'd moſt goodneſs, ſhe made us privy to all her unhappineſs, and we promis'd to ſerve her in every thing we could, though Horatius guarded her very carefully. Martius in the mean time was in deſpair, becauſe he could not regain Plotina's heart, though he ſufficiently manifeſted his innocency. For Celius himſelf, who was not over-valiant, fearing to be treated like Lycaſtes, and being at feud with his Siſter, juſtifi'd him whom he had accus'd; for his love for Plotina was one of thoſe young peoples affections who believe their honour loſt unleſs they counterfeit themſelves Lovers. Nevertheleſs though Plotina perceiv'd well enough that Martius was innocent, her heart was not affected towards him as it had been. But wherefore, Madam, (ſaid he to her one day) do you not reſtore me that beginning of affection you had for me before? Becauſe I will not, and cannot (anſwer'd ſhe.) As for my eſteem, I give it you entire again; but that kind of affection full of I know not what diſquieting tenderneſs, I cannot recal into my heart if I would. Anger expell'd it thence, and my reaſon being become more ſtrong, will hinder it from returning. Ah! unjuſt perſon that you are! (cry'd Martius) you cauſe me to undergo the moſt cruel adventure that ever was, and Lyſimira's death was not more grievous to me. She dy'd loving me, ſhe commanded me to love you, ſhe took nothing from me; I cannot but commend her conſtancy, her memory is ſtill dear to me: but as for you, I loſe you without any fault of mine. I ſee you more amiable than ever, but I ſee you without hope of being lov'd. Yet if I had never had hope, I ſhould be patient; but you have confeſs'd your ſelf, you have had ſome kindneſs for me. I confeſs it again (anſwer'd Plotina) and if I had had leſs, perhaps I ſhould have had it ſtill; but to ſpeak truth, after I found my heart ſo near engag'd that I ſhould have been no longer Miſtreſs of it, if I had continu'd but a little longer to love you, I am beholding to my anger which has cur'd me. But, Madam, that anger was ill grounded (reply'd he.) But, Martius, (excepted ſhe) we are not bound to love all thoſe that have not betray'd us. 'Tis true (anſwer'd he) but I conceive they that have begun to love any perſon, ought always to love him. If I had promis'd you ſo (reply'd Plotina) I would have kept my word; but I never acknowledg'd to you that I lov'd you till now I lov'd you no longer, and reſolve not to do ſo. Ha! Madam (cry'd he) you carry your cruelty too far, and I believe never any adventure was like mine. In good earneſt (ſaid Plotina) nothing prejudices you in my heart but your merit, and the tenderneſs which I have had for you: and I confeſs to you ingenuouſly, you are the only man I have ſeen whom I have judg'd worthy of my affection. But I aſſure you at the ſame time, I was ſo much aſham'd to underſtand my own weakneſs, when I believ'd you lov'd another, that I am not reſolv'd to return ever into the like condition. But in acknowledgment of the affection you have had for me as far as I can, I aſſure you you alſo that I am reſolv'd to defend my heart as long as I live, & therefore never to marry, for to marry and not love thoſe we marry, is in my judgment the moſt fooliſh and miſchievous thing in the world; and to aſſure ones ſelf of the affection of any one, is the greateſt raſhneſs poſſible. Therefore Liberty is the ſafeſt courſe; and if you believe me, my example will be of uſe to you. Beſides, 'tis very juſt that you be faithful to the Aſhes of Lyſimira. Alas! (anſwer'd Martius) 'tis eaſie for an indifferent perſon to adviſe indifference. But how comes it that having not hated me before, you hate me now? If I hated you (reply'd ſhe) I could love you again; but, Martius, I eſteem you, and I can have a certain ſolid friendſhip for you, which may engage my mind, but not much more my heart. Ah! Madam, I deſire not that friendſhip (anſwer'd Martius) and I like hatred a thouſand times better. 'Tis in vain that you would be hated (reply'd Plotina) for I eſteem you too much. How? Madam, (ſaid he haſtily) is it an equal impoſſibility for me to obtain your hatred and your love? Yes, (anſwer'd Plotina) and as I love my ſelf too much to love you, I eſteem you too much to hate you. But to diſcover the bottom of my heart to you, know, I have the greateſt Obligation to you in the world, for that you will be the cauſe that I ſhall without difficulty reſiſt the affection of all thoſe who perhaps may hereafter have a deſign to pleaſe me; for after the danger whereto you have expos'd my Liberty, I ſhall provide ſo timely for it, that it will be no more in hazard. What? Madam, (cry'd the afflicted Martius) will you deprive me of hope for ever? Ah! Madam, (added he) you do not know your ſelf well, and perhaps your heart will do me juſtice even againſt your will. No, no, Martius, (anſwer'd ſhe with a very ſerious air) you will never ſee me engag'd in an affection of that nature; I love joy, quiet and glory, and I will preſerve them as long as I live. After this, ſay no more to me, for I ſhall not anſwer you. Martius would have diſobey'd her, but ſhe hindred him from ſpeaking; and from thenceforward ſo carefully avoided to give him occaſion to entertain her apart, that he could not find any. He knew well ſhe ſpoke her mind, and when ſhe ſhun'd him, ſhe told him ſmilingly that ſhe fear'd him; ſo that he was an hundred times more miſerable. For it was true, that at that time Plotina more countenanced Damon, Sicinius and Acriſius, who were become amorous of her, though ſhe neither lov'd nor eſteem'd them, than ſhe did Martius, for whom ſhe had a very great eſteem. And this was matter of no ſmall joy to Lucia. But wherefore do you not ſhun Acriſius? (ſaid I to her one day.) Becauſe he is too great a talker (anſwer'd ſhe) and ſo I cannot fear that he will ever pleaſe me. Why then do not you decline Sicinius? (reply'd I.) Becauſe he ſpeaks ſo little (added ſhe) that I cannot apprehend he is likely to perſwade me; and as for Damon, I have as little reaſon to fear that he will cauſe me to change my ſentiments towards him. But how comes it (ſaid I) that you heretofore ſo much reſiſted thoſe that endeavour'd to divert you from following the inclination you had for Martius, and now you have more reaſon to love him, you love him no longer? Becauſe at that time (anſwer'd ſhe) my inclination was ſtrong, and my reaſon weak; but anger having cur'd me of my pre-conceiv'd opinion, I have taken a wiſe reſolution to ſpend all my life in liberty. I will indeed entertain a certain free friendſhip (added ſhe) which ſhall not perplex, but divert me no leſs than love: but as for great affections, I will not admit of any at all, for they cannot be entertain'd without diſquiet. The way you intend to take (ſaid I to her) is perhaps as dangerous as that you would avoid: for many of thoſe friendſhips of gallantry approach very eaſily to wantonneſs, if heed be not taken to them. You ſhall ſee (ſaid ſhe) I know how to avoid ſo dangerous an extream, and underſtand better than you think, the bounds of all the ſeveral ſorts of friendſhip that can be had. But wherefore have you not one of theſe kinds (ſaid I) for the poor Mortius, for whom I now intercede? Ah! Ceſonia, (anſwer'd ſhe ſmiling) do you not know there is a Proverb which ſays,

That in the Seas of love, on the ſame ſhelf,
No dextrous Saylor 'twice ere ſplits himſelf?

You ſpeak ſo little ſeriouſly (reply'd I) that I care not to ſpeak any more to you. In good earneſt (anſwer'd ſhe) I declare clearly what I think, and profeſs that I will have no kind of affection as long as I live, which may diſturb my quiet. When I began to have an inclination for Martius, I was ſo young that I wanted ſtrength to oppoſe it, but at preſent I am aſſur'd I ſhall defend my heart better. For, in fine, I am ſo reſolv'd to love my ſelf, and conſequently to love quiet, liberty and glory, (as I ſaid at another time) that I will never love any of thoſe people who cannot be lov'd without hazarding thoſe three things which undoubtedly are the moſt agreeable in the world. But could not you marry Martius? (ſaid I.) If I would marry any one (anſwer'd ſhe) I confeſs Martius might oblige me thereto; but, Ceſonia, I have ſo great an averſion from marriage, that I cannot conſider him as one that is to be my husband: and I am ſo reſolv'd never to marry, that I believe nothing can make me change my ſentiments. For I judge nothing better, than to reſolve to live free; and when I conſider all the conſequences, which almoſt infallibly attend a wedded life, they make me to tremble. Not but that I conceive there may be ſome marriage happy; but, Ceſonia, where ſhall we find two perſons, who have wit, conſtancy, goodneſs enough one for another, and a ſufficient reſemblance of natures to live always well together? Some there may be, but they are few; and I do not think my ſelf fortunate enough to meet with ſo great a felicity. 'Tis therefore more eaſie for me to take a reſolution to live in liberty. As ſhe was ſpeaking this, by a ſtrange chance, all her Lovers came one after another to ſee me, and were together in my Chamber. So that Plotina being in her jolly humor, told me ſmilingly, that ſhe had a deſire to undeceive all perſons, and make a publick Declaration of her ſentiments. And thereupon in a very delightful way of raillery, ſhe told them all ſhe had abſolutely reſolv'd not to love any perſon much, and never to marry at all; and that the moſt which could be hop'd from her, was to pleaſe her, to obtain her eſteem, and to have ſome part in a kind of calm friendſhip which ſhe was reſolv'd to have as long as ſhe liv'd. For in truth (ſaid ſhe) I will never run the venture of meeting with indiſcreet, unfaithful, capricious, lukewarm, inequal and deceitful Lovers, nor bring my ſelf in danger of having a jealous, covetous, prodigal, humorſome, imperious, ſurly, fooliſh, or little virtuous Husband, nor conſequently of having deformed, vicious, ingrateful and wicked Children; and I incomparably prefer to ſpend my whole life with the liberty of having ſuch Friends of either Sex as I pleaſe. For I find that if I ſhould marry, I

ſhould be ſo good a Wife that I ſhould thereby be miſerable. All Plotina's Lovers oppos'd her ſentiments, and eſpecially Martius; but ſhe anſwer'd them ſo well, that they knew not what more to ſay to her. And ſo ſhe continu'd firm in her reſolution.

But now, there being no great pleaſure in living in a beſieged City, three or four of Plotina's friends and mine reſolv'd together with us to make uſe of Clelia's occaſion to go out of Ardea; for Horatius would not ſtay there, out of a belief that Tarquin would take the City. So that Plotina, without conſidering what grief ſhe ſhould cauſe Martius, imploy'd him to manage this affair, and to bring it to paſs that, we might be guarded by the ſame convoy which attended on Clelia. The converſation of Plotina and Martius was very extraordinary, and I know not how Plotina was able to be ſo inflexible as ſhe was. For he us'd all imaginable blandiſhments and endearing expreſſions to move her heart, but ſhe continu'd inalterable in her ſentiments; and all he could draw from her, was, that he ſhould never ſee her love any perſon more than himſelf, and that ſhe would never marry as long as ſhe liv'd. And indeed if the poor Martius had liv'd, I declare to you, that you would have had leſs intereſt in Plotina's heart; but you muſt know that when we went out of Ardea with Clelia, this generous Lover, notwithſtanding his regret, came himſelf to conduct us; and deported himſelf with ſo heroical and paſſionate an air, that Plotina eſteem'd him much the more for it. Now being it was fear'd that we ſhould be ſooner diſcover'd by the enemies if we had any conſiderable number of people with us, Horatius, Martius and eight of their Friends took upon themſelves alone the charge of conducting us. But, ſuch was our ill fortune, we met with Hellius, one of the Miniſters of Tarquin's cruelty, who came in the head of a Party of twenty to ſet upon Horatius, Martius and their Friends.

How? (interrupted Amilcar) was Martius amongſt thoſe whom Hellius fought with, when Aronces, Herminius and Celer (from whom Artemidorus, Zenocrates and I parted that morning) arriv'd and carri'd away Clelia who was at the foot of a Tree with you? Yes (anſwer'd Ceſonia) and the unfortunate Martius was ſlain by Hellius in the beginning of the Fight, though he was very valiant. And indeed 'twas his courage occaſion'd his death; for he charg'd with too great violence into the midſt of thoſe who came to take Plotina and her Friends. I will not tell you the particular paſſages of this encounter, for you have underſtood from the mouth of Aronces how Horatius and Hellius perceiving others were carrying away Clelia, joyn'd together to recover her; and how Aronces, Herminius and Celer reſiſted ſo many enemies at the ſame time. Yes, generous Ceſonia (anſwer'd Amilcar) I know all that paſs'd in that great occaſion. I know what Clelia did, putting her ſelf couragiouſly before thoſe that would aſſault her three protectors, I know how terrible a Combate it was, in what manner Aronces fought with Horatius, and how the generous Herminius defended both his life and liberty, and ſpoke to Hellius, and with what generoſity Aronces aſſiſted the wounded Horatius, whom he found by night in a Wood: but I know in what manner Plotina lamented Martius when you were taken, and carried to Tarquin. Do not enquire ſo much of her grief (reply'd Ceſonia) for perhaps you will think it too violent; for in good earneſt, no greater affliction can be reſented by any than was by Plotina for the death of Martius. But at length (conſtitution prevailing) ſhe comforted her ſelf with the thought, that perhaps if Martius had liv'd, ſhe might have had the weakneſs as not to be able to defend her heart; and ſince that (you know) your converſe has reviv'd joy in her ſoul.

Ceſonia having done ſpeaking, Amilcar thank'd her, for having related to him that which he had ſo long deſir'd to know. Not but that I am almoſt troubled (added he) that Plotina could never begin again to love Martius; for if ever I ſhould unwittingly incur her diſpleaſure, and ſhe ſhould deprive me of her friendſhip, I ſee ſhe would never reſtore it to me again any more than ſhe did to Martius. In my opinion (anſwer'd Ceſonia) you are ſo little accuſtom'd to be ill-treated, that you do not fear ſo much as you pretend, that you could not make your peace with Plotina if you ſhould happen to be out of her favour. On the contrary (repli'd Amilcar) I have ſcarce ever been very happy, and I am not ſo now; Plotina has certainly only a tenderneſs of friendſhip for me. But is it poſſible (ſaid Ceſonia) that Amilcar has been almoſt perpetually ill-treated? Since I am not capable of falſe boaſting, (anſwer'd he) I confeſs ſincerely, I have ſeldom been much lov'd. I have many times had the advantage to be acceptable even to thoſe women who have ill-treated me: but my merry and jovial humor has done me more injury in ſerious gallantry than I can expreſs to you. However, ſince it has caus'd me as much delight as the favours of my Miſtreſſes could have done, I do not complain of my deſtiny. Yet I would know (ſaid Ceſonia) whether any very intelligent perſon has ill-treated you? I lov'd one in Greece (anſwer'd he) who is one of the moſt amiable Women in the World. She is brown then (repli'd Ceſonia) being ſhe is a Greek. That conſequence is not always infallible (anſwer'd Amilcar) but it is true the amiable Nerintha I ſpeak of has hair of the goodlieſt black that ever was ſeen; a black ſhining and bright, which becomes her admirably well. She is of a very handſome tallneſs, and well proportion'd; her Eyes are black, ſparkling, full of fire and ſpirit; and though ſhe has no wantonneſs in her looks, but on the contrary has a very modeſt air, yet when ſhe ſmiles, ſhe has an amiable aſpect which pleaſes infinitely. Nerintha's viſage is oval and of good ſymmetry, her mould handſome, her cheeks agreeable, her noſe well ſhap'd, and ſhe has an air of beauty which renders her very graceful and lovely; and though her complexion is of no extraordinary whiteneſs, yet her beauty is lively and capable to excite love. But beſides all this, Nerintha is infinitely ingenious, and of ſo clear a perception as keeps her from ſpeaking things at random. She is gentle, civil, good and obliging, ſhe is ſerious and debonaire together without inequality; and though ſhe is perfectly virtuous and even ſevere, yet ſhe converſes gallantly with her Friends, and ſufficiently loves all reaſonable divertiſements. She is a good friend and very generous, very regular in all her actions, and very careful to ſatisfie all the duties of civility and friendſhip. She never jeſts dangerouſly, ſhe blames no perſon; and having a mind naturally ſociable, ſhe never ſpeaks that of another which ſhe would not have ſpoken of her ſelf. Nerintha has a very ſweet and pleaſing voice, ſhe ſings very agreeably, though ſhe does not much care for it. She ſpeaks exactly, writes handſomly, and in brief is ſo charming, that though ſhe would not accept my heart, yet ſhe ſhall have my eſteem and friendſhip as long as ſhe lives. Perhaps (ſaid Ceſonia) ſhe had had neither the one

nor the other, if ſhe had accepted your affection. I am not of your opinion (anſwer'd Amilcar) but I confeſs to the glory of Nerintha, I am always her Friend though ſhe would not have me for her Lover. There are ſo few people amiable (ſaid Ceſonia) that methinks ſuch as are ſo, ought to be always lov'd. It has been a complaint in all paſt ages (anſwer'd he) and will be in all to come, that there are not virtuous people enough: And yet I believe the number is almoſt equal in all times. I am not of your opinion (reply'd Ceſonia) for I think there never were fewer than at preſent, of ſuch as make reckoning of perſons of merit. No, believe me (ſaid Amilcar) the World is not yet ſo poor of virtuous people as they report, and there is alſo more liberality and gallant generoſity than is imagin'd. For during the time I was at Syracuſa, there hapned many things to a young Lady of that place, which prove that which I ſay. Know then that this perſon is of noble birth, but her fortune is ſufficiently bad; her heart is generous, ſhe makes profeſſion of being good, and without oſtentation of wit has gain'd a greater reputation than ſhe ſought; know, I ſay, this perſon has had divers adventures which prove that virtue is yet in requeſt. For (not to reckon up the number of Friends ſhe has) many preſents were made to her after a particular manner; and becauſe it was known that ſhe delighted more to give than to receive, an unuſual contrivance was practis'd. For one morning while ſhe was yet aſleep, a crafty man deceiv'd the ſlave that open'd the gate to him without telling who ſent him, and left a compleat furniture for a Chamber (the moſt agreeable and gallant that could be ſeen) in her Court; and though great ſearch was made to find out the author of this liberality, yet he could not be diſcover'd. Yet the perſon who receiv'd it imagin'd ſhe knew by whom ſhe was thus oblig'd, but one of her friends ſo perſwaded her that it was forbidden her to conjecture, that ſhe was forc'd to ſuppreſs her gratitude and confine it within her heart, without daring to publiſh the glory of her Benefactor. To this ſame Lady a great Princeſs of a very remote Country (who is both illuſtrious, of a great beauty, wit, and heart) has written divers times very eloquently in a language which is not natural to her, and ſent her a Bracelet of her Hair which is the goodlieſt in the World, with a claſp of Diamonds the richeſt that ere was ſeen. The chief Veſtal has alſo made her ſeveral agreeable preſents after a very ingenious and obliging manner; ſo have the generous Amalthea, the Princeſs Eliſmonda, a noble ſtranger, and divers of her Friends of either Sex. 'Tis true, all theſe liberalities do not make her Fortune; but her humor is ſuch that ſhe likes them better than if they were of another nature, I have known as much as this (anſwer'd Ceſonia) but four or five perſons make no great number in a great Country. After this, Amilcar and Ceſonia talkt very ſadly of the pitiful condition in which the twenty fair Roman Ladies were, who were to be ſent back to Porſenna. Yet there was nothing to be fear'd from that King but only in reſpect of Clelia, who he believ'd eſcap'd from his Camp only becauſe ſhe knew ſomething of the pretended conſpiracy of Aronces and Mutius. But the next morning it hapned that Publicola was inform'd that a certain man had met Mutius very melancholy upon the way to Praneſte, and therefore he believ'd that this deſpairing Lover, knowing that the great Feſtival of Fortune was to be celebrated within two days, was gone to that famous Temple, to ſee whether the Lots were more favourable to him; for 'tis reported that on that day the Deciſions were more infallible than on any other of all the year. Wherefore he determin'd to requeſt Amilcar to go thither, who accordingly accepted of this Commiſſion. Yet he did not depart till after he had ſeen Clelia and all her companions gone, to be reconducted to the Camp; but to the end the people might not tumult at ſo ſad a ſpectacle, they were caus'd to paſs through the moſt unfrequented ſtreets that was poſſible. No doubt they were very ſad in the bottom of their hearts, eſpecially Clelia; but their ſadneſs was diſcreet, and Clelia amongſt the reſt teſtifi'd an admirable conſtancy. All their Lovers follow'd them as far as they could; but at length it behov'd them to take leave. Horatius would have gone to preſent them to Porſenna, thinking to ſpeak ſomething which might conduce to their ſafety; but Publicola thought not convenient, and made choice of a Kinſman of Clelius, who was more advanc'd in years, and was both prudent and reſolute. So theſe fair Virgins took the way towards the Camp, and Amilcar that towards Praneſte. As he was going thither he met with Theanor and Æmilius the Lovers of Terentia and Aureliſa, who had at length reſolv'd to refer their fortunes to the Lots of the Temple of Fortune. Amilcar being a perſon known to all Porſenna's Court, they were very joyful to light upon him, and he (being no lover of ſolitarineſs) was as well ſatisfi'd to meet with ſuch agreeable company. Their firſt diſcourſe was a melancholy reflection upon the misfortunes of Aronces and Clelia; but as the moſt generous eaſily enough turn away their minds from the unhappineſſes of others, they came by degrees to talk of matters indifferent. Theanor ſet himſelf to extol Hetruria above all other Countries, Æmilius to commend Greece where he had liv'd a long time, and Amilcar to praiſe and diſparage all the Countries he had ſeen. For as there is no beauty ſo perfect (ſaid he) in which ſomething is not to be deſir'd, ſo there is no Country but has its defects. In a place where the Climate is temperate, the people are light and inconſtant; in another, the people have much wit, and are accus'd of little fidelity: in one Country many times we find Sciences and Vices, in another innocence and ruſticity. In one place nothing is to be ſeen but Cottages, in another nothing but Palaces. So that as a hundred Beauties are requiſite to make up a perfect one, ſo you muſt ſelect the excellencies of a hundred Countries to form one accompliſh'd. You muſt take the mildneſs of the Climate of one, the Rivers and Seas of another, the Flowers and Fruits of another, yea the very Birds and Butter-flies; you muſt fetch the Sciences and Arts from one place, Valour from another, Honeſty from amongſt people of leſs nimble Wits, and exact juſtice from Heaven (for in truth there is not much to be found upon earth.)

Amilcar, no doubt, has reaſon (ſaid Theanor) but however I dare affirm Hetruria has almoſt every thing that can be found elſewhere. The Climate is gentle, mens manners good, ignorance begins to be baniſh'd from it, and excellent Arts to be carefully promoted. As for excellent Arts (anſwer'd Amilcar) I much doubt whether you can prove that they flouriſh as much in Hetruria as in Greece; for I confeſs with ſincerity to the ſhame of my Country, that Africa poſſeſſes them but imperfectly, and the proud Carthage yields in this to the leaſt Cities of Greece. Then you have not ſeen that ſtately Tomb which Porſenna is building (said Theanor?) I have heard of it (answer'd Amilcar) but whatever has been told me of it, I have not fanci'd it to be an extraordinary piece. Yet it is such (repli'd Theanor) that I question whether the Labyrinth of Crete and the Pyramids of Egypt excel it; for, in fine, it is a Master-piece of Architecture. All the statelineſs which the imagination can conceive, is seen in it. This proud Tomb is above three hundred foot on each side, the form of it is square, the stones are of a prodigious greatneſs, and admirably well poliſhed. In the base of this Monument is a Labyrinth greater and more intricate than that of Crete, for it is impoſſible to expedite your self out of it, unleſs he that built it give you one of his servants to guide you; and there are so many turnings and windings, and so many places which go one into another, of which all the ornaments are uniform, that 'tis impoſſible to find the right way. Upon this spacious base of above twelve hundred feet square, stand five great Pyramids one at each corner and the fifth in the midſt. They are triangular, and are sixty feet broad at the base, and a hundred and fifty high. Upon the point of every of these Pyramids is plac'd a Copper-Globe of prodigious greatneſs, contriv'd so artificially, that the wind entring into it at several holes which are seen in it, makes a sufficiently agreeable harmony, which is heard at a good distance. Upon the top of each Globe is a kind of Obelisk, and upon it is seen another harmonious Globe like the former, according as the wind moves that which makes the harmony: and upon this Globe appear four other Pyramids of a hundred feet in height. But do not think I am at the end of my description; for these four Pyramids support a great terras, upon which stand five other Pyramids as high as all the rest of the Tomb, so that the points of them seeming to touch the Skie, make a very magnificent spectacle. 'Tis true (said Æmilius) this Tomb is the statelieſt thing in the World, and 'tis true also that the gallant house of the illuſtrious Cleonymus will be the goodlieſt place of the earth when it shall be finiſh'd. As for Cleonymus (answer'd Amilcar) I know he is a man of extraordinary merit, whose birth is very noble, whose imployments are the moſt considerable in Hetruria, whose heart is perfectly great, virtue sublime, and capacity infinite. But I confeſs I have not given too much credit to all that Lucilius and Theomenes told me once concerning the fair house you speak of. Nevertheleſs 'tis true (reply'd Theanor) that there is nothing handsomer in the world. As they were discoursing thus, they arriv'd at a place where they were to refreſh their horses, so that they were constrain'd to stay there. This place was so wild, the prospect of it so bounded and little agreeable, and the reception so incommodious, that having taken but a slight repaſt, they went to seat themselves on certain stones which were at the foot of a steep mountain near that place. They were no sooner there, but Amilcar beginning to speak, I beseech you, Theanor, (said he) fill my imagination with handsome idea's, by the description of the goodly house of Cleonymus: for my eyes are so little delighted with what they behold, that I have great need of your help: beſides, I love nothing more than the representation of handsome objects, and I assure you I shall be much oblig'd to you for it. For the generous Melintha being friend to Cleonymus, I intereſt my self already in every thing which relates to him, I shall tell you then that Valterra (said Theanor) — But Volterra (interrupted Amilcar) is, as I conceive, a great city sufficiently remote from Cluſium. You say true (answer'd Theanor) but I said Valterra, and not Volterra: 'Tis true, these two names are near alike, and Valterra bears a name resembling that of that famous City you speak of, (which was founded by the Tyrrhenians, as well as Areſſa and Cluſium) because this City has so many waters about it, that there is no gate or place in which there are not fountains; so that the conformity of the waters has occasion'd the resemblance of the names. But to proceed: when you require the description of Valterra, you demand a thing of greater difficulty than you imagine; because this place has so many surpriſing beauties, that they cannot be conceiv'd without being seen, nor represented well after having admir'd them. It was begun and finiſh'd by a man who does nothing but what is great, and the vaſt extent of whose mind is not capable of framing small designs: by a man, I say, who devoting his whole life to the service of his King, will have even his pleasures serve to the embelliſhment and glory of his country. But though he employ in the building of Valterra only such hours as are neceſſary to recreate his mind from great cares, to which the welfare of the State engages him; yet at the same time he is making a thing which one would believe could not but take up his whole life. For it is not to be imagin'd that Valterra is one of those places which are embelliſht almost by Nature alone; but 'tis no hyperbole to say Cleonymus has absolutely chang'd it, and there is no part of it to which he has not added some new grace. He has divided a River into a thousand fountains, he has re-united a thousand fountains into torrents, and he has so judiciously contriv'd every thing which he has done at Valterra, that the judgment of him cannot be sufficiently extoll'd, who knew so well how to intermingle the beauties of Art with those of Nature, and so induſtriously to divertiſe all the ornaments of so goodly a place. 'Tis true, this handsome Desart being design'd for the habitation of one of the faireſt persons in the world, ought to be such as it is, to be worthy of her; for you muſt know, the prudent Artemira wife of the illuſtrious Cleonymus has one of those grand Beauties which continually encrease admiration: and that which I esteem moſt, is, her virtue redoubles the price of her beauty; for, as wanton a person as you are, I am confident you will grant that these two things suit admirably well together. I confeſs it (answer'd Amilcar) therefore tell me a little more particularly what you know of the fair Artemira. Ha! Amilcar (reply'd Theanor) I tremble only in thinking that I have undertaken to describe Gardens and Fountains to you; judge then what I should do if I should undertake to tell you all the Grand qualities, and all the virtues of one of the moſt accompliſh'd persons in the World. Be contented therefore if I perform my promiſe to describe Valterra. But before I tell you, what it is at present, I muſt relate a little adventure to you, which is neceſſary that you know, to underſtand the description I am to make.

Know then, that a fair and young person, Kinswoman to the King of Hetruria and much lov'd by him, sometimes hapned to excite love in a man of Quality, of a violent and imperious humor; who judging that he could never be favour'd, resolv'd to carry his Miſtreſs away by force. Which accordingly he did one day as she was walking in a Grove; and diverting her self by causing a Squirrel to follow her from tree tree to tree, which she had kept from a little one, and which lov'd her with more ardour than a Dog can have for his Master, though the Dog is an Emblem of Fidelity amongst all Nations. This violent act much surpris'd the whole Court, and especially an honourable person of Clusium, whose name was Cleoranthus, and from whom the illustrious Cleonymus who built Valterra is descended; for you must know, he was very amorous of her, though he durst not declare it by reason of the King. But in this unexpected occasion, he could not hide his sentiments. Wherefore suddenly gathering together some of his Dependants, he went to seek this stoln Lady. The King also sent out most of his Court to the same purpose, and went himself; but this search was made unprofitable, and Cleoranthus had been as unhappy as the rest, if the Chance which guided him to a Cottage of Shepherds had not shew'd him the little Squirrel which his Mistress lov'd so much, and which stuck to her in spight of her Ravishers. At first he believ'd it was another; but the little Animal knowing him, skipt down from the window where it was with that nimbleness which is natural to it. Whereby Cleoranthus, believing his Mistress might be there, or at least had pass'd by that way, askt a young Shepherdess where she was to whom this pretty Animal belong'd. He had no sooner made this question, but he who had carry'd away that fair Virgin (coming from enquiring the way he was to take, because he had fail'd to meet his guide) appear'd with his Sword in his hand, follow'd by six of his Attendants; and at the same time four men, who had stay'd to guard that fair person, issu'd out of the Cottage with their Swords drawn too. But Cleoranthus, instead of being terrifi'd by so many enemies, became thereby more fierce and couragious. And so he attacqu'd his Rival with such valour, that notwithstanding the inequality of number, he slew his enemy, and three others, and put the rest to flight. After which, to compleat his happiness, he understood by one of those he wounded who lay upon the place, the secret of a great Conspiracy against the Prince. Thus Cleoranthus deliver'd his Mistress, and saved all Hetruria by his valour. But which was remarkable, at the end of the fight, the Squirrel made him a thousand caresses, and would not part from him. Wherefore when the King was inform'd of all the Circumstances of the business, and of Cleoranthus passion for this fair person (whom notwithstanding he restor'd into his power without signifying any thing of his love) was so mov'd with his Virtue, that he suppress'd the inclination himself had for her, and caus'd her to marry him. But to eternize the memory of this generous action, as Hector, Æneas, and many others since, caus'd Lyons, Roses, Doves, and divers other things agreeing either to their valour, merit, virtue or fortune, to be painted upon their shields, he order'd that Cleoranthus and his Descendants should bear a Squirrel for their Arms. And accordingly they of this Family bear a Squirrel in their shields to this day. I desire your pardon for having amus'd you with speaking of this adventure; but you will see in the sequel of my discourse, that I have not related it altogether impertinently. I am next to tell you that Valterra is situated half a days journy from Clusium, that the way between them is very pleasant, and that to encrease the surprize, the beauty of it is not perceiv'd till you arrive at the fore Court, which is stately, fair and spacious. It hath four great Pavilions at the four Corners, with other Courts on the two sides. The two faces which stand upon the stately Moats of Valterra, end in three great Archades of Architecture, through which are discover'd two large low Wings of Building, which have been built for Offices to the House, and two Gardens which lie on the side of those two Wings. When you are in the fore Court, you behold the front of the Palace, which is built upon a Mountain of Architecture (if I may so speak) for the Perroon which takes up the whole breadth of the second Court, has four seats, and rises above twenty steps. So that this gives much Majesty to the Structure. Which before I describe to you, I must lead you back again into the fore Court, and tell you, that after you have pass'd through it, you come to the Bank of the Moats which are large, handsome, and the water of them clear as Crystal, and arises from a Spring. These Moats are beset with Rails on both sides; and near the Bridge which lies over them, are seen the Muzzles of Lyons casting out water into three Scalop Basins, which shed it one into another till it fall into the Moats. When you have pass'd the Bridge, and come into the midst of a little half Moon adorn'd with Rails, you may see that the second Court, which is very large and handsom, has a terrass on two sides rais'd three steps, upon which are plac'd two spirting Fountains, which make a very handsom shew in that place. For when you are at the end of the Bridge, there is nothing more stately and magnificent than to see those handsome Moats full of water, the second Court the Balustrades, the spirting Fountains, and that great and magnificent Perroon which crosses the whole Court, rising so Majestically, and upon which is seen in the middle of the Palace a great Porch of three stately Arches supported by six Pillars, which suffer the sight to penetrate through the whole thickness of the Palace by three other Arches opposite to the three first, and three other likewise opposite to the second; so that the Skie appearing at several overtures, this sight is the more agreeable. In the midst of the Porch are seen two very handsome Statues of young Children taming Lyons, to imitate that innocence atchieves every thing; and the Arms of Cleonymus, such as I have represented them to you by relating the glorious adventure of one of his Ancestors. The Cupolo which arises in the midst of the Building, is very magnificent, and so are the Busts, and the carv'd works wherewith this Palace is adorn'd in divers places. But when you have ascended the Perroon, and are arriv'd at the Porch, you find it handsomer than you imagin'd; for the proportion of it is exact and noble, it is supported by twelve pillars of a very handsome order of Architecture. From thence you behold with pleasure the two fair Courts you pass'd through: but, which is a greater grace, you enter upon an even pavement into the goodliest Hall that ever was. For its greatness astonishes the imagination, its height surprises, and its beauty is so great, that it takes away the boldness to commend it. The Cupolo is supported by sixteen stately Arches, whereof six are open, namely three towards the Porch, and three toward the Gardens, which are admirable. But how rare soever they are, I must stay you a little in the Hall, and at least shew you the first apartment of this proud Fabrick. I must also tell you that for the glory of this great design, Cleonymus has been so happy as to find an excellent man capable to execute his great intentions, and happily to invent whatever might serve to the embellishment of so goodly a place. He I speak of, is call'd Meleander, and is the same that painted the Cabinet of the generous Melintha. He was born with a great wit, an exquisite fancy, and an admirable judgment. His Idea's are noble and natural, there is grandeur in his designs, and reason always in what he makes. Therefore he was chosen by Cleonymus to paint this proud Hall, and all the several apartments of his Palace; and also to use his inventions and counsels for all such things as might imbellish Valterra. But since his aim is always to work for the glory of him that employs him, see what the design of the Hall is, of which I will unfold to you the hidden sense after I have given you the description. The Sun is represented there in his Palace with all the Ornaments Poets attribute him; the whole Base of the Piece is encompass'd with a great Serpent representing the year; upon this Serpent move the months, the weeks and the days; every season is accompani'd with the months, weeks and days which agree to it; and all the Stars are seen there, which the Sun visits in making his course. But in the midst of this proud Palace of the Sun (the Architecture of which is admirable, and the Pillars resemble precious stones, and the Basis and Chapters gold) is seen upon a proud arch a Throne of Gold rais'd several steps, upon which the Hours, daughters of the Sun mount and descend. They are represented like young fair persons, habited in different and light dresses. This luminous God is cloathed with a cloak of cloath of Gold, he is crown'd with an immortal Laurel, he leans with one hand upon his harp, and with the other he makes a sign to Aurora as if he commanded something; for his eyes are turn'd towards her. This fair harbinger of the Sun has a garland of Flowers and Pearls upon her head; she has wings painted with fine colours; with one hand she scatters flowers in divers places, and with the other she holds a torch, which she makes use of to illuminate a New Star by the command of the Sun. This new Star is plac'd in the midst of the Heaven in form of a Squirrel, three higher stars give it their most favorable influences. Saturn bearing his sickle encompasseth it with his Serpent beset with Stars, which denotes the eternity of its glory. Jupiter sitting upon his Eagle with a very noble action and Majestical air gives it a Crown of gold, to signifie the Authority which it is to have. Mars on the other side with his fierce aspect gives it a Helmet and a Lyon. Below the Sun appears the Season which represents Summer, crown'd with ears of Corn, her Complexion is a little Sunburnt, her hair is guilded, her air is very agreeable; she carelesly sits and leans upon such fruits as are suitable to her, and near her are seen several instruments necessary to Agriculture. She holds a sheaf of Wheat in her hand, and is supported by a swarthy man who represents the South Wind. About her stand the Moneths which belong to her, represented by young persons crown'd with flowers and fruits; they have Wings, their Attires are different, and they present fruits to this lovely Season, as well as the weeks and days which are represented by little children who seem to move along as they play near her. In another place Mercury appearing with all the marks that particularize him, lifting up his arm wherewith he holds his Caduce, seems as if he would give all his eloquence and knowledge to the New Star I mention'd, he looks upon it so favourably. About this God are seen several instruments necessary for excellent Arts, and likewise divers little Cupids denoting the various inclination which Nature gives. The Moon, not being able to behold her Brother, appears through the shadow of a Cloud, and about her is seen a great hunting equipage, as dogs, bugles, bows, arrows, and divers other things, and in many places little Genii agreeably represented; this fair Star regards the new Star as favorably as Mercury. On another side Venus follow'd by Sports and Laughter appears lying upon a bed of Roses; and near her are seen divers things which agree to her, and which are always inseparable from pleasures. She holds a golden Apple in her hand, seeming to offer it to this new Star, as if she meant, that it was such amongst the Stars as her self amongst the Goddesses. Also several little Cupids are seen playing near her. The Spring is represented by a Young fair Girl, with a fresh and smiling air, her hair is brown and curl'd, she has a crown of flowers upon her head, her attire is green; the Months which are near her, present flowers to her, Zephyrus flatters her, and the weeks and days busie themselves in embellishing her. Autumn is figur'd by a good lusty man, crown'd with Vine-leaves, he lies amongst fruits which are proper to him, and leans upon a Tyger, the Moneths which accompany him offer him their fruits also, they are attended likewise with their weeks and days, and the Wind of this Season is represented there also, but more fierce than the rest, and the drapery of the figure shews that he inconveniences him by his impetuous blast. On the side opposite to Summer is represented the Bow of Iris with all the Colours that render it so agreeable. Under this Bow appears Winter represented by a rough old man, crown'd with mists, snow, and icycles. The Moneths, weeks and days which accompany him offer him nothing but unpleasing presents, except some of those days which are very little, and offer him fire. On the side of the Bow I mentioned, are Castor and Pollux, who mount and descend upon the Horizon: but I must not forget to tell you that in all places where that famous Squirrel is represented, either in a Star, or in its natural form, there is a device added to it which is very graceful in the language in which it was made; and the sense of it is, That there is nothing so high whereto it cannot mount. But now to expound to you the hidden meaning of all these Pictures, I am to tell you that the Sun represents Cleonymus, who according to the amplitude of his great employments, operates and shines every where, does good to all, and labours continually for the benefit and embellishing of the Universe. By the four Seasons of the year, Meleander has pretended to represent the several States of Hetruria which are tributary, and attribute the honour to Cleonymus of receiving and rendring all, because he has the management of the Princes treasures. The new Star in the top of the Skie, shews that there is nothing more sublime than the glory of Cleonymus; and that Starry Serpent I spoke of, denotes the prudence of this Heroe: so that the Pictures of this proud Hall, satisfie together both the Eyes and the Reason, and serve at the same time both to the glory of this Heroe, and that of the excellent Meleander, who has so well found out the art to commend him by his Pencils more than Poetry could do. But to pass from the Hall to the anti-Chamber, upon the top of the sieling you see Hercules carried into the heavens in a Chariot of gold, under which is a slain Serpent. Reason (represented by a fair young person of a sage aspect) guides him; she has a helmet on her head, and holds a sword wherewith she seems to menace: two fierce and heady horses withdraw the chariot that carries him, and by their impetuous posture intimate that they represent the Passions, Paſſions, who in ſpight of their violence are nevertheleſs ſubjected to Reaſon. They have both a duskie brightneſs in their eyes. But there is one eſpecially, whoſe mane ſtands erected, and who lifts up his head fiercely, whoſe piercing, lively and furious eyes caſt a fiery glance which aſtoniſhes and ſurpriſes ſuch as have skill in Painture. Fame is painted flying there, and ſeeming as if ſhe would deſcend to the earth; and in a very bright part of the heaven appears Jupiter and the other Gods preparing to receive this Heroe, who is follow'd by Glory, putting an Oaken Garland upon his head. But what is rare in this Piece, is, that in whatever part of the chamber you ſtand, this Hercules ſeems to behold you as naturally in one place as in another. But I do not conſider that I trouble you by not being able to repreſent theſe admirable Pieces but imperfectly. Yet I would further tell you ſomething of the principal chamber: but to ſpeak truth, I have ſeen ſo handſome and admirable a deſcription of it, that I cannot but tremble to attempt it. For indeed I never ſaw any thing ſo handſome as that which a certain Virtuoſo has writ upon this Subject; deſcribing things ſo to the life, that you would think you beheld them with your eyes; and though he imploys almoſt all the terms of Art, yet his diſcourſe is clear, florid, eloquent and natural.

Oh! I beſeech you, (ſaid Amilcar) tell me all that you have ſeen in that magnificent Palace; for I never ſaw the handſome deſcription you commend ſo much; and if I return into Africa ſhortly, (as I expect) I ſhall not ſee it in a long time. If you were to ſee it, (anſwer'd Theanor) I would reſolve not to content your curioſity; for beſides that the deſcription I ſhall make of it will be much leſs exact and ample than that, being I have the ſame things to deſcribe, and Painture has certain peculiar terms which cannot be omitted, you would accuſe me of a crime which I have no deſign to commit, and preſently imagine that I intended only to copy it out, and deprive him of the commendations he has ſo juſtly merited. But however, ſince you deſire it (continu'd he) I ſhall tell you, that the famous Meleander aiming always at the glory of his Heroe, has in the roof of this chamber repreſented Fidelity carry'd up by her powerful Genius into heaven. This Figure is very handſome, habited in white with a blew Robe, and has ſeveral marks which make her known: Prudence conducts her, Virtue and Reaſon are of each ſide of her admirably repreſented; the latter ſeems to perſonate Apollo ſhooting with his Bowe againſt Envie and divers other monſters which hide themſelves in the thickneſs of the clouds. Under theſe Figures is Clio, one of the moſt famous Muſes; ſhe ſeems to bear her ſelf up in the air with great wings diſplay'd; ſcarce any thing is ſeen of her but her back; her Robe is of the colour of Gold, and beneath it another flying clothing of a different colour. This Muſe helps to carry up Fidelity into heaven, and holds a Trumpet to publiſh that there is nothing whereto the fidelity of Cleonymus cannot attain. This Piece being in the midſt of the chamber, is the principal deſign of the Painter; all the reſt which encompaſs it, ſuit with it, and depend of it. The moſt ingenious contrivance is, that this excellent Painter has by his Art made the whole roof of the chamber appear a great and ſtately body of building, with the goodlieſt ornaments that Painture and Sculpture have invented. For having drawn five large overtures, one in the midſt, and the others on the four ſides, five admirable Pieces are repreſented in them, which perfectly embelliſh the room. But beſides theſe Pieces, the Figures plac'd upon this ſeeming ſtructure are the handſomeſt in the world. For the eight famous ſiſters of Clio are painted on the four ſides of the chamber, and ſeem to make a concert of praiſes in honour of him whom Fidelity repreſents. But they are ſo exquiſite, that nothing can be ſeen in the world more admirable. All their heads have different airs, their actions correſpond with what they repreſent, and they have a certain aſpect of divinity which excites reſpect. Theſe Figures are plac'd near four baſe-reliefs of the colour of braſs, beſet with ſeveral magnificent ornaments. For in this place are ſeen four different Poems repreſented by different figures. The Satyrical is repreſented by a Satyre lying along; he leans upon a great Urn, and has a young child before him, who ſhews him three words written upon a Table which declare what he is. Below this baſe-relief are ſeen divers excellent ornaments, wherein the Squirrel and the Device are conveniently plac'd: for there is an antique Urn of lapis Lazuli; upon that an Eagle, upon the Eagle a Squirrel, and on both ſides of the Urn very jolly Cupids and Garlands, which falling down upon the Eagles back, ſlide from thence very gracefully. The other baſe-reliefs are like, excepting the Poems. That which treats only of Ruſtical things, is repreſented by the God Pan; the Heroick, by a ſtately and handſome man holding a Trumpet in his hand; the Lyrick, by a fair Virgin holding a Harp. Each of theſe Figures has a little Cupid like the firſt, and each Poem has two Muſes which accompany it. Melpomene and Thalia are near the Satyrick. The former (to whom the invention of Tragedy is attributed) has fierceneſs and melancholy in her eyes: her attire is ſuitable to her quality, and her geſture and air ſpeak her mind employ'd about great thoughts and events: and to denote her chief ſubject, Trumpets, Helmets, Shields and Crowns (mingled together with a confuſion more agreeable than order) are ſeen near her. As for the Muſe deſign'd for Comedy, ſhe has a pretty, ſcornful, chearful and ſmiling air. Her head is crown'd with Ivie, and her neck bare; ſhe has rich bracelets, and a large blew robe, which is very graceful to her. She holds a Vizard in her hand, and has another at her feet which reſembles a Satyre, and near her lie like Trophies all the inſtruments proper for Bacchanals. Near the Poem deſtinated to country-matters, ſtand Terpſichore and Euterpe; one holding a kind of harp, the other a flute, on which ſhe ſeems to play. The former has a noble air, the other ſomewhat ruſtick and wild: their habits are agreeable, and the variety of colours does not interrupt that union which is requiſite to all good Pictures. Near theſe Muſes are ſeen books, maps, hoboys and bagpipes. The Heroick Poem has Calliope and Urania by it: the former having a book in her hand, and the latter leaning upon one of thoſe Globes which a Diſciple of the wiſe Thales invented, holds a pair of Compaſſes in the other hand. Calliope has a ſage and majeſtical air; and Urania fixing her eyes upon the heavens, ſeems to obſerve the courſe of the Stars, and mind nothing elſe. Polyhymnia and Erato are plac'd near the Lyrick Poem; the firſt chiefly deſtinated to Painture, has near her all the inſtruments requiſite to that excellent Art: her habit is mix'd of ſeveral colours; ſhe has a nobler air, and the geſture of a perſon ſtudying to enterprize ſome great work in Painture. Erato has piercing eyes, & a very pleaſant aſpect; at her feet are ſeen divers Muſical inſtruments, and a little Cupid crown'd with flowers, holding before her an ancient fashion'd harp, such as they report Orpheus sometimes made use of to save himself. But to manifest the ingenuity of the Painter, I must tell you they have no wings, as Clio has who helps to conduct Fidelity into heaven; because he would intimate hereby, that they ought to stay eternally in the glorious sanctuary Cleonymus has given them. The Painter has also feign'd that they made two Pieces of needle-work representing their two Victories over the Pierides and the Syrens; but this is done with so much art that it cannot be sufficiently commended. Besides, all that I have related, all the ornaments which Painture and Sculpture have invented are seen in this place. For in divers places, where the order of Architecture permitted, are vizards, garlands, urns, sphinxes, and several other things. But it is remarkable that there is not one but has some Mystery, intimating the virtues or glory of Cleonymus to such as understand the meaning given to such various figures. So that the Painter cannot be too much commended who has so well fanci'd and finished so good a design, wherein appears Invention, Judgment, Boldness, and good Sense. It is manifest throughout that he is not only a great Imitator of Nature, but also understands the Art of embellishing; and that his imaginations surpass her Productions. All that is seen in these rare Pictures alike delight the Eyes and the Reason. Never were Light and Shadow so judiciously dispos'd, never was the sight deceived after a more agreeable manner. All the little Cupids are excellently done, the Head-tires of the Muses are admirable, the Draperies are perfectly well suted, Modesty is visible even in the Figures, which the Painter has habited very negligently. The Objects which appear nearest, deceive the Eyes; the more remote surprise the Imagination: in fine, all the workmanship both of the Hall and the two Chambers, deserves more commendations than can be given it. But now not to stay to tell you of the Cabinet, or all the other apartments of this proud Palace, wherein are a thousand handsome objects, with which the famous Meleander has embellisht it, either by his workmanship or a thousand ingenious inventions which cannot be expres'd, I must return into the stately Hall, and describe to you the Gardens of so goodly a Place. But I must tell you first, that the face of the house on this side is very different from the former; so is the Perroon, but withal stately and commodious. The Moats are environ'd with rails too as the other; and from hence you discover so great and vast an extent of several green-plats, so many large and handsome Walks, so many spirting Fountains, and so many delightful objects which become confused by their distance, that you scarce know what you see, because the multitude of agreeable sights amazes the imagination, and hinders the eyes from fixing upon any at first. For curiosity being a natural sentiment, we do not so much mind that which we might easily discern, as that which we cannot distinguish; so true it is that we love to discover things to our selves. 'Tis to be observed that this Garden lies between two Groves which agreeably arrest the Eyes: but to describe it to you part by part, I must tell you, that when you are at the end of the Bridge, you see at a good distance towards the right hand and the left two spirting Fountains standing in two very solitary corners, and seeming to hide themselves; and before you, great Green-plats with Fountains, a round Pond in the middle, and on either side in the nearest squares three Fountains, whose artificial water-works agreeably divert the eyes, especially one towards the left hand, where is seen a crown of fruit bushes (if I may so speak.) The Basin of it is rustick enough, but you would say it is sufficiently adorn'd with its own agreeableness. About the round Pond I mention'd are four little Cupids holding scallop-lavers upon their heads, from which the water falls with a continual murmur into little squares environ'd with green. On each side of the Pond are seen great green squares which reach to the two Groves, and have fountains in them also. On the right hand is seen at a good distance a cullis'd-Gate leading into a rustick Orchard, and on the left a Cascade representing a kind of grate of Water, to correspond to the true grate which is opposite to it. Beyond the Pond you descend by another Perroon, and have two conduits casting forth water on the right hand. In this place at the crossing of a Walk stand four handsom Statues; but to increase the delightfulness, a little further in that Walk are two little Torrents with Jets of water at several distances one into another which look like a Balustrade of crystal running on both sides of the Walk. And nothing is more pleasant than to hear the murmurs of all these Jets of water, whose equality of delightful harmony is very apt to produce an agreeable amusement. When you are at the end of this Walk, you find a large square of water, and discover a little solitary place, above which stands a small wild Grove. Directly before you, you see a great and handsom spectacle which I shall describe to you by and by, and on the right side of the Mount which I am to describe, Vines and divers other Country objects. Beyond that great square of water you see an object perfectly surprising. For standing upon the Perroon which leads further downwards, you see a fair stream of water from which a hundred Jets issue with an equal force, and falling again into the Channel make an agreeable murmur. And a little beyond, you see another less, which may be call'd a Walk of Crystal. For there are an infinite number of Jets of water in a double rank, which crossing one another make an extreme delightful shew. Nevertheless, this is not the goodliest ornament of this place; for below this Walk of Crystal you see a long Terrass of good height, four long rows of scallop-lavers full of water, of unequal bigness, which exonerating one into another make you see a hundred torrents at once, and at length discharge themselves into a great stream of water, from whence issue fifty other Jets with violence. Next you come to see a great and large Channel made by a River which was scarce known before Cleonymus chose this admirable Desart for a retreat to recreate his mind from his honourable employments. It precipitates it self like a mighty torrent, and then having calmly pass'd through the whole breadth of the Garden of Volterra, it goes forth by a Cascade, and afterwards loses it self in the Meadows. So that in a very little space it is a River, Torrent, Channel, Cascade, and Brook. But to render this place more marvellous, you see beyond, an Abyss of water (if I may so speak) in the midst of which by the directions of Meleander has been plac'd a figure of Galatea with a Cyclops playing on a bagpipe, and divers Tritons round about him; all these figures cast forth water, and make a very handsome sight. There are also other water-works in this

this place; and ſeveral ſpirting fountains. But which is moſt agreeable, all this great extent of water is cover'd with little painted and guilded Boats, and from thence you enter into the Channel. Now you muſt know that on the ſide oppoſite to the Caſcade I mention'd, there is cut out a great Mount in a direct line, which is made in a Terraſs with a Baluſtrade, ſupported by ſix Terms or Pillars. Between which are artificial Rocks always cover'd with water, and at the foot of theſe Rocks is a kind of little Chanel into which that water trickles agreeably. On the right ſide of theſe Rocks the Tyber is repreſented, as Rivers uſe to be, that is, half lying along and leaning upon his Urn; but he ſeems melancholy, as if he were diſcontented for being ſurpaſs'd by the River of the place, which is ſeen repreſented on the other ſide with a chearful and pleaſant aſpect. But I muſt not forget to tell you that in theſe Chanels and the abyſs of water are ſeen Statues upon great Pedeſtals repreſenting the ſeveral parts of the world, having in them the moſt precious things of the Countrys which they repreſent, which they carry as it were to pay tribute; to denote that the whole earth has contributed to embelliſh this place. But the better to enjoy the ſight and admire ſo many handſome objects at once, you muſt aſcend up the Mount by two ſtately Perroons made like an Amphitheatre, which have alſo ſix very goodly fountains of different forms. About the midſt, at the Baſe of the Baluſtrade are ſeen two great Lyons, which by Meleander's contrivance ſhew after a particular manner the Arms of Cleonymus; for the Squirrel is ſeen betwen the paws of the Lyons, but ſo that 'tis manifeſt theſe cruel Animals have nothing but gentleneſs and kindneſs for it. When you come to the end of the Mount a large green round of water ſurpriſes you, in the midſt of which ariſes as by miracle a Jet of water fifty feet high, of ſo prodigious and extraordinary a greatneſs, that it would ſeem a thick pillar of Cryſtal, if the motion did not convince the eyes. And to denote that it is the laſt piece of this great and excellent workmanſhip, there is plac't beyond it a handſome ſtatue of Hercules reſting himſelf after all his Labours which are repreſented in ſculpture upon the Pedeſtal. In this place ſeats are built to behold ſo many rare things the more commodiouſly, which appear ſo much the more excellent, for that from thence alſo divers plain and ruſtick objects are ſeen. For on both ſides you ſee two rude proſpects and a little Temple amongſt the Trees. This Mount has Walks on each ſide, and graſs in the middle, and from thence you have a fairer ſight of the building than from any other place, with the two back-wings which belong to it, the two Garden-plats which are on both ſides, the vaſt compaſs of the great Garden between the two Groves, all the divers ſpirting Fountains, the Chanels, the Squares of Water, the Caſcades, and thoſe too which are on the ſide of the Garden for Flowers, which is before one of the Wings. Hence alſo is diſcovered a thing which has been happily invented by the famous Meleander; for whereas Cleonymus has ſeveral ancient rarities, and eſpecially two Figures of Stone, which are ſaid to have ſerv'd for the Sepulture of the firſt Kings of Libya; in a little irregular corner of ground he has caus'd two Pyramids to be built, in imitation of thoſe which are near Memphis; to the end to place in them all ſuch kind of rarities as he poſſeſſes. So that the ſight of theſe Pyramids together with that of ſo many excellent and different objects takes away all thought of regretting that this place has not one of thoſe proſpects in which Rivers and Seas are diſcover'd, and in which the eyes are oftner wearied than diverted. For every thing that is ſeen in this admirable Deſart is agreeable, the eyes cannot ſtray but with delight. Nevertheleſs, you muſt not imagine that I have deſcribed all the Beauties of this place to you; for I am confident I have omitted very many; and beſides, to ſpeak truth, Valterra is but in its infancie (if I may ſo ſpeak) and there will be ſo much difference between what it is now, and what it will be one day, as there is between a fair Virgin when ſhe is but twelve years old and when ſhe is eighteen. And yet 'tis hard to imagine that any thing can be added to it; and when any-one walks there, he ſo forgets himſelf that he cannot retire. Indeed (as it is fit to return to the ſource of things) in this Garden one cannot but think with pleaſure on the worth and virtue of him that has render'd it ſuch as it is, who in his great employments has diſplay'd all the grand Qualities of his wit and courage, and who by his juſtice, humanity, and magnificence has found the art to oblige the happy and miſerable, and to be the Protector of all virtuous perſons, ill-treated by fortune, as well as of the Sciences and excellent Arts.

Ha! Theanor (ſaid Amilcar perceiving he had done ſpeaking) I am infinitely oblig'd to you for having ſo well deſcrib'd Valterra; I confeſs, I am charm'd with it; the beauties of the Vally of Tempe are not comparable to thoſe you have deſcrib'd, the Country of Elis has nothing that approaches them; Athens, Corinth, Thebes, Carthage, Babylon, and Rome have nothing ſo admirable; nor does all the Earth afford a more excellent place. But how rare ſoever it be, I ſhould rather chuſe to have the mind and capacity of Cleonymus than his fair Houſe.

After this, Æmilius having confirm'd that which Theanor had related, they went to Horſe again. But becauſe they had ſtay'd a very long time in that place they were overtaken by night. So that in the midſt of a thick Wood Amilcar unawares ſeparated himſelf from Theanor and Æmilius. He ſtray'd two or three miles; but at length the Moon riſing, he found the right way again, and ſaw he was not far from Preneſte which he perceiv'd upon the top of a hill. Which hill has this particularity, that being environ'd with divers others leſs high, all their tops ſeem to form a kind of a Crown, which makes a very handſom ſight; and therefore ſome affirm that this place was heretofore call'd Stephane which ſignifies a Crown; and others Polyſtephane which ſignifies in Greek many Crowns; for Preneſte was of a Greek foundation, and built (as the inhabitants pretend) by a ſon of Ulyſſes and Circe: but others aſcribe its foundation to another cauſe. But be it how it will, Amilcar arriving there obſerv'd the hope of Peace began to revive commerce; for there was an infinite number of ſtrangers there, and all places appointed for the lodging of ſuch as came to conſult the Lots were ſo full, that he could not be entertain'd there. So he went to the Quarters of Telantus, who receiv'd him very civilly, and there he found one of the moſt intimate Friends of the illuſtrious Amalthea, whoſe name was Cleontus ſon of the ſage Timantus, and who by his virtue and a thouſand excellent Qualities deſerv'd the eſteem of all that knew him. And therefore Amilcar was very joyful to ſee him and embrace him. I did not think (ſaid Telantus, obſerving in what manner they convers'd together) two perſons of ſo contrary humors, humors, could have been ſuch pleaſant company together. No, no (anſwer'd Amilcar) do not deceive your ſelf by apparences: Cleontus has indeed a ſerious air, a wiſe, and ſufficiently melancholy deportment; but for all this ſeeming coldneſs, if you conſider his eyes well, you will oftentimes ſee a judicious ſmile there, which will convince you that he does not hate mirth in another ſo much as you believe. I know well (added he) he is more Philoſopher than I, he paſſes better with ſolitude, he would Sacrifice all the pleaſures of the world for glory, and will have Reaſon be abſolute Miſtreſs of his life. But for all this he complyes with ſuch a friend as I; and though he ſuffers not folly in his own heart, yet he ſuffers it in that of a Friend, provided it be innocent and agreeable; in a word, it may be ſaid Cleontus is capable of being whatever he pleaſes. He would be very apt to be extremely amorous if he pleas'd, he would be ambitious if he were minded, he is learned becauſe he would be ſo, he makes Verſes as well as Anacreon, he is able to make Laws of Friendſhip; and, in fine, I know nothing which he could not diſcharge with applauſe. But wiſdom (added Amilcar) is his Maſter-piece. He might be even as violent as Timantus, though he appears always ſerene, but he likes better to preſerve an even and an equal temper, which indeed is very amiable. You ſee (anſwer'd Cleontus ſmiling) that to verifie what you ſay, I hear my own praiſes quietly; but to divert you from them, I will inform you that the charming Niece of Amalthea is married, and I was at a little Feaſt which preceeded her Nuptials, and was the moſt jovial one in the world. I beſeech you (ſaid Amilcar) make me underſtand all that you know of that charming perſon. She has married (anſwer'd Cleontus) a man of high Quality, who is tall, well proportion'd, and has a very good aſpect; he is call'd Perianthus; he began to go to the War in the fourteenth year of his age, ſo that though he is yet but two and twenty, he has ſerv'd eight Campagnes already with honor. In the firſt encounter he was preſent at, he was wounded and taken priſoner; but this did not diſcourage him, but on the contrary, he lov'd glory the better. But it is not to be wonder'd that he is couragious, of a brave genius, and mov'd with a great number of excellent Qualities, for he is ſon of a man whoſe reputation for Valour and Gallantry is known over all the World; and in fine, that fair Clariſta could not have a better match. I am very glad to underſtand this agreeable news (reply'd Amilcar) but to ſpeak freely, I cannot believe that a Marriage-Feaſt could have been agreeable; therefore you will do me a pleaſure to tell me the manner of that you ſpeak of. I will content your curioſity (anſwer'd Cleontus) Imagine then, that there was a Galeot painted, guilded, and adorn'd with Streamers, in which there was an Anti-chamber and a Chamber curiouſly painted and guilded. The pavement of the Chamber of the Poope was white blew, the Tapiſtry green and ſilver. The Company was in theſe three places, and the Muſick was towards the Prow. We departed from the City about evening, and went to a fair Houſe belonging to the Young Prince of Syracuſa; where we arriv'd a little before night. There we were entertain'd with a ſumptuous feaſt, in which was both order and abundance; after which we walk'd in the Gardens by the noiſe of fountains which was mix'd with Muſick and Diſcourſe; and for a happy preſage of this Love, it thunder'd and lightned as long as the Company was upon the way returning home: and which was remarkable, aſſoon as we were arriv'd, there follow'd a terrible rain; ſo that it may be ſaid Heaven had a kind reſpect for us. The great commendation of this Feaſt was, it had nothing at all of Ceremony, no more than the Marriage-day. For this ſecond Feaſt was made with ſuch order and magnificence in the ſtately Palace of Amalthea, that never was any ſeen better contriv'd. Since that admirable Lady had the ordering of it (anſwer'd Amilcar) I believe all that you ſay; for ſhe can never do any thing but what is worthy to be admir'd. But I admire her chiefly for the choice of her friends, for certainly the ſentiments of people are beſt known thereby; and according to the humor I am of, I ſhould more glory in being the friend of Amalthea, than the Favorite of a great King, that had no exquiſite judgment.

After this Amilcar inquir'd concerning Bereliſa, Clidamira, and Anacreon, and then of Mutius who was the occaſion of this journey. As for Bereliſa and Clidamira (anſwer'd Telantus) they are in perfect health; but they have not conſulted the Lots yet, becauſe 'tis the cuſtom to Sacrifice firſt. And as for Anacreon, he was made an Ode ſince he came hither, which is without doubt a very excellent one; the ſubject of it, is, That riches avail nothing againſt death. But, for Mutius, I can give you no information concerning him: not that 'tis impoſſible that he may be here without my knowing it; for ſo great a number of people have arriv'd within theſe two days, that he may eaſily be here and I not know ſo much. But if he is (added he) I ſhall ſoon know it; for to morrow all that would know their Deſtinies write their names; and ſo I promiſe you to give you an account in a little time. After this, Telantus thank'd Amilcar for having given him the knowledge of Bereliſa, Clidamira, and Anacreon; for ſince Fortune firſt drew unhappy perſons to Praneſte, there never arriv'd any here, whoſe converſation has been more charming; ſo that Bereliſa and Clidamira have already been viſited by all the Virtuoſo's of the City. Amilcar then having a new impatience to ſee theſe two amiable perſons, motion'd to Telantus to go thither after ſupper; and he not oppoſing the propoſal, they went together to viſit them. By the way, they met with Anacreon, who joyn'd himſelf with them: but when Amilcar enter'd into Bereliſa's chamber, he was much ſurpris'd to ſee ſo fair and great a company there; for there were eight or ten very amiable women, and almoſt as many men of quality, whoſe air and phyſiognomy ſpoke them ingenious, and in a corner an old Thuſcan Soothſayer, who was entertaining himſelf amongſt this great company. Bereliſa and Clidamira were very joyful to ſee Amilcar, and teſtifi'd as much to him in words extreme obliging. Their looks no doubt at firſt askt him news of Artemidorus; but their mouths enquir'd of the generous action of Clelia, of which they had already heard ſome confus'd report. Amilcar ſatisfi'd their curioſity; and to content them abſolutely, he employ'd his diſcourſe ſo, as that he many times nam'd Artemidorus, and that in ſuch a way, as gave them to underſtand that he was in better health than when they left Rome; he alſo found means to deliver a Letter of that Prince to Bereliſa without being obſerv'd. But after this, Amilcar a little more exactly conſider'd all this fair company than he had done: 'Tis certainly my good fortune which brought me hither (ſaid he) and I account it ſo much the better (added he) becauſe I find more than I expected.

expected. For I imagin'd, none but unfortunate people with melancholy faces were to be found at Praneſte; and yet I ſee fair perſons here, who have bright and ſparkling eyes, and agreeable aſpects; and men who have not the countenances of the unhappy. If all unfortunate perſons had pale complexions, ſunk eyes, and a melancholy air (anſwer'd Anacreon) not only this company which appears to you ſo fair, would not be ſuch, but all the world would ſeem terrible. For they who have no infelicities make themſelves ſome; and from the greateſt Kings in the world to the moſt miſerable ſlaves, all complain and murmure againſt Fortune: 'tis in vain that ſhe makes preſents to men; they turn her favours into poyſon, they have that within themſelves which deſtroys their felicity, and ſeeking it always without, they take no care to find it in their own hearts. Yet methinks (ſaid Amilcar) all that is needful to make men happy is in the Univerſe: but 'tis certainly (added he) their extravagant deſires tranſpoſing the order of things, cauſe them to be diſguſted with what they enjoy, and to wiſh that which they have not. That which you ſee is true (anſwer'd Telantus) but yet ſomething further muſt be added to it: for the cauſe that there are ſo few people happy, is, becauſe men make deſires to themſelves which Nature alone does not give them. What I ſay to you (added he) I ſay to my ſelf, and againſt my ſelf; ſince 'tis true that almoſt all men do not buſie themſelves only in ſeeking ſuch things as they have need of, and are fit for them, but chiefly ſuch as they believe the opinion of the world requires them to ſeek. So that without confining themſelves to follow Reaſon alone, they deſire to content that famous Chimera call'd Opinion, and mind more what will be ſaid of them if they do not advance themſelves above their Anceſtors, than their own quiet. How many men are there which would be contented with the patrimony of their fathers, if they did not think that their relations, their neighbours, and all that knew them, would eſteem them leſs in an indifferent than in a high fortune? and nevertheleſs theſe people who ſeek ſo much to content the opinion of others, deſire a thing impoſſible. For Opinion is the moſt mutable thing in the world; and if you would know how different the opinions of men are, it needs only to oblige all that are preſent to make Wiſhes; and I am confident, if all thoſe that compoſe this company, ſpeak ſincerely, you will obſerve ſo great a diverſity of opinions amongſt them, that you know it is ſufficiently difficult to be capable of happineſs. But ſeeing there is ſo great a variety of ſentiments (ſaid Bereliſa) how then can there be any certain opinion which is eſtabliſht in the world, and thenceforth holds the place of a Law? 'Tis becauſe the multitude of men (anſwer'd Amilcar) is ſo great, that there cannot be ſo great a number of contrary opinions as of men. So that ſuch as reſemble one another being united, there reſults from them a certain general opinion in every Nation, which prevails over the reſt. But this does not hinder but that even they who compoſe this opinion have opinions in a manner peculiar to themſelves. For my part (ſaid Clidamira) I do not believe that if all the company were oblig'd to wiſh ſomething, you would find ſo great a diverſity of wiſhes as you imagine: for I am perſwaded all the Ladies would wiſh for great beauty, and almoſt all the men to reign in ſome part of the world, and to be Kings. I do not agree to what you ſay (anſwer'd Amilcar) for as for my part, I ſpeak ſincerely, I would not be a King; and I ſhould account it more noble to wiſh to be worthy to be one; beſides, I know Royalty has a thouſand conſequences enemies to liberty, which would ſtrangely diſguſt me. For it muſt be had in mind, that Kings can never do any thing but what will be known, that the leaſt of their actions is publick, that they can ſcarce ever diſcern thoſe who love their condition from ſuch as love their perſons, that they ſeldom know the truth unleſs they divine it; that ceremony attends them every where; that they are always encompaſſed with ſelf-intereſted flatterers; that they never have any great pleaſures but openly, which to prudent perſons are many times great troubles: not to reckon the cares requir'd to the well-governing of a State, or the ſhame there is in governing it ill. But, which chiefly makes me averſe to be a King, is the thought, that it would never be permitted me to be idle. And yet an idle life has ſomething ſo ſweet in it, that I could never reſolve to renounce idleneſs, as I ought to do, to reign with glory. For if an idle Gallant were a King, and enjoy'd the ſame idleneſs, he would be a good-for-nought, unworthy of his dignity. Wonder not then, amiable Clidamira, if I am not of your mind. For my part (ſaid Anacreon) if I may adviſe, every one of us ſhall wiſh ſomething according to our inclinations, and we will leave Amilcar the liberty to condemn or approve the wiſhes we ſhall make; and after every one has declar'd their wiſhes, he ſhall tell his own. I account this propoſal of Anacreon a very agreeable motion (ſaid Bereliſa.) After which, all the company having approv'd it, Amilcar ſaid he would do as he was deſir'd; and turning himſelf towards a man of quality of Tarquinia, who was next him towards his right hand, he ask'd him what he wiſht. To be as rich as I would (anſwer'd he) for we have no deſires but we may ſatisfie with riches. You ſhould have added, (anſwer'd Amilcar) to be rich without being covetous: for without this circumſtance, your wiſh, inſtead of rendring you happy, would render you the ſlave of your treaſures. For my part (ſaid Clidamira) I am in haſte to tell that I would wiſh to be without contradiction the handſomeſt perſon in the world. You ought withal to have wiſh'd to be always ſuch (anſwer'd Amilcar) for I think there is nothing more difficult than for a perſon that has been perfectly a Fair, to inure her ſelf to bear contentedly the decay of her beauty: and beſides, you wiſh a thing impoſſible, when you wiſh to be without contradiction the handſomeſt perſon in the world; for every body judges of beauty according to their particular fancie; ſo that none can be univerſally acknowledg'd for the handſomeſt perſon in the world: moreover, amiable Clidamira, you would have a reign of too few years; for the greateſt beauty paſſes very ſwiftly away; and I account you more happy, to be infinitely charming, than to be infinitely handſome. You ſee (added he, ſmiling) I believe your words more than my own eyes; for if I gave credit to them, I ſhould tell you that you enjoy what you wiſh'd, and are the handſomeſt perſon in the world. However it be (ſaid ſhe) if you pleaſe, ask Bereliſa what ſhe wiſhes. To be very well lov'd, and not to love at all, or not much (anſwer'd ſhe, beholding Clidamira.) Ha! charming Bereliſa (anſwer'd Amilcar) you make the moſt unjuſt wiſh in the world: for what pleaſure would you have in being lov'd, if you did not love? conſider therefore, I beſeech you, and make a more equitable wiſh. For my part (ſaid a man of condition of Valterra, who had a pale countenance and a languiſhing air)

I ſhould wiſh to be always in moſt perfect health. Your wiſh is aſſuredly very good (anſwer'd Amilcar) for health is the beginning of all pleaſures: but when it is alone, 'tis a benefit we are not too ſenſible of, and ſometimes ſerves only to cauſe us more ardently to wiſh all the other pleaſures which we cannot enjoy. For my part (ſaid one of his friends who was next him, and had the meen of a brave man) I ſhould like well enough to be one of thoſe ſubduers of Monſters, like Hercules, who run through all the world with their ſwords in their hands, deſtroy Gyants, fight with Lyons, deliver raviſht Ladies, conquer Cities, relieve Kingdoms, and who though they travel without train or equipage, never have need of any thing. This is no doubt ſufficiently pleaſant (anſwer'd Amilcar) and if Herminius were here, he would be of this ſentiment; for he loves to do good to all the world; and he hates injuſtice ſo much, that he would take great delight in cauſing equity to reign every where, without having need of any thing beſides himſelf. But having well thought upon it, I find it ſufficiently difficult; and he is not a ſubduer of Monſters that deſires it, for all Monſters will not always ſuffer themſelves to be ſubdu'd. As for me (ſaid a Lady who had a very agreeable countenance and a melancholy air) I ſhould wiſh to be always with perſons whom I love, and never to ſee others. I perceive, Madam (ſaid Amilcar to her) you cannot but have a tender heart, and I aſſure my ſelf you would not have been ſorry that theſe Verſes had been made for you.

Let me my lovely Iris ſighs but hear,
And circumſcribe all my deſires in her;
Let me in gentle peace with her abide,
I care for nought the Sun ſurveys beſide.

I confeſs it (anſwer'd ſhe) for I know nothing ſo ſweet as always to ſee what we love, and nothing ſo troubleſome as ſcarce ever to ſee thoſe who ſenſibly affect our hearts. I cannot ſay (reply'd Amilcar) but your wiſh is very agreeable; however, a little variety does very well. For my part (ſaid Anacreon) I will include a thouſand wiſhes in one, and wiſh to be ſenſible of all pleaſures without exception, ſince without this life has no ſweetneſs, the ſource of all pleaſures being in the heart of thoſe that receive them. For in vain ſhould an excellent Muſician ſing, if his hearers have not delicate ears to underſtand him well. For my part (ſaid Amilcar) I think it would have been better to deſire to enjoy all pleaſures, than to wiſh to be barely ſenſible or capable of them; but every one wiſhes according to his fancie. As for me (added Telantus) I am conſtrain'd to confeſs that I am ſenſible only of glory and pleaſure, and between the two, if my Reaſon is for one, my heart is for the other; therefore not being able to determine my ſelf, I would only deſire nothing. This wiſh is very Philoſophical (anſwer'd Amilcar) and one would think it were the moſt reaſonable in the world; becauſe he that deſires nothing has need of nothing. But after having well conſider'd it, I conclude that a man that ſhould deſire nothing, would paſs his life in ſuch exceſſive tranquillity, that it ſomething approach near inſenſibility. Therefore this wiſh ſhall never be mine. As for me (ſaid a perſon of the Country roughly, who had a quick imagination and a rude briskneſs) I ſhould wiſh to have the beſt wit in the world. Alas! (anſwer'd Amilcar haſtily) you know not well what you deſire, when you wiſh to be a fine wit; there is nothing more decry'd in the world at preſent, and I had rather be a ſlave than a rare wit. They that are ſuch with judgment, conceal it; they who have not wherewith to ſupport this Quality, are ſo impertinent in it, that except ſuch as laugh at them, no body deſires their converſation. Not but that I conſent with all my heart thereto if you are deſirous to be ſuch (added Amilcar, looking upon him who made this wiſh) and it is only requiſite that you tell us what kind of fine wit you would be; for there ſome of the firſt order, others ſecundary; ſome of the Court, others of the City and the Country, and ſome fine wits too among the meaner people. Speak then if you pleaſe, to the end I may underſtand your wiſh, and know a little more preciſely whether I ought to approve or condemn it. For being I am at this time Cenſor of the wiſhes of the Company, it behoves me to acquit my ſelf punctually of the Office. Amilcar ſpoke this with a certain ſerious air which caus'd all that heard him to laugh, and which ſo ſtruck the poor wit out of countenance, that he anſwer'd ſo ſoftly as no body ſcarce heard his anſwer. Wherefore Amilcar turning towards a man of Peruſia of a handſome perſonage, ask'd him what he wiſht? Not to be in love (anſwer'd he.) Believe me (reply'd Amilcar roughly) you had better wiſh to be dead; for to ſpeak truth, to live without Love is a very uncomfortable life. I believe that which you ſay (anſwer'd another man of Cluſium) and I know it by experience; and therefore I would with all my heart be always amorous. But I have endeavour'd it theſe four years unprofitably, and I have ſu'd above a hundred times to a perſon whom I once lov'd;

Give me my Love and my deſires again,
And I therewith my pleaſures ſhall regain.

But he that is amorous (reply'd the other) cannot ſpend one day without diſcontent. But he that loves nothing (ſaid the man of Cluſium) is incapable of any ſenſible pleaſure. Be it how it will (ſaid Amilcar) I account the laſt wiſh more reaſonable than the other; becauſe the firſt overthrows the order of the World, and oppoſes Nature which inſpires Love into all the Univerſe. But to proceed (added Amilcar, addreſſing to a handſome Lady of Præneſte) What is your wiſh? To have many true Friends (anſwer'd ſhe) for I imagine there is nothing ſo ſweet. You ſhould have deſir'd (ſaid Amilcar) that there were ſuch, and then that you had them: therefore, if you believe me, deſire rather to have many Lovers; for with thoſe eyes of yours it will be eaſier for you to have Lovers than friends. But when we have Lovers (anſwer'd ſhe) they forſake us. But when we believe we have Friends (reply'd Amilcar) we find oftentimes that we have not; but to ſpeak truth (added he) there is deceit in every thing. As for what concerns me (ſaid another Lady) I would wiſh to ſee that which is in the hearts of all the world. No doubt there would be pleaſure enough (anſwer'd Amilcar) in penetrating into the hearts of ſuch as have an outſide of wiſdom, and a thouſand follies hidden in their Souls; of thoſe hypocrites who make ſemblance of having virtue, and make uſe of it only to hide their vices; of thoſe coy Goſſips in apparence who are unfaithful to their husbands; of thoſe deceitful Friends, who intend to deſtroy thoſe they Careſs moſt; and of thoſe Wantons who have a thouſand little Loves at a time: but withal you would ſee ſo many follies, wickedneſſes, frauds, and treacheries, that I think it better to wiſh to know ones own heart well than thoſe of others. For my part (ſaid a man with a fierce aſpect) I ſhould wiſh to be the moſt valiant man in the world; And I to be the moſt eloquent (added another.) Eloquence and Valour (anſwer'd Amilcar) are two excellent things; but 'tis good to wiſh at the ſame time to know how they ought to be us'd; for to ſpeak truth, they are a ſtrange ſort of people who underſtand nothing but killing of men; and I am much of the ſentiment of thoſe of Agrigentum, who have a Proverbial ſaying amongſt them, That Valour is like ſalt, good for nothing by it ſelf, and yet good for almoſt all things. But as for Eloquence, it is not leſs neceſſary to know the right uſe of it: for an Eloquent perſon who declaims always in converſation is very troubleſome; and as often as any one wiſhes Eloquence, he ought to remember to wiſh judgment with it. As for me (ſaid a Greek who was preſent) I ſhould much deſire to write ſuch excellent things as I might believe would deſcend to Poſterity, and that with glory; and I am aſſur'd, if Anacreon who hears me would ſpeak truth, he would confeſs that the thought of being one day tranſlated into various Languages and commended in ſeveral Ages, is infinitely ſweet to him. I aſſure you (anſwer'd Anacreon ſmiling) if you knew that pleaſure by experience, you would not account it ſo great as you imagine; for at the ſame inſtant that I think perhaps my Works will live a long time, I think perhaps I ſhall not, but ſhall infallibly live leſs than they. So that this chagrin ſtrangely troubles the pleaſure of this pretended immortality. Anacreon is very equitable in ſpeaking as he does (ſaid Amilcar) for thoſe pleaſures are properly the pleaſures of fancy; not but that I know well 'tis almoſt a general weakneſs to affect to have our names live; but to ſpeak truth, upon a ſerious conſideration 'tis but a folly: for cannot we judge by what is ſaid of thoſe that have written before us, what will be ſaid after us of thoſe that write at this time? 'Tis true, they are ſometimes commended, but yet they are blam'd at leaſt as much as they are prais'd. They are robb'd, and ill tranſlated, and beſides, though it were not ſo, what concernment can we take in things which ſhall happen when we are no longer concern'd amongſt the living? Believe me then, let us be contented with preſent pleaſures, let us enjoy our glory whilſt we live, let us ſeek to obtain the praiſes of ſuch as are alive, and let us not care for being commended by people not yet in being, whom we know not and never can know. No doubt there are a thouſand agreeable things in the Odes of Anacreon, which will not be underſtood two thouſand years hence, becauſe Manners, Cuſtoms, and Gallantry will be chang'd with the Ages. Nevertheleſs, I allow that people may by the by comfort themſelves in ſome manner againſt Death, which the thought of having ſome priviledge above the Vulgar, and leaving a name which does not die with them; but let us not account this amongſt the moſt exquiſite pleaſures, nor ſo affirmatively aſcribe to our ſelves an imaginary immortality, which perhaps poſterity will not give us: for I aſſure you, every one does not live in this manner who deſires it, and many people think they write for immortality, whoſe works will die. As for me (ſaid a very amiable Virgin who was ſiſter to that Lady of Praneſte who had ſpoken before) I am confident my wiſh will pleaſe all the Company. Tell it quickly then (ſaid Amilcar.) 'Tis to be inviſible (anſwer'd ſhe.) Ha! Madam (reply'd Amilcar) this is the firſt time no doubt that ſo fair a perſon as you made this wiſh. In good earneſt (added ſhe) I know nothing more agreeable than this. But what would you do with your inviſibility? (ſa'd Amilcar ſmiling.) I would make uſe of it (anſwer'd ſhe) to know the ſecrets of all the World, and eſpecially to know truly what they who do not love me ſpeak of me. As for my part (reply'd Amilcar) I have no curioſity to know what my Enemies ſay, for I eaſily imagine it. But I confeſs to you, I ſhould be raviſht to know that my Friends ſpoke of me in the ſame manner when I am not with them as when I am. For experience has taught me, there are few people but upon ſome occaſions make railery upon their Friends, or at leaſt endure to hear it made in their preſence. Yet this is very culpable (anſwer'd Bereliſa.) But when we have Friends (ſaid Clidamira) who have certain natural defects which cannot be conceal'd (as deformity, or the like) what ought we to do? Never ſpeak of them (anſwer'd Bereliſa.) But if others ſpeak of them (reply'd Clidamira) 'tis neceſſary to agree with them. When we cannot contradict them (anſwer'd Bereliſa) we muſt blame them of injuſtice in accuſing vertuous perſons of defects not in their power to amend, rather than to commend them for a thouſand good Qualities they are indu'd with: and thereupon we ought to take occaſion to praiſe them, and exaggerate all that is commendable in them; for there is nothing more unworthy and unjuſt than to upbraid any one with his natural defects. However it be (ſaid Amilcar) let us return to inviſibility, of which various uſes may be made. One might thereby be preſent at all the Counſels of Kings, and Maſter of the ſecrets of all the world; and nothing beſides the thoughts alone could eſcape the knowledge of an inviſible perſon. It would be good in affairs of State and War, but chiefly in Gallantry, for we might deceive all Husbands, Mothers, Aunts, and Rivals: but being by ill hap, this wiſh is one of the moſt difficult wiſhes in the world to be accompliſht, let us ſee what the remainder of the Company wiſhes. For my part (ſaid a man of Ardea, who was very rich and ingenious) I would wiſh to have no Envyers. You would then (anſwer'd Amilcar) have no vertue, be poor, deformed, and miſerable; for whoever has good fortune, merit, and virtue, has Envyers infallibly. As for me (ſaid an amiable perſon, who ſate next Bereliſa) I ſhould wiſh more to be an accompliſht man than an accompliſht woman. As for this wiſh (anſwer'd Amilcar) I find nothing to ſay againſt it; for though women are infinitely more amiable than men, and I love them a thouſand times better, yet, I judge, Madam, that you have wiſh'd very judiciouſly: for were there no other reaſon than that which allows us to uſe Courtſhip and Gallantry, and forbids it you, I ſhould account your wiſh very juſt. For my part (added another Lady) I ſhould like well of immortality. I am wholly of your mind (anſwer'd Amilcar) and this wiſh is the beſt of all; for it would be great pleaſure to ſee the whole Univerſe continually change, being unalterable ones ſelf. But to ſpeak truth, this happineſs appears ſo impoſſible, that I have not the power to wiſh it; and all that I can ſay, is, that this immortality is to be prefer'd to that of Writings. You have reaſon (reply'd a man who had the whole air of a profeſs'd Scholar of which the world is full) therefore without wiſhing immortality which belongs to the Gods alone, I ſhould wiſh only to be very learned, and to be able to underſtand all Nature. For there would be great pleaſure in a perfect knowledge of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, in penetrating into the Centre of the Earth, there to the production of gold, in knowing the Qualities and Virtues of Minerals, Plants, Herbs, and being skill'd even in the knowledge of the leaſt Cockles in the Sea, and the leaſt Flies upon the Earth: great trees, ſhrubs, monſters, domeſtick Animals, Seas, Rivers, Brooks and Fountains, and to be ignorant of none of all Natures operations. That which you ſay is admirable (anſwer'd Amilcar) but though this wiſh is one of the beſt that can be made, yet it ought not to be abus'd. For I once knew a man, who underſtood as well as poſſible the ſituation and courſe of the Stars, who admirably knew Simples, who diſcours'd very well of the nature of Winds, who had obſerv'd that the ſalt of Agrigentum contrary to the manner of all other ſalt of the world, hardens in the Water, and melts in the Sun; that there are Piſmires in certain Countries like Elephants; who diſcours'd very well of the Rainbow, who knew even the particularities of the love of Crocodiles; and who for all this, was a ſottiſh man, his mind was always in Heaven, or the Abyſs of the Earth, or the bottom of the Sea, to find out the ſecrets of Nature, and never was where it ought to be. He knew a hundred thouſand things which were not neceſſary, but knew not that his wife was a wanton; and in fine, he was ignorant in morality and the art of living decently in the world; which is a thouſand times more neceſſary to be known than the love of Crocodiles. All the Company having laugh'd at what Amilcar ſaid, ſome time paſs'd without any wiſhing; but at length a very accompliſht man of Ceres ſaid his wiſh was more reaſonable than that of all the reſt, ſince he wiſht nothing but to be lov'd by that which he lov'd. This wiſh is very reaſonable (anſwer'd Amilcar) but being you ſeem ſufficiently worthy to be lov'd, you might rather have made another wiſh, and left it to your merit to cauſe you to obtain that which you deſire. As for me (ſaid a ſprightly young perſon) I would wiſh to be able to live without ſleep, for tis a great loſs of time. I confeſs it (anſwer'd Amilcar) but however, though all the World ſleeps every day, yet they have time enough to be weary, and therefore ſleep, if you will take my Counſel. But that you may ſleep with pleaſure (added he ſmiling) and have delightful Dreams, ſuffer an accompliſht man who does not diſpleaſe you, to ſay to you every day, I love you, and no doubt you will find no cauſe to complain of ſleep more. For my part (ſaid a man of good years) I ſhould greatly deſire to be a wiſe Law-giver, like Solon, Lycurgus, Zamolxis, and divers others. This wiſh is ſomething commendable (anſwer'd Amilcar) but I confeſs, if I were a great and illuſtrious Maker of Laws, I ſhould have great regret in foreſeeing that infallibly they would be ill obſerv'd; for there is ſuch a great perverſneſs amongſt men, that aſſoon as a Law is made, all that ought to follow it, ſeek only how to infringe it with impunity. And beſides, to ſpeak truth, I account it more glorious to obey the Law than to have made it; for it is much eaſier to command in ſuch occaſions than to obey; and moreover 'tis a general maxime, that good actions are worth more than good words. After this, there remain'd only Amilcar and the old Tuſcan Soothſayer who had wiſhes to make. But this venerable old man would make no wiſh at all, and ſaid men were too blind to know what good was fit for them: after which he continu'd to hear attentively what was ſaid in the Company. It was then requir'd of Amilcar to make his wiſh as others had done. I will (anſwer'd he) but I muſt firſt ſee whether all the Company have wiſh'd: and ſo he taking writing-Tables, he ſet down on one ſide all the wiſhes of the Ladies, and on the other all thoſe of the men, in this manner.

The Wiſhes of the Ladies.

To be the handſomeſt Perſon in the world.
To be extremely lov'd, and not love at all, or very little.
To be always with Perſons one loves, and to converſe with no others.
To ſee what is in the hearts of all the World.
To be inviſible.
To be an accompliſht man inſtead of being an accompliſht woman.
To be immortal.
To be able to live without ſleep.

The Wiſhes of the Men.

To be a King.
To be as rich as one would.
To be always in health.
To be a ſubduer of Monſters like Hercules, and a Deliverer of Kingdoms and raviſh'd Ladies.
To be ſenſible of all pleaſures without exception.
To deſire nothing.
To be the beſt Wit in the World.
Not to be amorous.
To be always in love.
To be the moſt valiant man in the World.
To be the moſt eloquent.
To be the author of ingenious compoſures which may deſcend to poſterity.
To have no Enviers.
To be very Learned.
To be lov'd by whom we love.
To be a wiſe Law-giver.

When Amilcar had writ down all theſe Wiſhes, he firſt counted them, and then the whole company, and found there was none but himſelf to wiſh: wherefore being much urg'd to ſpeak, he anſwer'd, that it was not a thing to be done with precipitation: for ſince (ſaid he) the buſineſs is to make a Wiſh, I will make make one so great, that imagination cannot go beyond it, for to think to desire one thing which may suffice to render a man happy, is a strange mistake. Therefore to make a handsome Wish, I will make a handsome story, and tell you in particular how I would be if I were master of my Destiny and events. Assuredly (said Clidamira) he is going to wish to be lov'd by an hundred thousand fair persons at once. Pardon me, Madam (answer'd Amilcar) I am not; and I declare to you, that I renounce my debonair humor for an hour only, and am going to speak sincerely to you, and in the greatest earnestness in the world. Know then, that for a more noble reason than that I mention'd at the beginning of this conversation, though I could dispose my lot as I pleas'd, I would not be born a King: for I account it no great glory to do no more but succeed a father, and I think it is something more sweet for a man to be the builder of his own grandeur, and to owe nothing but to himself. You would then be a conqueror (reply'd Clidamira) which many times signifies an Usurper. By no means (said Amilcar) and I have at present a greater fancy than that: but I beseech you suffer me to speak, my friend, and then let the company judge of my Wish. Know then, I would be neither King nor conquering Usurper; but as for birth, I would be of a Royal race, and that the changes which arrive successively in the world, had my family, and left me scarce any other advantage besides nobility of bloud; I would be also descended of vertuous Parents, and be indu'd with great vertue my self. I confess too I would be a handsome personage, have a noble air, a happy physiognomy, and a very high aspect. As for Wit, I would have an infinite portion, but especially of that of the chief order, capable of great things, of governing Nations, counselling Kings, and knowing all the interests of Monarchies, the means to manage great Wars, and the art of grand Negotiations, of penetrating into the secrets of all hearts; and above all, I would have the faculty of perswading, which is almost the most necessary of all, for one that is in the highest imployments. I would also in the beginning of my life go to the War, and give proofs of my courage: and to raise my self a reputation on the sudden, I would have Fortune by some extraordinary way cause me to be between two Armies ready to joyn Battel; and that for the first essays of my address and eloquence, I had the pleasure to cause these two enemy-Armies to lay down their Arms, and the glory to establish peace between two great Princes. In the next place, I would wish there were a Kingdom which were the sanctuary of the Sciences and excellent Arts, in which there were a great and excellent Minister, who by a thousand glorious actions had merited the admiration of all the earth, to the end that being lov'd and esteem'd by him, I might of a sudden come to be consider'd in that great state. Moreover, I should take an extreme pleasure (if the Gods pleas'd that he di'd before me) that he left me to the King his Master as a faithful servant, and capable of assisting him to support the burden of affairs: and, to complete my happiness, I would that that King at his death left me the government of the young Prince which were to succeed him, together with that of the whole State. But to signalize my Government the more, I would have a great War to manage; and that shortly after the death of the King, there were divers Cities taken, and many Battels won. Yet I would not have Fortune always favourable to me, and have none but easie successes, and without obstacles. On the contrary, I would see my Victories on a sudden interrupted by some great Insurrection of the people: I would, I say, that the Commotion beginning in the heart of the State, I saw almost the whole Kingdom risen against me, and had a foreign and a civil War to manage at once. But in making this Wish, I would at the same time perfectly understand the art to yield sometimes to the Tempest, thereby to save the Ship from perishing; and be able to re-establish a general calm, and cause the young Prince I serv'd to reign with glory, without employing that bloudy policy which is always follow'd with terrour and dread. But after I had calm'd this great storm within the State, I would win a thousand new advantages over the foreign enemies, take many important Cities, and gain divers Battels; and then to crown all these grand actions with the most heroick action that ever was, I would after so many happy successes form the design of a Peace upon the field of Victory. But the more agreeably to surprise all the earth, I would make a great secret of this important negotiation, which should pass only between my self and the Minister of the King against whom the War was; and at length, when the Nations durst scarce hope a Peace, they should understand it was made. But for the conclusion of this peace, I would not be unwilling to be a while in some small Island conferring with the Minister of the enemies; to the end I might in that place see Nations, Princes and Kings await with ardency the resolutions which should be taken in that little corner of earth. Moreover, I would corroborate this Peace by a happy Marriage of the young King I serv'd, and a fair Princess daughter of the enemy-King; that so thenceforth I might see peace, plenty and pleasures return together, establish safety both on Land and Sea, reconcile to the interests of the State some illustrious Heroe whom Fortune had separated from them, and finally render the whole world happy. And to accomplish my own felicity, I would not marry at all, but I would there were a State in the world where the Prince reign'd by the election of the greatest and the wisest; and that I were advanc'd to that place, to reign there all the rest of my life. But I would also that that Soveraignty had some kind of authority over all others, and that I had power then to continue peace amongst all the Kings of the world. Thus not being born a King, I should reign innocently, and boast of having enjoy'd glory in all the different manners it can be possest.

Ah! Amilcar (cry'd the old sage Soothsayer, who had scarce spoken before) it belongs to you only to wish; I think you are inspir'd by heaven: for having consulted the Lots, to know what will be the destiny of Rome now Tarquin is expell'd thence, I have found that it will one day be subject to a man of the same name with one of the first ancestors of Romulus, to such a man as you desire to be, who shall be descended from the ancient Kings of Sicily. But this will not come to pass till a long time after Rome shall have been a triumphant Common-wealth, and shall have been once again govern'd by Soveraigns, amongst which many Heroes shall be counted. This man spoke thus with such Majestie, that himself seem'd really inspir'd, and his discourse made such an impression upon the minds of all that heard him, that they doubted not but what he said would one day be accomplish'd; and all the company confess'd that it was not possible to wish any thing more great and glorious, and that all their own wishes together deserv'd not to be compar'd to the destiny of that great man.

But whilſt they were ſpeaking thus, the old Soothſayer ſate down again in his place, and return'd to his ordinary ſilence, without concerning himſelf longer in what the company diſcours'd of, which ſoon after broke up and retir'd. The next morning Amilcar went to the Temple of Fortune, of which he admir'd the beauty and magnificence. In divers parts of this Temple, this Goddeſs was ſeen repreſented in many various manners, and all round about it were ſeen great Tables in which all the events ſhe uſes to cauſe were pourtray'd, ſometimes advancing the little, and depreſſing the great. In one place deſtroying Empires, in another founding Kingdoms, and appearing always very powerful and capricious. Amilcar guided by an old Prieſt, ſaw alſo a certain place at the bottom of the Temple, where through a door of grates he was ſhew'd a ſtatue of Jupiter in his childhood ſitting with Juno between the arms of Fortune, to which marry'd women paid great devotion. He was told that heretofore a man of great vertue was inſpir'd to go break a huge ſtone, which after long deferring he did, though all the world laugh'd at him; and that he had no ſooner touch'd the ſtone, but miraculouſly a great breach was made in it, at which iſſued forth the famous Lots which decide the Deſtinies of men. He was alſo told, that at the ſame time there was an Olive-tree from whence iſſu'd forth abundance of honey; from which Omens the Soothſayers foretold that theſe Lots would become very famous. It was added too, that the Soothſayers caus'd a Coffer to be made of that Olive-tree, wherein to incloſe the Lots, which were nothing but a great number of little Oaken Tablets, ingrav'd with ſeveral diſtinct words in ancient Characters. But I beſeech you (ſaid Amilcar to him he convers'd with) what courſe do they take to conſult theſe Lots? Firſt, a Sacrifice is offer'd to Fortune (ſaid he who inſtructed Amilcar) to requeſt her to forget all the reproaches the perſons have ſpoken againſt her; for it is preſuppos'd men are ſo unjuſt, that there is not one, even of thoſe to whom ſhe gives moſt of the favours which are in her power, but ſometimes in his life complains of her. 'Tis true (anſwer'd Amilcar) there is no Deity towards whom reſpect is ſo often loſt, as this; and for my part, I confeſs, I have utter'd reproaches againſt her in four or five Languages, both in Verſe and in Proſe, and ſo I have great need of the Sacrifice you ſpeak of. But what further is to be done, to conſult the Lots? I have already told you (anſwer'd the other) that they are kept in a Coffer made of the Sacred Olive-tree I mention'd, and I ſhall add that this Coffer is plac'd at the feet of that Statue of Fortune which embraces young Jupiter, and that after the perſon has ſignifi'd what he deſires to know, a young Boy draws at a venture ſeveral of theſe Tablets upon which the diſtinct words are written. After which, the Child having placed them in a row, the Soothſayer who is to unfold the Lots, reads them, and there finds the ſence which he unfolds, but with ſuch exactneſs that it is miraculous.

Amilcar having thank'd him that had ſo well inſtructed him, obſerv'd that the Temple was divided by a great Baluſtrade or Rail; on one ſide of which were all the men, and on the other all the women, and at the upper end ſtood two Prieſts who writ the names of ſuch as intended to conſult the Lots concerning their Fortune. Now whereas Telantus had promis'd Amilcar to give him an account whether Martius would cauſe his name to be written, he did not ſtay to behold the men, but only the Ladies to whom he might ſpeak any thing over the Baluſtrade, it not being forbidden to ſpeak in this Temple when the Sacrifice was not in hand. Wherefore he ſet himſelf to conſider the number of fair Strangers whom he ſaw in that place: and being he ſtood ſomewhat near him who inquir'd and writ down the names, he could hear thoſe which they pronounc'd; ſo that after having heard a very great number, he beheld a lovely Woman who arreſted his eyes agreeably; and thereupon giving her ear, he heard that ſhe was nam'd Aretaphile, and that ſhe ſaid ſhe was of the Principality of Elis; for they are oblig'd to tell what Countrey they are of. Being deſirous then to have ſome converſation with her, he obſerv'd ſhe went and plac'd her ſelf by the Baluſtrade about ten paces from him; and ſo he chang'd his ſtation and went to ſalute her very civilly. I beſeech you, Madam (ſaid he to her in Greek) be pleas'd to give me liberty to ask you news of the Princeſs Eliſmonda, and I deſire you tell me whether ſhe be ſtill as fair as ſhe was on the day ſhe gave the prizes at the Olympick Games. That Princeſs is ſtill ſo young (anſwer'd Aretaphile) that her beauty cannot be diminiſhed; and ſo I can aſſure you, ſhe was never more fair and charming, and when I came away ſhe was at a fair houſe belonging to the Prince of Elis, which is call'd the Valley of Cupids. After this Amilcar obtain'd the permiſſion of this fair perſon to go and viſit her. But when he turn'd his head, he was much aſtoniſht to ſee Lucilius, Herminius, Æmilius, and Spurius entering into the Temple; for when he departed from Rome, they made no account to go to Preneſte. He approach't towards them, and underſtood that Lucilius was ſent by Porſenna to conſult the Lots of Preneſte concerning the preſent ſtate of affairs; and he learnt by Herminius, that Æmilius, Spurius, and himſelf being upon the point to have a Quarrel, Publicola had hinder'd them from fighting, and engag'd them to come to this place, declaring to them nevertheleſs, that he left Valeria abſolute Miſtreſs of her own deſtiny, and that he was ſo confident ſhe would chuſe equitably, that he believ'd the Gods would approve his choice and make their will known. After this theſe New-comers went to cauſe their names to be written; but at the ſame time Amilcar beheld a man of a good perſonage and in mourning attire enter into the Temple, and obſerv'd that Clidamira chang'd colour thereat, and Berelisa ſeem'd amaz'd to ſee him. In effect it was Meleontus, who having paſs'd through Rome to ſee the Prince Artemidorus was come to Preneſte, and accordingly caus'd his name to be written. Next, Amilcar beheld the jealous Damon with Acriſius; for Sicinius would not conſult the Lots at Preneſte. But at length when this great number of Strangers of both Sexes had caus'd their names to be written, a Sacrifice was offer'd by way of preparation to know the ſecrets of Fate the next day. As they were going out of the Temple, Telantus advertis'd Amilcar that the wicked Tullia had ſent a man with great ſums of money to corrupt him that was to expound the Lots, and cauſe him to give Lucilius ſuch an anſwer as might perſwade Porſenna to put Aronces and Clelia to death; but he aſſur'd him at the ſame time that nothing was to be fear'd, and that he to whom the addreſs was made was a man of the moſt firm probity in the world. Amilcar trembled at this wickedneſs of Tullia, but he hop'd to draw advantage from it. He acquainted Herminius with the matter, and having underſtood by

Telantus

Telamira that Manius did not present himself at the Temple, he went to the lodgings of Clidamira and Berelisa, where Meleontus arriv'd a moment after, for he did not think fit to accost them as they were going out of the Temple. Assoon as he enter'd, Berelisa askt him for whom he were mourning? For the Prince of Leontium, Madam (answer'd he.) How (reply'd Clidamira wholly surpris'd) is the Prince of Leontium dead? He is certainly (said Meleontus) but with so great regret for not having well enough treated Artemidorus and the Princess Lysonice, that he commanded me at his death to come and testifie his last sentiments to them. And accordingly I came to Rome to obey him, and to conjure the Prince Artemidorus to go and take possession of his Principality, to forget all things past, and to be my Protector. As he is very generous (added he) he has granted me all I desir'd of him, and charg'd me with two Letters which I deliver to you. In speaking this Meleontus gave one Letter of Artemidorus to Clidamira, and another to Berelisa. They both blusht as they receiv'd them, and could not refrain from beholding one another with an air a little jealous. But Berelisa's doubts excited by jealousie were soon dispell'd; for the Letter of the Prince Artemidorus was conceiv'd in these terms.

Artemidorus to Berelisa.

THough the Prince my Brother had ill-treated me, I am notwithstanding much affected with his death: but now, Madam, that the Gods have given me power to testifie to you how much I love you, I declare to you that I will not reign at Leontium but with you, and no other shall ever reign in my heart. I have writ to Clidamira in such a strain as will cure you of all your unjust jealousies. However, I desire you to promote Meleontus interest with her; he has so well deported himself since the prince's death, that he deserves that you and I forget all the mischief he has done us. I beseech you, return to Rome assoon as you can; that when we have seen what will be the destiny of Aronces, I may go and cause you to be acknowledg'd princess of Leontium.

As Berelisa read this Letter, joy diffus'd it self from her eyes over all her countenance; and Clidamira, as she read hers, could not contain from blushing with choler; for it was almost in these words.

Artemidorus to Clidamira.

YOu have reason, Madam, to have made choice of Meleontus for the object of your affection; therefore I will do him what service I can to gain your favour towards him. I have understood from his mouth what I knew before, that he is not so unacceptable to you but that he may hope to be happy if I protect him. I do so, Madam, and desire of you for him all the favours he is worthy of. I have formerly complain'd of it, and now I rejoyce at it; but there arrive so many other changes, that this ought not to surprize you. His fortune is sufficiently good, to render yours happy. Do not therefore resist his affection and my requests; but believe I can never be more oblig'd to you than I shall be, if you reward his affection in the manner I desire.

Clidamira made as if she read this Letter over again, but in truth, she only took time to calm the trouble of her mind, and to deliberate what she should do. During which she concluded that Berelisa was going to be Princess of Leontium, and that Artemidorus being fully perswaded that she had had a beginning of Courtship with Meleontus, no longer believ'd that it was only for his sake, as she had endeavour'd to perswade him. Wherefore, considering that if she rejected Meleontus she would be without all support, and being an admirable dissembler, she recollected her self suddenly, and beholding Meleontus with an aspect something confus'd but not at all rude, The Prince speaks so obligingly of you (said she to him) that it is manifest he will obtain what he desires; but however we shall speak of it at a little more leisure. In the mean time Herminius and Amilcar were speaking to Berelisa, who shew'd them Artemidorus's Letter, as being her dearest Friends at Rome. So that they were very joyful to see that Fortune had at length done justice to her merit. But after Meleontus, Herminius, and Amilcar were gone away, Clidamira not being able to suppress her sentiments, I imagine (said she to Berelisa) you care no longer for consulting the Lots of Praneste, and the Prince's Letter has given you whatever you account agreeable to your desires. 'Tis true (answer'd Berelisa) Artemidorus's Letter is such as I could desire, but I conceive that which you have received ought not to displease you; for, to give you what you made choice of, is as I conceive to do all that can be acceptable to you. Being you are yet but my sister in Law (reply'd Clidamira) and not Princess of Leontium, I must once in my life speak plainly to you, before I be oblig'd to bear you a respect which will not allow me to offend you.—— But, no (added she) the manifestation of my anger will but augment your joy, and therefore I change my mind, and will never more speak to you of Artemidorus, whom I will endeavor to hate, or at least not to love longer. As I can never cease to consider you as the wife of my Brother (said Berelisa) I will answer you without passion. Joy wonderfully sweetens the mind (answer'd Clidamira) and you have not been always so gentle when you were discontented. But however (added she, as she was going from her into a Closet in the same Chamber) if I cannot be contented, I will at least make such shew of being so, that perhaps you who are really so, shall not seem so much. Berelisa smil'd at Clidamira's passion, and went into the Chamber which was assign'd to her.

The next morning Amilcar diligently enquir'd for Manius, and could learn no tidings of him; only he understood that there was an unknown person who had sent to desire the favour that his name might not be written amongst the rest, but to be heard last, when the

the whole Ceremony of the multitude was finish'd; which could not be done in one day, there being too great a number of people this year in Praneſte. At break of day the Temple of Fortune was open, and two hours were by favour allotted for ſuch as would cauſe their names to be written in order to conſulting the Lots, during which the Temple was fill'd with people to hear a kind of Hymn ſung by a very excellent voice to the glory of Fortune. Whilſt this was doing, a certain noiſe was heard about the Gate. Amilcar who had an univerſal curioſity turn'd his head and beheld a little Machine painted, gilded, and cover'd with a kind of little Canopy. It was ſurrounded with Curtains, and carried by two ſlaves. Upon the top of this Canopy was the Pourtraict of a young and handſome man. He had a round Viſage, blew eyes, neat, and agreeable, a carnation, and freſh Complexion, and a cheerful and ſprightly aſpect. At the bottom of this Pourtraict were ſeen theſe Verſes:

Youthful and fair, this Picture courts your eye.
Youthful and fair as this, ſo once was I.
But envious Fate (by whoſe ſevere decree, No happineſs can great and laſting be)
So chang'd both face and body; there remains
Of both but one dire Magazine of pains.
A thouſand ills my vexed limbs diſtort,
But I unmov'd ſuſtain their rude effort.
And though confin'd in this ſad place I lie,
Yet round the ſpacious Globe my name doth flie.

The novelty of this Machine having ſurpriz'd all the Aſſembly, two Prieſts at the Gates of the Temple would have hindred the ſlaves that carried it, from paſſing, and requir'd him that was within it to deſcend and enter into the Temple. But a moment after, the Curtains were ſeen to open a little, and a voice ſomething ſhrill but impetuous was heard to ſpeak thus, No, no (ſaid this Unknown) do not go about to cauſe me to deſcend, for 'tis in vain; and as people of high quality are ſeen to enter in Chariots into the Courts of Kings Palaces, ſo I have the priviledge to enter into the Chambers of Queens and Temples; for that you may know me well, I am the prime ſick perſon in the World, and he alone that has been able to reconcile pain with joy. The Unknown ſpoke this with ſo fierce a tone, that he ſilenc'd the Prieſts, and they ſuffer'd the Machine to enter, which drew the eyes of the whole Aſſembly. But indeed a moment after, it was minded no more; becauſe there appear'd a perſon ſo infinitely fair, that ſhe attracted the general view. It was known by the livery of the ſlaves who follow'd her that ſhe was the Wife of him that was in the Machine. She was young, admirably fair, and of a good ſtature; her name was Lyriana, ſhe was of very noble Birth, and Fortune having been adverſe to her Parents, ſhe was in her infancy led by them into the remoteſt parts of Libya; from whence ſhe return'd ſo fair and charming, that ſcarce any could be compar'd to her without doing her injury. Lyriana was tall and well proportion'd, but of that tallneſs which does not affright, but only adds to the grace of the perſon. She had a very clear and ſmooth Complexion, her hair was of a bright and agreeable cheſnut, her Noſe was well ſhap'd, and her Mouth well cut, ſhe had a Noble, ſweet, ſprightly, and Majeſtical air; and to render her beauty more perfect and charming, ſhe had the handſomeſt Eyes in the world, for they were black, ſparkling, ſweet, paſſionate, and full of ſpirit; their brightneſs had ſomething I know not what, which cannot be expreſs'd; a ſweet melancholy ſometimes appear'd in them amongſt all her charms, yet mirth was viſible in them at times, with all the attractives which joy can inſpire. As for her mind, it ſeem'd made correſpondent to her beauty; ſhe ſpoke with a good grace naturally, and without affectation. Yet her beauty though tranſcendent, made her not vain and proud: but joyning the charms of her vertue to thoſe of her beauty and Wit, it might be ſaid ſhe deſerv'd all the admiration which was had of her when ſhe enter'd into the Temple of Fortune. Amilcar was charm'd aſſoon as he beheld her, carefully inquir'd of thoſe next him the name of this fair perſon, who was ſo advantageouſly ſpoken of to him. As for him that has married her (added he) I ask no news of him, for I do not doubt but he in the Machine is the famous Scaurus, who from a very goodly perſon in his youth, has been ſo chang'd by ſickneſſes that he cannot be known for the ſame man, and who by the pleaſantneſs of his humor and the firmneſs of his mind makes health to himſelf in ſpight of Nature, and preſerves a joy which has render'd him capable of writing a thouſand ſprightly and divertiſing Compoſures, which ſerve for the pleaſure of the illuſtrious Cleonymus and all accompliſht perſons; and laſtly, whoſe converſation is ſought by a great number of Honorable people who frequent his houſe. 'Tis the very ſame (anſwer'd one of thoſe Amilcar was talking to) he lives at Cluſium, where all illuſtrious Strangers go to viſit him, as well as all the Perſons of Quality of that Court. But, which is remarkable, he is never at a loſs for ſubjects to divert himſelf and others. And whether he commends or blames, he always does it pleaſantly, and with as much facility as wit. He confirms what you ſay of his merry humor (reply'd Amilcar) by coming in his Machine into the Temple of Fortune: but to ſpeak truth, I am very deſirous to know what he will conſult the Lots about. After this Amilcar beheld the ſlaves who carried the Machine, ſet it down before the Prieſt who writ the names. And then a ſlave drawing a curtain which hid Scaurus, it was ſeen that he did not at all reſemble his Picture; and nevertheleſs, through all the alteration that had befallen him, he ſeem'd ſtill to have a certain laughing air which promis'd Wit. But, in fine, having caus'd his own name to be writ, and that of the fair Lyriana, he pull'd down his Curtain, and was carried away again in his Machine; for the two hours were juſt by this time expir'd; ſo that it behov'd all the multitude to go forth of the Temple, to the end the Anſwers might be render'd with more ſecrecy. The names of thoſe which were written being to be drawn at a venture, it hapned that Porſenna's name was drawn firſt, to conſult the Lots; and the order being ſo, that the explication of the Lot was deliver'd only to ſuch as were concern'd in the buſineſs, this explication was deliver'd ſeal'd to Lucilius after all the Tablets which the child drew and ranked at a venture had been well conſider'd.

Next, the names of Beroliſa and Clidamira were drawn; and the old Soothſayer who had been preſent at the converſation of Wiſhes, and expounded the Lots of Praneſte this year, ſpoke theſe very words to Clidamira:

Yan

You ſhall be happier by your indifferent humor than any other thing: for being you have never known how to love with ſtedfaſtneſs, therefore you have no reaſon to expect to be lov'd conſtantly: but ſuch as determine themſelves to none, are always moderately afflicted, and never to be much pitied.

Clidamira had ſome indignation at this Anſwer, but a moment after her own humor appeas'd her, and caus'd her to ſay that it was all one to her whether ſhe ow'd her contentment to her indifference or to any thing elſe. As for Bereliſa, the Soothſayer ſpoke to her after another ſort.

I have ſcarce any thing to ſpeak to you (ſaid he to her) for 'tis eaſie for you to foreſee your deſtiny: your Conſtancy is ready to be crown'd, and you are going to reign in one of the moſt delightful Cities of the world, and in one of the moſt generous hearts that ever was.

In the next place, Theanor and Æmilius (whoſe names were written together) ask'd what their deſtiny was to be. He who gave anſwers, ſaid to them,

Marry them who love you, though you love not them; and beware of marrying them whom you love, being they do not love you: for according to all apparences, you will at length love thoſe which have lov'd you ſo long time, and perhaps you will not always love thoſe you do, if they can never love you.

Theanor and Æmilius were amaz'd, and ſeem'd alike dejected at this Anſwer; and ſo they retir'd with ſufficient ſadneſs, and made way for ſeveral others who follow'd them. After which, that famous Lyar (whom Bereliſa, Clidamira and Anacreon knew, and whoſe Lyes had occaſion'd a long converſation at Rome amongſt divers ingenious perſons) preſented himſelf, and ask'd whether it were poſſible there could be one man in the world who were always veracious. But as if the Gods had been offended, the Sooth-ſayer having obſerv'd the Lots according to cuſtom, anſwer'd him in theſe terms:

Raſh man, who ſeekeſt to excuſe thy ſelf with the faults of others, know, that for the puniſhment of thy continual Lyes, thou ſhalt not be believ'd even when thou ſpeakeſt truth. This is all which the Lots of Præneſte can anſwer thee, which will not ſo diſhonour all men, as to make it credible that ſincere truth is ſcarce found upon earth.

Next, Herminius, Æmilius and Spurius enquiring of their Deſtinies, receiv'd ſuch an Anſwer:

The firſt-lov'd ought always to be the laſt-lov'd, unleſs he have render'd himſelf unworthy of being ſo: ſhould it be otherwiſe, there would be five perſons unhappy, and in the former manner but three. Moreover, it ſhall come to paſs that Æmilius ſhall be ſatisfied with his own vertue, Spurius cur'd by his anger, and Mutius comforted with his glory.

This anſwer caus'd a very ſenſible joy to Herminius, and much afflicted Æmilius and Spurius; and this latter beginning to ſpeak, The Lots of Præneſte have given a true deciſion (ſaid he fiercely) for I begin already to reſent ſuch a horrible indignation, that I doubt not but hatred will cure me of my love. Which ſaid, he went away with a very incenſed aſpect. But Herminius, who always lov'd Æmilius, ſpoke to him with much generoſity. You ſee (ſaid he to him) the will of the Gods cannot be withſtood. 'Tis true (anſwer'd Æmilius) and I ſee too that I muſt be always miſerable; and not being able to find a remedy in hatred as Spurius does, ſince generoſity obliges me not to hate my Rival or my Miſtreſs, I muſt ſeek one in death. You will do better (reply'd Herminius) to ſeek it in the amity of a generous Friend, and in that of a faithful Friend, who is extremely ſorry he cannot be happy but by rendring you miſerable. Whilſt theſe two Rivals were diſcourſing in this manner, Meleontius deſiring to know whether he ſhould be happy, receiv'd this anſwer:

Whoſo would always have ambition and love together, it is abſolutely impoſſible for him ever to be happy; for it is not in the power of Fortune to content a Lover and an Ambitious man in one ſingle perſon.

After this the multitude of Strangers which were at Præneſte continu'd enquiring what they deſir'd to know. But for that Amilcar was not concern'd there longer, after he had congratulated with Herminius for the happy anſwer he receiv'd, he went to entertain himſelf with that Lady of Elis whom he had ſpoken to the preceding day, and who was walking in a place beſet with great Trees before the Temple of Fortune, expecting till ſhe ſhould be call'd to go ſignifie what ſhe deſir'd: for the order was, that there ſhould be none in the Temple at that time but they to whom anſwers were given, all the reſt in the mean time attended in that place, whom a young Prieſt came to the door of the Temple to call according to the order of their names. Wherefore Amilcar addreſſing to Aretaphile, askt her if he might preſume to enquire the cauſe which brought her to Præneſte, adding that he believ'd it fit to do in this place as thoſe do who go to the Spaws, who ſcruple not to pretend maladies however which carri'd them thither. I aſſure you (ſaid ſhe to him) I never yet had any ſecret which I could not tell, and it will be eaſie for me to ſatisfie you. Know then, that being one at the Valley of Cupids with the Princeſs Eliſmonda—— Hold, I beſeech you (cry'd Amilcar) and let me not paſs from the Valley of Cupids without making ſome ſtay there. Tell me therefore I conjure you whether this place deſerves ſo fair a name, and wherefore it is called ſo. No doubt it deſerves it (anſwer'd ſhe) but it has not always born this name; for it was ſometimes call'd Teliſangis; but a great Prince having caus'd a ſtately Palace to be built there to give to his Miſtreſs, it was from thence call'd the Valley of Cupids; becauſe Love was in effect the occaſion that it was built. This circumſtance ſeems ſo extraordinary (reply'd Amilcar) that I cannot but conjure you to make me the deſcription of a place which ſeems to have been conſecrated to love, and where a ſecond Mother of Cupids is ſeen; for according to the reports of the Princeſs Eliſmonda, ſhe is a perſon fit to produce ſuch. I will content you (ſaid Aretaphile) though I am not very good at making the deſcription of a handſome place. Know then that the Valley of Cupids is a place of ſuch particular beauty, that it may with truth be ſaid that it has a thouſand charms which cannot be found elſewhere. Yet its ſituation is wild and ſolitary; but though Nature have not given it the like advantage with places which have proſpects of a vaſt extent, and lie near great Rivers, yet it has a thouſand graces which render it an infinitely delightful habitation. This Valley is very fertile, and the place which I am going to deſcribe to you, is perfectly magnificent and agreeable. It is ſituated upon the brow of a Hill which to make the firſt Court of this houſe. The ways which lead to this Palace are admirably fair, for a Royal Foreſt is to be paſs'd through, the great and handſome Waſtes of which make the goodlieſt and moſt ſolitary Walks in the World; eſpecially in a certain place where the Trees ſeem to reach up to Heaven, they are handſome, ſtraight, and ſo thick ſet with verdant leaves that their ſhade is infinitely agreeable. As you arrive at the Valley of Cupids you find a very fair fore-court which has a face of ruſtick edifices on the right hand, and a baluſtrade on the left, from whence is diſcover'd an agreeable Valley. From thence you paſs into another Court which has the ſame Baluſtrade on the left hand and a Walk of Trees on the right. From this place you ſee the ſtately front of the Palace which is of a particular ſtructure; the middle advances towards the Court, as well as the two ſides of this building, all the Windows whereof are great arches which made a goodly ſight; and on the ſide of the teraſs'd Garden, the face of which reſembles that of the Court, are ſeen two Cupids without fillets which ſeem to conſider all the beauties of the proſpect. But to return to the Court from whence I have led aſide your fancie, I muſt tell you that you aſcend from it by a proud perroon up to a great and magnificent terraſs with a Baluſtrade which runs quite round the Palace, all the apartments of which are ſtately, and the ſtair-caſe which is in the midſt of the building is of very great magnificence. There are great Halls pav'd with black and white Marble, very fair Chambers and delightful Cabinets; in one and the ſame apartment there are convenient places both for heat and cold, converſation and ſtudy. For there is a Cabinet from whence is ſeen not only a pleaſant Valley environ'd with little Hills which rather arreſt the ſight than bound it, but alſo a great Garden, the ſquares of which are divided by rivulets which croſs one another, ſo that the midſt of the Garden inſtead of being adorn'd with a Statue, like moſt others, has a Bridge in it made in faſhion of a Croſs, which makes the loveliеſt ſight in the World. The rivulet oppoſite to the building continues between two handſome Groves of equal greatneſs, which makes an admirable ſhew. For the Groves being green from the bottom to the top, and reflecting in that amiable rivulet, whoſe banks are cover'd with graſs, there is nothing ſeen but verdure and water, which renders the place ſo fit to muſe in, that the moſt indifferent cannot refrain from it. But beſides all this, on the right and left ſide of theſe two lovely Groves are ſeen two Meadows ſurrounded with Brooks and border'd with Willows, which make an admirable object. Beyond which is ſeen on the right hand a Town among the Trees, and on the left a Village, little Hills of unequal height, other Meadows and a little corner of a plain. But I ſhould be too tedious to you if I ſhould deſcribe to you all the various beauties of this place, and therefore I ſhall omit them, and tell you that the admirable perſon which inhabits this rare Deſart is become infinitely more amiable and charming than ſhe was when ſhe gave the prizes at the Olympick-Games, for ſhe has improv'd in fatneſs, and has a clearer complexion, and her mind alſo is more embelliſh'd; ſo that 'tis not poſſible even for the moſt averſe from love to ſee her now without loving her; and therefore the Prince of Elis who is a perſon undoubtedly worthy of all ſorts of happineſs, loves her always very conſtantly. Ha! Madam (cry'd Amilcar) if I knew as well how to deſcribe to my Miſtreſs the torments which I endure, as you deſcribe the Valley of Cupids, I ſhould be leſs unhappy than I am. But being I believe you relate all things alike well, tell me I beſeech you, what has brought you hither. I will ſatisfie you (anſwer'd Aretaphile) Know then I was one day at the Valley of Cupids with ſome Ladies my Friends, who had a curioſity to ſee that houſe; and as ſuch divertiſements uſe not to be without the company of ſome vertuous perſons to conduct the Ladies, there were two very accompliſht men in ours, though they were not much known to me, but came attending one of the Ladies. You muſt know alſo that they lov'd two Virgins which were of this company; but for that they would do like diſcreet Lovers, they talkt as much to me as to their Miſtreſſes. But I cannot tell you how it came to paſs, but I pleas'd them well enough that day. As for this particular (ſaid Amilcar) you may diſpenſe with it, for I ſee in your eyes wherewith you touch'd their hearts; and if mine were as it us'd to be, and were not reſolv'd to be conſtant, it would be yours already. Since 'tis ſo (anſwer'd Aretaphile ſmiling) I will only tell you that without deſigning it, I caus'd theſe two Lovers to prove unfaithful; yet I did not perceive it at that time, but ſome days after all the Town came and told me two men had forſaken their Miſtreſſes and lov'd me. Wherefore making more narrow obſervation, I ſaw it was true, and found my ſelf incumbred at the ſame time with the love of two men whom I did not affect, and the hatred of two Virgins whom I did not hate. Yet I thought then, that there needed only a little of my ſeverity to return theſe unfaithful Lovers back again to their Miſtreſſes. But being (as I conceive) they did not forſake them but only becauſe they were two of thoſe good perſons whoſe exceſſive gentleneſs cloys rather than diverts, my ſeverity augmented their Love. Since that, I confeſs without vanity, I have been lov'd by divers others; But I muſt acknowledge, never by any man whom I could believe worthy of my love. Yet I confeſs too that I ſaw a paſſenger at Syracuſa whom I could love, and whom I judge perfectly worthy to be lov'd. But he has not lov'd me, and never will; for according to all probabilities, we ſhall never ſee one another again as long as we live. Ah! Madam (ſaid Amilcar) may I not preſume to ask you what manner of perſon it was whom you could love? I will content you (anſwer'd ſhe) for I aſſure you I always take delight in ſpeaking of him. Know then, the illuſtrious Cleander (ſo is he call'd that pleaſes me) is of one of the

the most illustrious families of the Kingdom where he lives, which has maintain'd it self most gloriously in repute, either by the great actions of such as have been descended of it, or by illustrious alliances. He is tall, and of a good proportion, he has also been admirably handsome in his first youth, and at present he has an extraordinary good aspect, and perfectly the air of a man of high Quality, such as he is. And though he has receiv'd a wound with an arrow under his eye in a very dangerous occasion, yet he is very little alter'd by it. He has flaxen hair, blew eyes, the form of his visage is agreeable, and all the lineaments regular enough; he has a certain serious air, accompani'd with a sweetness perfectly noble, which causes a good opinion of him at first sight. His looks are sometimes very passionate when he pleases, and there are handsomer eyes than his which are not so proper for a certain mute language which love alone has the priviledge to teach. Moreover, Cleander's very silence is so ingenious, that never any person seem'd so much with speaking so little. And indeed he has a great Wit, which being facile and easie, he complies with the most ignorant and tedious without appearing such himself. So that they who have not a very discerning judgment, would suspect him not able to do much hurt with it. But this facility is an effect of the highest prudence and understanding in the world. He has the most free and civil deportment that ever was, yet his civility does not hinder him from preserving a high and noble way of carriage which renders him more agreeable to others and more worthy of his condition. All his Gestures have a certain gallant air which pleases infinitely; so that having a Soul by Nature perfectly passionate, he is very apt both to be sensible of and to excite great passions; for he knows all the violence, delicacy, and Mystery of Loves better than Vulgar Lovers. But to pass from agreeable to Heroical Qualities, he is Honorable, sincere, generous, and as good a friend as is possible to be; and whoso has oblig'd him to promise his friendship, may be assur'd he will never fail in it. Moreover, his heart is fill'd with the most true and solid glory in the World. So that in occasions where it is to be obtain'd, or that which he has already gotten is to be upheld, this man whom I have represented to you so gentle, so facile, and so complacent, is the most fierce and resolute in the World. As for his courage, he has as much as any man; so that this being joyn'd to his wit and other accomplishments, makes it apparent that there is no imployment how great soever of which he is not capable and worthy; and he gives cause to believe that if there be any man in the world who would not alter his deportment towards his Friends in an extraordinary advancement of fortune, it is certainly himself. His conversation is not only agreeable, but charming; for he enters into the sentiments of those to whom he speaks without any affectation, and conforms thereto with address; by which means he insensibly insinuates into the hearts of people; and such a person as sometimes believ'd he was only an acquaintance, has found soon after that he had a great interest in his affection. He is courteous even in the least concernments, and his gentleness, pity, and gratitude extend even to the smallest Animals. For he loves to observe their natures, goodness, and agreeableness, and industry; he admires that rational instinct which guides them so accurately, he is delighted with their kindness, he has compassion of those that are miserable, because whatever suffers, excites his pity. He is alike fit for the conversation of Ladies and men, and he writes so admirably well, and in so elegant and gallant a strain, and so much becoming a man of Quality, that his Letters cause such as see them to wish they could write the like. In fine, his merit is so great that the charming Clarista niece of the admirable Amalthea (whose name you cannot but know) minding to use railery with him and to disparage his conversation, could only reproach him that he sometimes lov'd to recount things past rather than to speak of things present. Thus I have given you such an account as I could of this illustrious Friend of Amalthea, whom I could have lov'd, if he had lov'd me. However, having affairs in Sicily, and a brother who after several adventures is come to live at Praneste, I took a journey to see him, and I am resolv'd to demand, Whether I shall never be lov'd but by people whom I cannot love. Aretaphile spoke this so gracefully, that if at the same moment one had not call'd her to go know what she desir'd to understand, Amilcar could scarce have contain'd from speaking some kind of blandishments to her, though he had resolv'd to love Plotina eternally. But Aretaphile left him and went to inquire her Destiny of him who perform'd the Ceremony and expounded the Lots, who said to her,

Thank the Gods, Daughter; for if you were lov'd by one whom you could love, you would be the most miserable person in the World; because you would always love more than you would be lov'd again. Therefore prepare your self to love nothing but liberty if you desire to be happy.

Anacreon was call'd next, and askt Fortune whether he should live always in joy. The Soothsayer having consider'd the several Tablets, answer'd him. And accordingly the event verifi'd the prediction of the Lots, for Anacreon dy'd afterward at a Feast, where he was choak'd by the grain of a Grape. After Anacreon, Scaurus was caus'd to enter with his Machine, who with an air serious and mocking together, askt if there were any means for him to become such a person as his Picture, and to resemble his Picture once again. Being the Priests were oblig'd to answer to all Questions, the Lots were drawn, and the old Soothsayer interpreting them, answer'd him in these terms:

You know not what you ask when you desire to become again what you have been. Which if you were, you would be young and handsome, you would dance well, you would be an excellent Painter, you would be active and agreeable, but withal, you would be nothing but a Gallant wanton, who had only made Sonnets upon Iris or Clymene, and your Reputation would be circumscrib'd in the number of your Friends. But by the change hapned in your person, your mind, being excited to make amends for the loss of your beauty, is become such as you now enjoy, and has now so exalted you above the common sort of men, that you are the Phœnix of your Species. Your Works please the whole World by their ingenious mirth and elegancy. Desire therefore only to be such as you are, and be contented that the Gods in giving you Lyriana have given you a thouſand times more than they have taken from you, even though you had been more amiable than Paris.

After this Scaurus retir'd, ſaying, the Lots of Praneſte taught him nothing, and he knew before all that they told him. Then the fair Lyriana was call'd, who would propound no Queſtion though her name was written. For having well conſider'd (ſaid ſhe to the Prieſt) If it be decreed for me to be happy, I ſhall be ſo infallibly; and if any infelicity is to befall me, I will not know it before it happen. What you ſay is ſo well reaſon'd (anſwer'd the ſage Soothſayer) that I doubt not but you will always be as happy as you deſerve to be. Next came Amilcar's turn, who demanded, whether he ſhould dye in Africk or in Italy; and the Soothſayer anſwer'd him,

In Italy.

Whereupon he was very joyful, imagining that the voyage which he deſign'd to make into Africk would not be long. After this, Acriſius askt whether he ſhould ever poſſeſs Plotina: and the Soothſayer having conſider'd the Tablets, told him,

Such as ſpeak too much, never perſwade.

Then Damon the conſtant Pythagorean propos'd two queſtions. One, whether his Miſtreſs would always ſlight him; and the other, what he ſhould become firſt of all when he dy'd. But after the Child had drawn the Tablets, the Soothſayer expounded them in this ſort.

Your Miſtreſs will always do you juſtice; you ſhall dye but once, and you ſhall be as all other men are when they depart this life; for the Diſciples of Pythagoras have no particular privilege.

Damon ſeem'd ſo offended with this anſwer, that he ſaid aloud as he went forth of the Temple, Amilcar had brib'd the Soothſayer, and the Lots of Praneſte were nothing but a cheat. Amilcar laugh'd at his choler, and made pleaſant railery upon the diſcontent which Damon reſented, for that it was told him he ſhould dye but once. Yet he went to ſupper with Damon, who invited him, for he was ſo ſcrupulous an obſerver of all the Documents of Pythagoras, that he would not go to bed with a ſentiment of hatred in his heart towards his Rival; at leaſt he profeſs'd ſo. Herminius, Anacreon, Theanor, and Æmilius were preſent at this entertainment. Amilcar was very jovial this evening; yet now and then he ſeem'd a little penſive. An hour after the repaſt, he began to be indiſpos'd, but in ſo violent a manner that he dy'd the next day, but with admirable conſtancy, ſending commendations to all his Friends, and particularly to Plotina. He encharg'd Herminius with many generous expreſſions to all thoſe he had lov'd, and a thouſand dear commendations unto his Miſtreſs. And thus dy'd the agreeable Amilcar, regretted by all who had known him. Herminius, and a Lady that was his Friend, and another Perſon of Quality undertook to gather together all the ingenious Compoſures which he had written; and ſome time after he erected a monument for him, whereon was engrav'd an Epitaph made upon this Illuſtrious Deceaſed, by a Lady who was Friend to Amilcar and Herminius.

EPITAPH.

THis Tomb the fam'd Amilcar doth enſhrine,
Who to a ſprightly Genius Art did joyn;
Whoſe lofty Soul to unfathom'd heights could fly,
Yet fall as low as complacence can lie.
But what's moſt ſtrange, he that rare talent got To pleaſe, he pleas'd even thoſe who lov'd him not.

All ſuch as had only ſeen him at the Temple of Fortune, regretted him with a ſenſible ſorrow. Anacreon lamented him (though he did not think himſelf capable of grief) and profeſs'd he never knew a more agreeable Wit in any place of the World. Acriſius too (as much his Rival as he was) ſeem'd mov'd with his loſs. But as for Damon, he was ſo unhappy as to be ſuſpected of having caus'd him to be poyſon'd. But however, Amilcar dy'd and confirm'd the credit of the Lots of Praneſte, which told him he ſhould not dye in Africk, and which he conſtru'd to his own advantage. Yet it was but a bare ſupicion: for the Friends of Amilcar did not judge fit raſhly to ſearch into ſuch a buſineſs as this, which ſhould it have been true, would have nothing profited the illuſtrious Deceaſed. But whilſt things paſs'd thus at Praneſte, and Amilcar and Lucilius were expecting to ſee whether he that deſir'd to conſult his fortune in private were Mutius or no, Aronces was very unhappy in his priſon, and in a deſperate condition; Sextus was much diſcontented for having fail'd of his deſign to carry Clelia away, and ſtudi'd only to find ways for a ſecond attempt; Tullia was contriving to deſtroy Aronces and Clelia, Tarquin only to find means to recover his Throne, Galerita and the Princeſs of the Leontines how to ſerve Aronces and Clelia, Artemidorus thought only of his happineſs and to protect Aronces, Zenocrates of nothing but his jealouſie, Themiſtus of returning aſſoon as Aronces ſhould be out of danger, Publicola of aſſuring the Peace, and Horatius of his love. In the mean time the prudent Roman who went to conduct the twenty fair Roman Ladies to Porſenna, being on the way to the Camp, ſaw himſelf attaqu'd by Sextus, who with a hundred Horſe attempted a ſecond time to carry away Clelia. The convoy of theſe fair Virgins conſiſted of fifty men, ſo that the number was very unequal. Beſides, he who commanded them being an old man could not encourage his Party by his own example with the ſame ardour as Sextus did, whoſe courage too was augmented by his love. Yet this Prince was diſguis'd, for the enterpriſe was made with Tullia's conſent, who in giving ſatisfaction to Sextus intended to perſwade Porſenna that the Friends of Aronces had convey'd away this fair Lady for fear ſhe ſhould bear witneſs againſt Aronces; and conſequently by this artifice to haſten the ruine of this great Prince. And indeed Sextus had the ſucceſs he deſir'd at firſt; for whilſt thoſe fifty Romans were fighting againſt his men, he caus'd him to be ſlain who drove the Chariot in which Clelia, Valeria, Hermilia, and Plotina were, and then ordering a man deſign'd for that purpoſe to take his place, he made the Chariot be driven into the way leading to Tarquinia, himſelf with twenty others guarding it, whileſt the reſt of his followers detain'd the Romans in fight to amuſe them. And this deſign ſucceeded accordingly; for the Romans ſeeing the whole body of Chariots ſtopt, did not miſs that in which Clelia was. Sextus now believing nothing nothing could obſtruct his happineſs, Clelia, Valeria, Plotina, and Hermilia were forc'd to cry out; but their cries were not heard. But though Sextus was ſufficiently diſguis'd, yet Clelia did not doubt but that it was he who carri'd her away. Wherefore courageouſly reſolving upon death, ſhe only devis'd how to effect it, ſo to prevent all the unhappineſſes which ſhe had cauſe to fear. On the other ſide the fight was ſufficiently ſharp in the place where the reſt of the Roman Ladies were, who were ſo terrifi'd that they did not perceive Clelia was carri'd away. In the mean time the wiſe Roman who conducted the Hoſtages having ſent to Rome to deſire ſuccour, it hapned that he who was ſent thither met Horatius ſtanding at the Gate with Octavius. Who being advertis'd of the buſineſs ſent to give notice of it to the Conſuls; but themſelves not waiting for the ſuccour which they preſum'd would be ſent, immediately took Horſe and ſpeeded to the place where the fight was. But as they were going thither, they beheld upon a little hill the Chariot in which Clelia was guarded by Sextus, who was by this time a good diſtance off. Wherefore imagining that this might be the Chariot that carried the Perſons they lov'd, they went firſt to the Chariots which were ſtopt, where not finding what they ſought, they haſtned to the place of the fight; but inſtead of ſtaying there, I beſeech you (ſaid Horatius to four or five Romans who were neareſt him) come help us to deliver the Daughters of Clelius, ſhe of Publicola, and the ſiſter of Brutus out of the hands of their Raviſhers. At theſe words theſe Romans without delay follow'd Horatius and Octavius, and left their Companions ſufficiently employ'd in ſuſtaining the charge of the Tarquinians. But though Horatius, Octavius, with theſe five Romans rid with full ſpeed, they could not have overtaken Sextus if it had not by good hap fell out that in the haſte this violent Prince made his Party to march, they miſtook one way for another. So that being engag'd in a place where great Trees had been by chance beat down, which obſtructed the paſſage, he was neceſſitated to return back again and come towards them who purſu'd him. Nevertheleſs, when he ſaw they were few in number, he was not much dejected, but leaving four of his men to guard the Chariot, he came up to them which purſu'd him with a reſolution which his confidence in the inequality of number made ſomething Heroical. Clelia and her companions lookt out with great grief and ſmall hope upon thoſe who came to ſuccour them. But their ſentiments were very confus'd, when they knew Horatius and Octavius; for in what danger ſoever Clelia was, death would have been ſweeter to her than to have an obligation to Horatius; and on the other ſide, ſeeing her Brother in ſo eminent a jeopardy, ſhe could not but reſent great inquietude. Hermilia (as indifferent as ſhe was to all things) was troubled at it; and Valeria and Plotina without much deliberating, made Vows for their Protectors. Horatius beholding Sextus diſguis'd, did not doubt but it was he who was the Ringleader of the enterpriſe. Wherefore approaching him with his ſword drawn, Who are you? (cry'd he) I am come to puniſh you for your villany. And with theſe words he made ſuch a paſs upon him, that if he had not avoided it by retiring back, he had been ſlain by the firſt blow. But immediately this valiant Roman ſaw himſelf engag'd in the midſt of half Sextus's party, whilſt Octavius encountred the reſt with incredible Valour. It was not long before two of thoſe who follow'd Horatius and Octavius were ſlain, ſo that there were but five left againſt a number three times as great. 'Tis true, Horatius kill'd two, and Octavius wounded three of them; but one of Sextus followers who aim'd only to make his Maſter victor by what way ſoever it were, endeavour'd chiefly to kill or at leaſt to wound the horſes of Horatius and Octavius. So that in a little time theſe two courageous perſons not doubting ſuch a baſeneſs, and minding only the aſſailing of their enemies and their own defence, perceiv'd that their horſes fail'd them, and ſaw themſelves diſmounted and conſequently in great danger, eſpecially Horatius, whoſe ſword was broken by the fall of his horſe. However, in this condition he did prodigious things; and Octavius having diſentangled himſelf diſputed both his life and his liberty. But fifteen or ſixteen horſemen againſt two on foot being a number too unequal (for the three others who remain'd fled, when they ſaw them fall) they were at length over-power'd. Yet they were wounded but very ſlightly; but the ſword of Horatius being broken off at the hilt, he was taken priſoner by Sextus. So that Octavius being now all alone, was no longer able to reſiſt the force of the enemies, but was diſarm'd and taken as well as Horatius. Sextus being over-joy'd with his victory took his Vizard off his face, and ſhew'd himſelf to them he had overcome, as it were inſulting the more over their misfortune. Ah, Villain! (cri'd Horatius when he knew him) is it poſſible that I am overcome by thee! However, do not hope to enjoy thy Victory (added he) the Gods are too juſt; and theſe ſtones ſhall ſooner be chang'd into Soldiers than heaven will permit thee to be maſter of the deſtiny of Horatius and ſo many vertuous perſons. Sextus ſmil'd at this ſpeech of Horatius without anſwering to it, and inhumanely caus'd this generous Heroe to be ty'd behind one of his men; treating Octavius a little better becauſe he was Clelia's brother: after which he began to proceed on his way.

The grief of Clelia and her companions was now ſo vehement, that they were not able to complain; but Sextus had ſcarce time to think that he was going to have the joy to put Horatius into the power of Tarquin and Tullia, that he had Clelia in his hands, and that this carrying her away would haſten the death of Aronces, but he beheld this Prince at the entrance of a little Wood through which he was to paſs, and beheld him in the head of ten men of quality, amongſt which was Telanus, Plotina's Lover. This fight ſo ſurpriz'd him, that he caus'd his men to make a halt. On the other ſide when Horatius (who was extremely dejected for having been overcome in the ſight of Clelia) ſaw Aronces, he was ſtrangely abaſh'd to be ſeen in this condition, by a Rival whom he was ſo jealous of. Nevertheleſs a ſentiment of love caus'd him to wiſh that he might deliver Clelia; but the ſame love at the ſame time caus'd him to deſire death, as imagining nothing could be more advantageous to him. Clelia (who believ'd Aronces in priſon) was much ſurpriz'd to ſee him; and fearing he might have the ſame deſtiny with Horatius, ſhe had ſuch confus'd ſentiments that ſhe could not tell what to hope or wiſh. As for Aronces, he was not aſtoniſh'd to meet Sextus or ſee Clelia; for he had broke priſon only to deliver her, upon notice given him by one of his Guards that Sextus deſign'd to carry her away when the Senate ſent her back to the Camp. But he was ſtrangely ſurpriz'd to ſee Horatius priſoner to Sextus. After this great and generous Heroe had beheld Clelia at a good distance, as if to receive addition to his valour by a favourable glance, he went up to those who guarded Horatius as he was bound; (for Sextus retir'd from the first rank to give orders to his men) and fiercely accosting them, Ha, caitifs! (said he to them) do you thus treat the bravest man in the world? In speaking which, he kill'd one of them, and wounded two; and then causing his Rival to be unbound, commanded his Squire to give him a sword and a horse, which was led in hand; and speaking to him, Come, Horatius (said he) come help me to deliver Clelia; for since I see Porsenna has resolv'd upon my death, I know none but your self in the world (when I am dead) worthy to serve her, and capable to defend her. Ha! Aronces (cri'd Horatius) 'tis worse to be deliver'd by you than to be overcome by Sextus. After which Aronces espying Octavius, set him also at liberty in spite of the resistance of Sextus, who being return'd from his astonishment, and having given orders to his men, fought like a desperate Tyger. But Aronces being animated by the love he had for Clelia, the hatred he had for Sextus, the esteem he had for Horatius, and the desire to surpass him, perform'd such prodigious things in this occasion, that Horatius and Octavius were astonish'd, though they were two of the most couragious men in the world. Yet they seconded him as vigorously as they could; but being they were both wounded sufficiently with the former fall of their horses, they were not able to shew all their courage: for Horatius right arm was half out of joynt, and Octavius was so wounded in the knee that he could scarce keep himself stedfast upon his horse. So that Aronces almost alone sustain'd the brunt of this sharp fight. Telanus also highly signaliz'd himself. But this Combate became yet more dangerous to Aronces; for they who had stay'd behind fighting with the Romans to amuse them, believing Sextus was got at a good distance, retreated and follow'd him; and when they beheld Sextus engag'd with Aronces, they joyn'd with him. But for that the Romans had slain some, and some had given over the encounter, this re-enforcement (though very considerable) rather augmented Aronces courage, who judging that to defeat his enemies at a blow it was requisite to kill Sextus, he open'd his way to him by killing such of his men as would have withstood him; and then there began a furious Combate between these two Rivals. Aronces at first wounded Sextus, who discharging a great blow at him, might perhaps have slain or dangerously wounded him, if he had not warded it off with addresses, and if without losing time he had not discharg'd another at him upon the head, which was so weighty that it amaz'd him. In the mean time all Sextus's men taking care only to defend him, Aronces was continually assail'd by many together; but he so well quitted himself of so many enemies, and kill'd so many, that being seconded by Horatius, Octavius, Telanus, and all the rest who had follow'd him, Sextus perceiv'd he had not many more men than Aronces; wherefore feeling himself wounded, despairing to overcome, and much fearing to fall into the power of Porsenna or the Romans after this action of his, he resolv'd upon flight, knowing that he had a very swift horse. And accordingly beginning to give ground as he fought, on a sudden he turn'd about and fled with all his men after him into the Wood and by ways which were known to himself but not to Aronces. Who having lost sight of him was recall'd by love from the pursuit to Clelia notwithstanding the ardent desire he had to kill Sextus. But for that Horatius knew this wood better than Aronces, he took a way into it, being follow'd by Octavius and Telanus, and hoping to intercept Sextus by a short turn; during which Aronces going directly to Clelia's Chariot, was receiv'd with a thousand testimonies of kindness by her and her companions, who gave him a thousand praises. That which I have done, Madam (said he to Clelia) is so small a matter, that it is not fit to lose the moments which are precious to us in commending me more than I deserve. Therefore it is requisite that I conduct you to Rome, and after that go and satisfie the King my Father that I have not broke my prison as a parricide who would avoid the punishment he deserves, but as an unfortunate and faithful Lover, who would defend the person he adores. How? my Lord (answer'd Clelia) are you come forth of prison only to succour me? and may I believe you are constant to me? I beseech you (added she) tell me what course you took to do it. I was advertis'd by a trusty soldier of my guards (repli'd he) that Sextus design'd to carry you away. Whereupon I brib'd some, broke through the rest, and having found Telanus and a Squire, they in a moment got together these which follow'd me, and I came happily enough to do you perhaps the last service of my life; for as I told you, Madam, it behoves me to return to prison, assoon as I have conducted you to Rome. Ah! my Lord (answer'd Clelia) this generosity is extreme cruel; but to imitate you in some sort, do not carry me back to Rome, but lead me to the Camp, to the end I may serve to justifie you. No, no Madam (said he to her) it does not belong to me to return the Hostages to the King, to whom perhaps they would no longer be inviolable. Therefore 'tis absolutely necessary that I conduct you to Rome, from whence the Consuls will remit you hither if they please: but if you will take my counsel, Madam, do not return hither though it should be resolv'd to remand you; and all the favour I desire of you, if I die, is, that you would believe that I have never lov'd any but your self, that I have lov'd you more than any other person in the world can love, and that I shall regret you alone at my death.

As Aronces was speaking this, Horatius, Octavius and Telanus came to them, without having found Sextus. After which taking the way towards Rome, they met those the Consuls sent to the succour of the Hostages coming to seek Clelia and her companions. Aronces understood by them that the rest of the fair Romans were carri'd back into the City till it were known what this adventure was, and who had committed this violent and unjust attempt. However he would conduct Clelia till within two hundred paces of Rome. Upon the way there was a discourse between Horatius and him which was not heard by any other person, and wherein it appear'd both of them constrain'd themselves and that Horatius was much dejected for owing his life so often to his Rival: but at length Aronces being oblig'd to depart, he took leave of Clelia and her companions, after a manner which mov'd the hearts of all that beheld it; for there appear'd an heroical resolution in his countenance, though his eyes withal discover'd an extreme sadness, which manifestly proceeded from love. As for Clelia, never was seen so sad a person as she in this occasion; but her melancholy was accompani'd with so much discretion, that it caus'd the greater compassion. Plotina desir'd Telanus to dissuade Aronces from returning into prison; but he answer'd her, that the Prince was too great a Lover of glory, to leave himself under the suspicion of being culpable, culpable, Aronces and Horatius parted with civility, Remember (said the Prince of Hetruria to him) what you have promis'd me, I will not fail (answer'd Horatius) but do you remember also that in some occasions one may be excusable in being ingrateful. Aronces embrac'd Octavius with much dearness, and having once again bid Clelia adieu with the most passionate air in the World, he took the way to the Camp, where all things were in strange confusion. For Porsenna understanding Aronces had broke prison, became absolutely confirm'd in his opinion that he was culpable, and had conspir'd against his life. Wherefore out of this prejudice, he said there needed no other proofs, and commanded some to pursue and bring him back, that he might cause him to be punish'd as a parricide, there being no necessity of more evidence. Moreover, that wise Roman who was encharged with the conduct of the Hostages, having sent to advertise him that he could not bring them to the Camp that day, because Clelia was carri'd away, he believ'd Aronces was he that had done it; so that assembling all his conjectures together, he fram'd an immutable purpose in his mind to destroy both Aronces and Clelia if he could get them into his power. Neither Galerita nor the Princess of the Leontines, nor any of Aronces friends could make any thing appear probable to him contrary to these two surmises; for they knew nothing of the truth. So there was an universal consternation in the minds of all; for the flight of Aronces caus'd a very bad effect amongst the Soldiers who were most affectionate to him.

On the other side Tarquin and Tullia were in their quarter impatiently expecting what would happen from the correspondence they had in Rome, the carrying away of Clelia, Porsenna's accusation of Aronces, and the design of bribing him who expounded the Lots of Praeneste; and in whatever cases, their forces had order to be ready to march, if it were requisite.

But if there were a tumult in the Camp, there was a greater at Rome; for some said, the Hostages ought not to be return'd more, because it was probable Porsenna knew of Sextus attempt, and that certainly he would have had Clelia in his power without appearing to have broken the publick faith. Publicola nevertheless persisted still firm in his opinion, and so much the more, because Horatius and Octavius could not go abroad this day by reason of their wounds; for perhaps love would have oblig'd them to oppose it. On the other side, Clelia, with the consent of her companions demanded that they might return to Porsenna, to the end to accuse Sextus and justifie Aronces as much as she could; for her jealousie was now much diminish'd. At the same time also the intelligence which Tarquin and Tullia had in Rome was discover'd, and one was seiz'd on who had promis'd to deliver the gate Nevia to the Tarquinians. So that all this together caus'd so great a disorder in the City, that the Senate was assembled extraordinarily, to advise what was fitting to be done. The result of their debate was, to send back the Hostages with a strong guard, to acquaint Porsenna with Sextus enterprise to carry away Clelia, and that of Tarquin upon Rome after a treaty of peace.

But whilst all was in confusion both at Rome and the Camp, and the infamous and criminal Sextus was retir'd to Tarquinia wounded and desperate for having fail'd of his attempt, the generous Aronces overwhelm'd with discontents was going to re-enter into his prison. Upon the way he met some of those who made shew of going to seek him and take him, but they sought him only to advertise him of Porsenna's fury; but whatever they could say to him, he would not alter his purpose; he also desir'd Telanus to leave him, for fear he might incur Porsenna's displeasure; but Telanus would not. When he came to the Camp, he went directly to his Prison, and finding no guards there he sent Telanus to the King his Father to desire them again, and to conjure him to permit him to see him; to the end to give an account of his action. But Porsenna was so incens'd, that instead of hearing Telanus, he caus'd him to be arrested and carried to the same prison where Aronces was, whither also he speedily dispatcht guards; for in his fury, he believ'd the Prince his Son return'd only because he saw he could not escape apprehending; or that perhaps he had oblig'd some of those whom he sent after him, to say he return'd of his own accord. So that he was fully resolv'd to punish Aronces.

The next day Galerita follow'd by the Princess of the Leontines, the charming Herfilia, and the generous Melintha enter'd into his Tent to intercede with him for Aronces. But before the Queen of Hetruria could speak any thing to him, word was brought to the King that the Romans had sent the Hostages back. Whereupon being surpris'd to see that after what had hapned, these twenty fair Virgins were remanded to him, he seem'd sufficiently perplex'd, though he wish'd to have Clelia in his power, to the end to make use of her to convince Aronces.

The Senate (said he roughly) relies much upon the Publick Faith, in sending back to me a person who has at least been privy to a conspiracy made against my life. Ah! my Lord (cry'd Galerita) the Prince most assuredly is not culpable. You shall see that, Madam (said he to her) you shall see that. In the mean time (added he with a grim air) let the Hostages be brought hither. This Order being given, the Roman who conducted them, and who was nam'd Celius, enter'd in the head of these twenty fair Romans. But because entrance was not prohibited, the Prince Artemidorus, Themistus, Theomenes, Zenocrates, divers Officers, and many others enter'd at the same time. The sight of these fair Virgins whom he would not see when they were in his Camp, surpriz'd Porsenna. They enter'd with a good grace, they saluted him with a civility perfectly noble, and carrying a modest confidence in their countenances, they forc'd him to behold them less fiercely than he would. Yet he strove against this first sentiment which he could not restrain, and recalling his fury, Which of you (said he to them, without hearing Celius who was beginning to speak) was so rash as to contrive that unjust design of violating the Law of Nations, by departing out of my power without my permission, and rather to endanger perishing in the Tyber than stay in the Camp? That generous design (answer'd Valeria readily, being unwilling all Porsenna's choler should fall upon Clelia) is so glorious, that all my Companions and my self will have part in it. No, no, too generous Friend (said Clelia beholding Valeria) it is not fit that you should unjustly expose your self to the indignation of a great King. Therefore, my Lord (added she, addressing to Porsenna) understand the truth from my mouth, and know, that that glorious design belongs to me alone, and I us'd all means I could to perswade my Companions to it, who knowing the just ground I had to undertake it, were so generous as to hazard their own lives for the preservation of my honour. You ought rather to say (reply'd Porsenna) that the fear of being compel'd

by force to accuſe a Criminal whom you love, oblig'd you to fly. Ah! my Lord (anſwer'd Clelia, without being daunted or tranſported) did I believe the Prince your ſon capable of ſo horrid a Crime as that you accuſe him of, I ſhould hate rather than love him; for my parents have taught me to hate vice, even upon the Throne. But, my Lord, I went out of your Camp for no other cauſe but for that I was advertis'd Sextus deſign'd to carry me away. So that believing nothing ought to be ſo dear to me as the preſervation of my honour, I ſlighted death which ſeem'd ſo aſſur'd, and attempted to paſs the Tyber. But to confirm that which I ſpeak, you need only admit the trouble to hear what Celius has order to ſay to you from the Senate. Clelia ſpoke this with ſo noble an air, that Porſenna was aſtoniſht at her great Beauty, Wit and Confidence. Wherefore fearing his heart might become inclinable to pity, if ſhe ſpoke more, he commanded Celius to diſcharge his Commiſſion. My Lord (ſaid this wiſe Roman) I have order from the Senate to render the Hoſtages to your Majeſty, and to tell you that whilſt Rome keeps her word ſo exactly, thoſe whom you protect againſt her, outrage you with all the injuſtice imaginable. For Sextus yeſterday attempted to have carri'd away Clelia, and with a hundred Horſe attaqued thoſe that guarded her under my command. At firſt he appear'd diſguis'd, but afterwards he made himſelf known. Horatius came to ſuccour this vertuous Lady and three of her Companions whom he had got into his power; but the valour of Horatius and Octavius Clelia's Brother was forc'd to give way to number, ſo that they were taken priſoners; and if the valiant and generous Aronces had not arriv'd to their relief, Clelia, Horatius and Octavius would have continued under the power of that unjuſt Prince. But to let you ſee that he is not the ſole perſon of the Tarquins who outrages you, there is diſcover'd a Conſpiracy of Tarquin and Tullia in Rome, the principal Plotters of which we have in cuſtody, whom the Senate is willing to refer to your juſtice. All which you ſay (anſwer'd Porſenna) ſurpriſes and confounds me; but ſhould all which you ſay, be true, it would not juſtifie Aronces; and if Clelia would declare the truth ſhe might accuſe and convict him. If he were culpable (anſwer'd Clelia) and his crime were come to my knowledge, I would not accuſe him, though I ſaw certain death before me. But, my Lord, my hatred would accuſe him, and I ſhould ſo abhor him, that all I could do would be to forbear hurting him. However, my Lord, ſuffer me to tell you for your own honour, that the Prince cannot be culpable, and you cannot without injuſtice treat him as a criminal. I know well (added ſhe) that you hate him becauſe he does me the honour to love me; but, my Lord, this hatred is unjuſt (if I may preſume to ſpeak ſo.) I knew not that he was the Son of a King when he began to love me, nor did he know it himſelf; and ſince we have known it, I never led him to diſobey you. No doubt he has not been able to ceaſe to love me, nor I to take away an affection from him which I gave him by the command of my Father. But, my Lord, fear nothing from this innocent paſſion, and be aſſur'd it can never induce to Criminal actions. I am not indeed Daughter of a King; but, my Lord, I am a Roman, and daughter of a Roman who prefers vertue above all things. Beware therefore, I conjure you, to blemiſh your glory by an injuſtice. I do not ask of you to reign in Hetruria (continu'd ſhe) I only deſire you would pleaſe to give the Prince time to juſtifie himſelf. I have been accuſtom'd to misfortunes, I ſhall know how to live as I have done; and if the Gods ſhall ſo pleaſe, I ſhall know how to die too with ſufficient courage. Porſenna beheld Clelia attentively whilſt ſhe was ſpeaking, and being unable to hinder himſelf from admiring her, Would to the Gods (cry'd this offended Prince) you could have as well perſwaded me of the innocence of Aronces as of your own. For I confeſs (added he) I find ſomething of ſuch grandeur in what I have now heard, and in what you have done, that to imitate the generoſity of the Romans, I will ſend you back again to Rome, and oblige you to ask ſome reward of me for the daring action you have done; for, excepting the life and liberty of Aronces, I promiſe you whatever you ſhall demand of me. Since 'tis ſo, my Lord (anſwer'd ſhe) I deſire only the favour of you, that you will take time to examine well the vertue of the Prince, and the wickedneſs of Tullia, and that you will ſend back all the Hoſtages as well as my ſelf. I grant you that which you demand of me (reply'd Porſenna) and if my Son were worthy of you, nothing could hinder you from being one day Queen of Hetruria; ſo charm'd I am with your courage and vertue. After this, Porſenna ſpoke many things to Celius, that he might underſtand more clearly the enterpriſe of Tarquin and Tullia againſt Rome. Which done, he caus'd the goodlieſt Horſe he had to be given to Clelia, to teſtifie that he judg'd ſhe had the courage of a Heroe; for it was a cuſtome of the Kings of Hetruria to make the like preſent to ſuch as had ſignaliz'd themſelves by ſome heroical action.

But after theſe fair Romans were departed, Lucilius, Herminius, Theanor, Æmilius the old Soothſayer who expounded the Lots at Praneſte, and Celer (who had been priſoner ſo long at Tarquinia) arriv'd. Aſſoon as they came into the Tent, Mutius approach'd, and addreſſing to the King of Hetruria and ſhewing him the hand which he had ſo couragiouſly ſuffer'd to burn in his preſence, Is it poſſible my Lord (ſaid he to him) that a man whom you ſaw ſo ſtout as to endure the fire unmov'd in your preſence, ſhould be the complice of a Parricide? No, no, my Lord (added he) true Romans are not capable of committing ſuch crimes as that. I would have deſtroy'd you for the good of my Country, but I ſhould never have done it to promote your Son to the Throne. Be pleas'd therefore to command thoſe who pretend I treated with them by Aronces order, to be brought into my ſight, to the end I may cover them with confuſion; and if it be needful I will put my hand a ſecond time into the fire without fearing to be burnt, to atteſt this truth. Moreover, let not my departure from Rome be interpreted flight, my particular unhappineſſes caus'd me to go to Praneſte, there to conſult the Gods ſecretly; and though they have not been favourable to me, and I had reſolv'd to go hide my diſcontent in ſome remote place from Rome; yet I no ſooner heard by Herminius that the Prince your Son was accus'd and my ſelf too, but I came hither for his juſtification and my own; and if you pleaſe to hear Celer who has eſcap'd out of the priſon of Tarquinia where Tullia kept him, he will inform you of ſundry things more which juſtifie Aronces. And what can you inform me of? ſaid (Porſenna haſtily to Celer.) My Lord, I ſhall inform you (anſwer'd he) that they which depoſe againſt the Prince were priſoners with me, and to obtain their liberty, promis'd Tullia to bear that falſe witneſs. They told me ſo themſelves when they endeavor'd

to perſwade me on the behalf of Tullia, to help to deſtroy Aronces; and I was ſometimes threatned with death, and ſometimes promis'd my liberty, to bring me to what they deſir'd; and if they were preſent, I aſſure my ſelf they would not dare to contradict me. But, my Lord, if this ſage Soothſayer whoſe honeſty you know, ſpeak to you, he will tell you things more important. 'Tis true, my Lord (ſaid the Soothſayer who had dwelt long at Cluſium) that Tullia ſent a man to me at Praneſte on the day of the great Feſtival of Fortune, to offer me conſiderable rewards if I would betray the Gods, and render a falſe anſwer to Lucilius, who came to conſult them on your behalf. But being I am uncapable of committing an impiety, I deliver'd it ſeal'd up to Lucilius, as it was found in the Lots of the moſt redoubtable of all the Deities. And to make good what I alledge againſt Tullia, I have caus'd him to be arreſted who would have ſuborn'd my fidelity. Lucilius, Herminius, Æmilius, Theanor, and Mutius, having confirm'd that which this ſage Soothſayer ſaid, Porſenna took the ſeal'd-up anſwer which Lucilius brought him, and having open'd it with a countenance which manifeſted the agitation of his mind, he found theſe words.

Thy ſon is innocent; thou canſt not deſtroy him without thy own deſtruction; his love is well-pleaſing to the Gods; and if thou hindereſt him from being happy, thou ſhalt always be unfortunate.

Porſenna was much mov'd at this anſwer, but would not expreſs it yet; and commanded ſome perſons to go forthwith to the Quarters of Tullia to require thoſe men of her who were to maintain before Mutius that Aronces was a partaker in his deſign to kill him. But he had ſcarce given this Order, when word was brought him that Tarquin and Tullia were diſcamp'd, and had ſet men at work to break the bridge, which ſerv'd for the communication of the Quarters, to the end they might not be follow'd ſo ſpeedily; becauſe though Porſenna had another, yet it was very remote from the road to Tarquinia. And to compleat the diſcovery of all theſe wickedneſſes, two men were brought to him whom Tullia had commanded to be firſt ſtab'd, and then caſt into the Tyber. But being ſhe had been but ill-obey'd in the tumult caus'd by ſudden diſcamping, and they to whom the order was given pityed them, they were permitted to fly whither they could. But not knowing whither to fly either towards Rome or the Camp, the remorſe of their Crimes brought them to ſeek their ſafety in the clemency of Porſenna. And ſo cauſing themſelves to be preſented to him, they caſt themſelves at his feet, lay'd open the accurſed contrivance of Tullia, and implor'd his pity to pardon two unhappy perſons, who to avoid perpetual impriſonment had promis'd to commit a crime.

Aronces being now fully juſtifi'd, Porſenna was ſo confounded for his own injuſtice, that he commanded ſome to go and fetch the Prince immediately. Who accordingly coming, follow'd by Telanus and a great number of Officers, Porſenna went to him aſſoon as he ſaw him, and embracing him with tenderneſs, The Gods and men have juſtifi'd you (ſaid he to him) and 'tis I at preſent who am the Criminal. But, my Son, I will ſhortly make you ſatisfaction, and I have ſo ill us'd my Authority that I will reſign it into your hands. In the mean time, go forthwith in the head of the Cavalry and endeavor to overtake the Forces of Tarquin and Tullia; for inſtead of their Protector I am become their mortal Enemy, and at your return you ſhall know my intentions. Aronces anſwer'd Porſenna with as much reſpect as if he had not been injured by him; and obeying him at the ſame hour, he went forth with Artemidorus, Themiſtus, Mutius, Herminius, Theanor, and all the reſt to ſummon the Troops together; and left Porſenna with Galerita, the Princeſs of the Leontines, Herſilia, Melintha, and the ſage Soothſayer who confirm'd him in his good ſentiments. But now all the Camp beholding Aronces at liberty and in the head of the Troops, teſtifi'd an inconceivable joy. The Prince wiſhing ardently to overtake Tarquin's Forces, made ſuch diligence that though the diſtance were great, he came upon them in diſorder, they having not gone very faſt, becauſe they were retarded by their baggage. Whereupon Aronces charging vigorouſly upon them, cut them in pieces, and put them into ſuch diſorder, that Tarquin and Tullia (fearing to fall into the power of Porſenna, and that he ſhould deliver them up to the Romans) forſook their Forces, left Titus to command them, and fled away by unfrequented ways, and went to ſeek Sanctuary with the Tyrant of Cuma, where they were ill enough receiv'd, and in proceſs of time dy'd very miſerable, as well as the infamous Sextus. But the Prince Titus ſoon ſaw the reſt of his Troops cut in pieces, and he was known by Aronces who could have ſlain him, if he would; but this generous Prince conſidering him as a Friend and a vertuous Prince, favour'd his retreat, which he made only with five others. And ſo ſeeing there were no more enemies to overcome, nor any hope of taking Tarquin or Tullia, Aronces return'd to the Camp; but upon the way he met Octavius in the head of two hundred Roman horſe, who underſtanding that Tarquin was purſu'd, was going to help Aronces to overcome him. Aſſoon as Aronces beheld him, he went civilly to him; and having in two words told him what had paſs'd, he ſeparated himſelf at ſome diſtance from all the reſt, and addreſſing to him, conjur'd him to be ſtill favourable to him, and to ſweeten the mind of Clelius as much as he could. Whereby falling to ſpeak of Clelia, as they were croſſing a Wood they unawares left the great way in which the Troops march'd, and took a by-path which led them away from them. And out of reſpect there was none follow'd them but one of the Squires of Aronces. They had ſcarce gone a quarter of an hour, but Aronces thought he heard the voice of Horatius, and a noiſe of the claſhing of ſwords. Whereupon haſtning through the trees towards the place whence the voice came, he ſaw ten or twelve men dead whom his redoubtable Rival had ſlain, and ſaw him encompaſs'd by ten or twelve more who endeavor'd either to take or kill him. He had no more but the Trunchion of a ſword in his hand, his Shield was broken, and he would have infallibly been taken if Aronces had not arriv'd. For as Horatius had ſeiz'd one of the mens ſwords to wreſt it from him, another was going to thruſt his through his body, when Aronces beholding him in this condition, reſolv'd to reſcue him. What? (cry'd he as he advanc'd with his ſword drawn towards thoſe who attaqu'd Horatius) are there ſtill any Tarquinians, who dare attaque a Roman, after Tarquin is defeated and overcome, and fled? And ſo the Prince, Octavius and his Squire made ſuch a fierce charge upon thoſe that were ready to deſtroy Horatius, that they chang'd their deſign of killing him into that of defending themſelves. But Horatius knowing the voice of Aronces, ſeem'd more afflicted to ſee that he was once more his deliverer, than he had been daunted at the danger he was lately in. Nor was it long before he beheld Aronces kill one of his enemies, enemies, wound many, and sustain the effort of the rest. Whereupon taking new heart, he kept to the ground to take a fresh view of the slain, and remounting his horse, set himself to defend Aronces; but there was no need; for having slain one, and Octavius wounded some others, the rest betook themselves to flight. After which Aronces civilly accosted his Rival whilst his Squire was redressing something about the bridle of his horse. You know (said he to him, preventing him from speaking) when I saw you last, I oblig'd you in the secret conversation we had together, to promise me that if I dy'd you would never force Clelia to marry you, that you would make use of nothing but entreaties, and if you could not move her, not to cease to protect her all your life against such as would constrain her. You promis'd this in consideration of the small service I had then done you; and I promis'd you again that I would never marry Clelia, till I had offer'd you to win her by a Combate with you. I acquit my self of my word (added Aronces) for though I am not certain whether I am likely to be happy, yet there have lately fallen out so many changes in my fortune, that I have some ground to hope it; wherefore before we go to the Camp, I will hide my self in the Wood we are to pass through, and satisfie you if you desire it. But, my Lord (answer'd Horatius) what would you say of me, if owing my life and liberty more than once to you, I should draw my sword against you the same moment that you have imploy'd yours in my defence? I would say (repli'd Aronces) that a Rival is not so oblig'd to gratitude as other persons are. Ha! my Lord (cry'd Horatius hastily) I should not be satisfi'd of that, and therefore 'tis best that I yield a felicity to you which you alone can merit, and the Gods themselves have decreed to you; nor was I going but to seek my death in helping you to overcome Tarquin when I met those that assaulted me. But to compleat your happiness (added he) know, that as I beheld Clelia enter into Rome, she spoke so rigorously to me, that I am convinc'd nothing but death can comfort me. That which you say, is so worthy of your courage (answer'd Aronces) that if you will be my friend, I shall with joy be yours as long as I live. Alas! my Lord (reply'd Horatius) I know not my own Will, but for fear my vertue abandon me, permit me to leave you and return to Rome. And accordingly Horatius departing from Aronces went to relate to the Romans the Victory of his Rival. Clelia in the mean time had been receiv'd there in triumph with all her companions. But Horatius (to carry his generosity further) went to Clelius and shew'd him the answer the Lots of Praneste had given him; for he had sent one of his Friends thither, who brought it him back, and which was so exact that nothing could be more clear; for it was in these terms. Clelius and Clelia to Aronces, the Gods decree so, and you cannot pretend to her without displeasing them. Aronces being by this time return'd to the Camp, was receiv'd with joy by Porsenna, Galerita, the Princess of the Leontines, all the Army and the whole Court. And (to accomplish his felicity) the King of Hetruria told him, that to testifie to Rome that he desir'd to hasten the peace, he would discamp the next day, and send Ambassadors to demand Clelia of the Senate. Aronces thank'd with a joy surpassing all expression. And accordingly the King of Hetruria made good his word, discamping the day following, and sending to demand Clelia of the Senate for the Prince his Son, to the end she might be the confirmer of the peace. The Senate receiv'd this proposition with joy, and requir'd Clelia of Clelius, who after he understood the truth of all things, deliver'd her to them with the consent of Horatius. Whereupon without further delay, the Princess of the Leontines went to fetch Sulpicia and Clelia to conduct them to Clusium where the ceremony was to be accomplish, and whither Clelius went too accompani'd by Octavius, Herminius, Zenocrates, Anacreon and his particular Friends. As for Clelia, she was accompani'd by Berelisa and Clidamira, who were return'd from Praneste, and Valeria: for Plotina was so afflicted for the death of Amilcar, that she fell sick upon it, and could not go thither. Assoon as Porsenna and all this noble and fair company were arriv'd at Clusium, the Nuptials of Aronces and Clelia were celebrated in the the proud Temple of Juno the Queen with incredible magnificence. But to the astonishment of all the spectators, as Aronces and Clelia were upon their knees before that famous Statue of Juno, Porsenna plac'd his Scepter upon the Altar, as resigning his authority to the Gods from whom he held it; and Galerita put a Crown of Flowers upon Clelia's head, as declaring her Queen. After which the Priest taking the Scepter presented it to Aronces, who modestly refus'd it: Nor would he accept the Soveraign Power which Porsenna hereby resign'd to him. So that by this great action he made himself compleatly worthy of all the felicity he enjoy'd by the possession of the most vertuous person that ever was. In the midst of this publick joy, Amilcar had the honour to be much regretted; Anacreon made Verses upon this happy Marriage; and after eight intire days were spent in feasting and rejoycing, Themistus, Merigenes and their Friend went to seek Lindamira, Artemidorus return'd to Leontium to make Berelisa his Princess there, and to cause Lysimira to marry Zenocrates, who recover'd the Principality of Herbisa which had belong'd to his Ancestors. As for Clidamira, though she was assur'd to marry Meleontus, yet she was not so well contented as she seem'd; Theanor and Æmilius obey'd the Gods, and were happy; the other Lover went to travel to cure himself of his passion. And as for Herminius, at his return to Rome, Publicola gave him Valeria, notwithstanding all the obstacles which oppos'd his happiness. Hermilia had a great friendship for Octavius, and Octavius for her, but married not: Collatina dy'd with sorrow for the the misfortunes of Titus, and Plotina declar'd to all her Lovers that she would never marry. It was known that the Prince who persecuted Cleraniubes was dead: and Horatius as unhappy as he was, nevertheless was so generous as to take care to cause Clelia's Statue to be erected according to the Vote of the Senate in the upper part of the sacred street, near his own, having this sad consolation, to see that the tokens of their glory were at least in the same place. But in acknowledgment of his generosity, Aronces and Clelia sent to offer him their friendship, so that after so many misfortunes these two illustrious persons saw themselves as happy as they had been unfortunate, and saw nothing that could equal their felicity besides their virtue. Clelia had a Statue at Rome; Porsenna also caus'd one to be made for her before the stately Tomb which he had built, and Anacreon put these Verses upon the pedestal of the Statue.

Tyber, although a God, amazed stood
At that great Soul that durst attempt his flood,
And cry'd, This sure must some new Venus be,
Born from my waves as she was from the Sea.
Thy form and courage Fame alike shall blow,
Till Rome to stand, and Tyber cease to flow.
